BRIEF OF TITLE TO THE INHERITANCE.

OR, JEHOVAH'S PROMISE TO ABRAHAM.

BY JACOB GRIM.

In summing up our argument on the above subject, we would call the attention of our readers to a few facts; the first is, That the promises were made to Abram when he had no children; and yet he and his seed were promised an everlasting inheritance in this land. Paul says that "Abraham by faith sojourned in a strange land....with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. Through faith Sarah received strength ....to bear a child when past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised. Therefore there sprang even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude. These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off....confessed they were strangers and pilgrims in the earth." Heb. xi. 9–13.

Now, if Paul refers to the natural seed of Abraham, they did not all die in faith, looking for the promises; for thousands, according to Paul's own showing, had no faith, and did not find what they sought after, because they had no faith. Again Paul says in 17 v., "By faith Abraham offered up Isaac....of whom it was said, in Isaac shall thy seed be called; accounting that God was able to raise (the dead) him up (that is, Isaac) from whence also he received him in figure."

And in closing up this chapter, Paul remarks, "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith received not the promises," (the reason is, dead men, or men in the flesh are not in a condition to enjoy an everlasting inheritance), "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect."

Second, We argue that this promise was made to Abraham through an elect seed, and Abraham's natural seed were only the instruments through whom the true seed was to come. Proof. Jacob and Esau were both the natural seed of Abraham, and before the children were born, "and neither having done good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand." Now the purpose of God was to give Christ the inheritance, and Jacob was elected to carry out God's purpose, that through his family and not through Esau, Christ was to come; and so through Judah, instead of the other families of Israel.

Third, We have shown, through Moses, Jesus, and the Apostles, that the title to the above named land was never in Israel in the flesh, but was retained in the hands of Jehovah, and leased only to Israel until the true heir, Jesus, should come. Proof. Jesus in he parable of the kingdom being taken from them and given to another nation.

Fourth, In the sign of circumcision, which was given to Abraham, as a covenant that God would fulfil his promise, and give him a seed, of whom Paul speaks as being Christ, and which covenant Jehovah said was to be enjoined upon all his seed, in all their generations. Now we find a point at which the apostle says, If ye be circumcised Christ profiteth you nothing. The reason assigned is, "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth before you crucified?" Gal. iii. 1. We find the Apostle, to these same Galatians, saying, If ye be circumcised Christ profiteth you nothing. Why? I answer, The sign of circumcision was to be continued in all Abraham's generations until God's promise was fulfilled, and the seed had come. The seed having come, and having been set forth before them, the sign that pointed to it had ceased; or in other words, If you are continuing the sign you deny the seed, (Christ) and he profiteth you nothing; for you are, through your sign, looking for another seed, or another Christ; and that is the condition of all the Jews at the present day; but Paul teaches them that Christ has come, and had been set forth before them; and circumcision and Abraham's generations ceased; for circumcision was to continue with Abraham's generations; but circumcision, according to the Apostle, has ceased; hence Abraham's generations have ceased, and Christ's generation has commenced; and Jesus stands the New Man, at the head of a new race, in whom all the inheritance is invested; if ye be Christ's then, (and not without) are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise.

Fifth. If the promise was made to Abraham and his seed, (Christ) by faith, it does not belong to Israel in the flesh, or through the law. We have shown that it was given to Abraham by faith; and circumcision was only given as a sign, and not in any way as a covenant of the land. This led Paul to say, that if the inheritance is by the law, it was not of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. And we repeat, if it belongs to Israel as a nation, in the flesh, under the law, it does not belong to Christ and his seed by promise: but, Paul says, it was given to Abraham and his seed by promise; and hence, says the Apostle, Abraham and the faithful are waiting for it by the resurrection of the dead.

Sixth. We have no authority, that I can find, to offer life, or hope, in the future, to Jew or Gentile, except through faith in Jesus Christ; and as that is God's present method of justification, I have no authority to hold out any other hope to Israel, or any other individual. And as Life only in Christ, is the present method of salvation, I cannot see what benefit it can be to me, or the sons of Israel, to point them to a hope that does not concern any individual who is under the gospel dispensation; hence, my mission is to preach Christ, and him crucified, the only hope, of the present age.

Seventh. And now having, as we think, proved, from Abraham down to Christ, a clear title to the inheritance through a line that centered in Jesus Christ, we shall claim for our client the Inheritance, as belonging to him, and his seed; and we believe, that at the proper time God will file a bill of ejectment against those that killed his servants, stoned his prophets, and, last of all, killed the heir, and will miserably destroy them, and give the kingdom to Jesus and his people, who will bring forth the fruits thereof.

I now close by saying, that after reading all that has been written, on the opposite side, my judgment fails to be convinced; for in those arguments all the promises are taken made under the law, and the conditions, I think, lost sight of, and in order to harmonize many of the difficulties, a ruling nation or kingly dynasty has been established; but the fact is, that Abraham was to have the land for an everlasting possession; which can only be enjoyed by a resurrection from the dead. Again, this ruling nation does not agree with the promise: "Thus saith Jehovah, Behold I will bring again the captives of Jacob's tent, ...And from them shall proceed thanksgiving....their children also shall be as formerly ....And their shall be of nobles themselves, and their governor shall proceed from the midst of them." Jer. xxx. 18—21. Now, this is not in harmony with the doctrine that out of the gentiles, is to be taken a people to be rulers, and Israel in the flesh are only to be servants in the land. We believe that our Ruler will be the man Christ Jesus, exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, and the Inheritor of God's promise to Abraham, with all the redeemed of all nations.

THE GLORY OF THE LATTER DAYS.

"God is a great king. A Lord of kings, and ruleth in the kingdom of men."—DANIEL.

"Which in his times shall he shew who is the blessed Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords."—PAUL.

Kingdoms and Republics are liable, (as they ever have been inclined in practice,) to look to their own ways and to follow the policy of pride and interest. This, the Lord of kings will not tolerate forever. It is a pity they had not preferred the advice of a good prophet to a profane king, many years ago. It is this: "Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquility." Dan. iv. 27.

Inaugurated power or instituted authority, is a legitimate and essential condition for the people. The masses could not trust themselves without them. They expect to be ruled —they would not know what to do, left to themselves.

But while kings and cabinets are providentially instituted, and appointed to power, they ought to remember they are subordinates. There is a great "Lord of kings" that expects them to do his will. Like Cyrus, of whom it was written, "He shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem: Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid." Powers so appointed shall have plain indications under the divine rule—of their duty both in time and measure. In this we may be confident. God has his men—the kingdom, the time, the opportunity, the will, and the omnipotence. He is willing that men of power and kingdoms should work for him of choice, but work for him they must either from choice or constraint. "He shall do my pleasure." "Kings shall be nursing fathers, and queens nursing mothers." Neither shall their work be hard. God says, "I will go before thee and make the crooked places straight, I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut assunder the bars of iron, that thou mayest know that I the Lord which call thee by thy name am the God of Israel." Isa. xlv. 2. Cyrus was named a hundred years before he was born. The favored power of which we will speak was named many centuries before it was brought into use. But more of opportunity.

THEY SHALL HAVE AUTHORITY.—"Listen, O, isles unto me; and hearken ye people from afar; the LORD hath called me from the womb; and he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword, in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me, and made me a polished shaft; in his quiver hath he hid me. Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified,....And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel." "Thus saith the LORD, In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in the day of salvation have I helped thee; and I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, to establish the earth tocause to inherit the desolate heritages. That thou mayest say to the prisoners, go forth; to them that are in darkness, show yourselves....I will make all my mountains away, and my highways shall be exalted."

THEY SHALL HAVE SUCCESS.—"Shall the prey be taken from the mighty; or the lawful captive be delivered? But thus saith the LORD Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away, and the prey of the terrible shall be delivered, for I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and I will save thy children, I will feed them that oppress thee, with their own flesh, and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine." Isa. xlix.

The Anglo Saxons have stood in the breach, when papacy, the hater of our holy religion, broke forth like a flood upon the remnant of the woman's seed, and have maintained, for the most part, a consistent attitude in dealing with this power—the exception has been lenency to it, which popery cannot bear. It always would and ever will abuse privilege. Like the serpent in the fable, when warmed by hospitality and rendered suple, will bite its benefactor to death.

The Anglo Saxon power is destined to take possession of Turkey, Syria, and Palestine. Other powers covet the distinction. Russia would like to fasten the Greek religion upon Palestine. France or Austria the Latin. Neither is better than Musulmism, in which of either event the desolation would be prolonged, and that sublime country ridiculed by their insufferable mummery and superstition. Russia cannot afford to fight for this distinction. France and Austria must fight each other, and be broken, and go into perdition. For them there is no glory but carnage. No distinction, but "double destruction." They have popery about their necks as a mill-stone that will drag with it into the pit, every thing that is in any way allied to it, either in faith or politics.

England may, if it will, be the second Cyrus. Some power will fill this place assigned in prophecy. That land of which I am speaking must be restored. The "desolations of many generations must be repaired." The desolate must have many more children than the married wife. The Sarah—the free covenant must be more prolific than the Hagar or bond-woman covenant. Isa. liv.; Gal. iv. Jerusalem must break forth on the right and on the left, and her seed shall inherit the Gentiles. The woman forsaken, grieved in spirit, and the wife of youth must be received back again. Isa. liv.

But O thou tost and tempest afflicted, sad and sore,
Thy Maker is thy husband he will afflict no more,
Forget thy father's house with all,
Nor more thy shame regret,
So shall thy Lord delight in thee,
Thou shalt be honored yet.
Instead of noble ancestry, thy sons shall princes be,
Thy kingdom universal, shall stretch from sea to sea,

Mr. Wilson thinks that the Anglo Saxons are the real descendants of the ten tribes of Israel. If this be true, then without controversy they are the elect power.

But there is a special prophecy which will apply no where else as to them; found in Rev. xii. 5: "And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron, and the child was caught up to God and his throne."

It has been taken for granted that this child was Jesus, but without reason or fitness. I will name one objection, others will appear presently. Jesus went to heaven when a man, and after the dragon had killed him; but this figurative child is caught away as soon as it is born, to save its life—for the purpose of maturing and educating it at court, that at the proper time it would be qualified for its mission to "rule all nations with a rodof iron."

By common consent, this woman is the church—not particularly the Jewish, but the church, and more properly the Christian church. "And she being with child, cried travailing in birth and pained to be delivered."

The church expected glory and pre-eminence at the first advent; but instead, disgrace and suffering; she was made a victim (as sheep among wolves.) She was hated and killed for many years. This was the period of her travailing. She expressed herself in the following language: "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth."

THE THING BORN.—"Like begets its like," an allegorical woman—an associated power—a community of common sentiment, will make an impression of its own ideas. These ideas will be good or bad, true or false, dignified or mean—according to the presiding genius. This woman is a symbol at once of greatness, goodness, glory, and the highest style of wisdom. She is clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars. Here is a divinely illuminated community, sublimely taught, crowned with light and truth, with all, hated and pursued by the dragon. So under the pressure of persecution, she is in pain and cries to God, and is delivered. A man child is born. A great, manly sentiment is born. "Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help." Dan. xi. Personal liberty, and religious toleration, was the thing designed and obtained. But like all innovations—was conceived secretly—nurtured cautiously, and matured slowly, but firmly, like Moses hid for a while till the fulness of time. This child was brought forth in the persecution and taken into divine care —(educated at court,) and came to maturity in the reformation. This thing was schooled in experience and matured by trials.

The reformation was a bold manly mission, divinely appointed and endowed. The instrumentality appropriate and efficient. The men of those times were intelligent and sturdy, as well as pious. They had devotion without ostentation, truth, simple and bold, without cumbrous ceremonies, and stripped of the trappings imposed by supperstition and hypocrisy; they stood forth in all the greatness of manly integrity, and gave their cause to the world and posterity upon its own merits. Ever since sensible men have espoused it.

The Anglo Saxons constitutionally and politically, represent the great reformation doctrines in religion and politics. In religion, "justification by faith," and the Scriptures the the only rule of faith and practice. Politically, "Liberty of person and conscience."

This sentiment formed the watch-word of millions in 1848, in the whole of Europe, when it had a free pass through courts and kingdoms in these words—terrible to kings; "Liberty, equality and fraternity." This sentiment, then, like a rod of iron shivered thrones and cowed kings, and for the time suspended all the institutions of the eastern hemisphere.

THE PURPOSES OF ITS BIRTH.—"Rule all nations with a rod of iron." This purpose was well nigh fulfilled in the events just referred to in the neutralizing of European institutions.

God favors the rise of kingdoms, with the purpose of getting some service out of them. They are all born to a mission, but all work sparingly, except when new and unused to power—"new brooms sweep clean." Jehu was death on the house of Ahab—but soon left off to work for God. The whole Jewish nation was appointed to privilege and power. They had all the means of leading the rest of the world and of universal usefulness—but forebore to work, when they became a prey to outsiders; they first weakened themselves by turning from God's worship to that of idols, and then were robbed by idolaters, and last of all, removed out of his sight.

The rod of iron must represent the sword. "To rule," is to subdue and break the nations. The nations so subjected, embrace all superstitious heathen and idolatrous powers who only reign or bear rule for mischief, and are "destroyers of the earth;" of whom it is written, "And shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." Rev. xi. 18. And by the way, this term "earth" is often applied particularly to Palestine, and more probably in this instance.

Political power must wield this rod, when God will be glorified, Jesus inauguarated into full power upon David's throne," and the church redeemed forever. Our blessed Lord teaches the same doctrine in the following: "He will send forth his angels and gather out of his kingdom, all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire. etc....Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Matt. xiii. 41, 42. God's angels are not necessarily celestial beings, but whoever shall do his work. It is the privilege of some existing power to clear the site of Solomon's temple of its present incumbrance, and the whole territory must be purified of all idolatry, superstition and infidelity. "Gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." All these are judgments this side of (what is called) eternity.

"SERVE GOD JUST WHERE YOU ARE."

I was deeply interested in a short article in the Herald of Dec. 14, entitled, "Serve God just where you are," by Dr. Bushnell. Having been learning that lesson myself for many years, I would reiterate the sentiments contained therein.

It is profoundly true, and many learn it by sad experience. No doubt our heavenly Father places us in this life in just the circum stances best calculated to fit us for the next. He knows our besetting sins, and knows exactly what we need to purify us, and make us like Christ; and in wisdom and love he applies what may seem to us the rod of adversity, crosses and disappointments. Those of us who are parents, and who seek to train our children so that they may be subjects of God's kingdom, see the need of this.

And here I would say to young and inexperienced parents, if you would but do your work faithfully, there would be less for God to do; they would the more easily submit to his government.

It is oftentimes owing to the fact that a child's will is not broken that it is so hard for it to submit to God; and if I may use the expression, so hard for God to save it. First of all, let the will be broken; let the child see that you are firm, and that you are in earnest when you command; and that you expect to be obeyed. All is easy, if cheerful loving obedience is once secured. I have been led to suggest these thoughts to parents because I have often had occasion to see that the foundation was wrong, and when persons were brought to believe in Christ, the work of saving him in accordance with his word seems difficult, and for that reason many have endured for a time, and then gone back to the world in despair of ever arriving to the bible standard; whereas, if the will had been brought into subjection to the will of the parents in infancy, they would have found the yoke of Christ easy, and his burden light.

In a family where there are two or more children, we frequently see a vast difference in the disposition, temperament, &c.: each must be dealt with according to its peculiarities; thus our heavenly Father deals with us; we each need different treatment, and if we see that the circumstances in which he has seen fit to place us, differ from many others whom we see around us, we may be sure there is something in our case that requires it, and we should submit to the wisdom of the great Physician.

How lamentable, how deplorable it is, that those who profess to be learners in the school of Christ should so chafe and writhe at what he sees to be the best condition in which to try us and fit us to be living stones in the great temple which he would have us help adorn and beautify.

Let those of us who have the pure gospel, of all others, see to it that we are cheerful and happy with any lot that may be assigned to us. Let the thought that this is only a school, a trial state, reconcile us to any situation, inasmuch as it is, no doubt, the very best for us, and possibly the only one in which we could be purified and made fit for that great family of holy ones which our heavenly Father is preparing, if by any means we may attain to it. When we realize that God is taking here one and there another to bring to Mount Zion, oh, let us not resist the merciful hand that would lead us, but thank and praise his name continually that there is a hope held out to us, and that we may at last be deemed worthy of having not only a place in that family and kingdom, but of having an abundant entrance therein.

We need the inspiration of this hope day by day. Were it true that Christ was formed in us the hope of glory, how different would be the state of things even among those of whom we expect better things. This separation of husbands and wives, breaking up of families, alienation among the professed followers of Christ, and among those, too, who profess to have the truth in its purity, as they suppose; and above all, the lack of selfdenial manifested in the cause of spreading the truth, and thus glorifying its great Author, is to be attributed to the fact that this hope does not have sufficient weight with us, or that ours is not the gospel hope. Let us examine ourselves, and find where the great difficulty lies, and have it rooted out.

"I slept and dreamed that life was beauty;
I woke and found that life was duty."

[The following, written we presume by Prof. HUDSON, we take from the Crisis. It is a very pleasant take off of the fancy notion about the New Jerusalem and its mansions. It is a wonder to us how men of sense can be duped into the belief of such fancies: but so it is, and we suppose it will continue to be till reason and common sense shall take the place of a diseased imagination.—EDITOR.]

"SKY KINGDOM."

Since my last criticism upon Mr. Thurman's book I have matured nothing of importance respecting it. My queries about this, that, and the other point have not ripened for pen work. But there is a passage in page 219 which tempts me "from grave to gay," and I will indulge the pleasant humor.

A calculation is made respecting the number of mansions which the New Jerusalem might furnish according to the account of its dimensions as given in the received text of Rev. xxi. 16, which makes the length, breadth and heigth of the city twelve thousand furlongs each. Says Mr. T.: "If, leaving one half for those golden streets, which are as 'transparent as glass,' we divide the remaining portion of the city into rooms 16 feet square, and the same in height, it would contain 68,643,687,500,000,000 rooms; therefore our Lord could well say: 'In my Father's house are many mansions.'" He adds an estimate of 288,144,000,000 for all the people who have ever lived on earth, and finds that the unoccupied rooms would immensely out number the inhabitants of the world for 6000 years.

I do not quarrel with those figures. They are fairly done, and fairly deduced from King James' English of the divine word. Yet they give rise to curious thoughts and speculations. I am no rationalist. But if the city is not actually divided into so many rooms, which Mr. T. does not say and probably does not believe, still one will ask what can be the use of so much spare room if the city is really built so high.

He who makes a supposition is like one who takes a seat in an English or French railway car. One can not leave the train at pleasure, but stands committed—or sits "committed"—to go as far as the ticket will carry. So any supposition is open to be tried by any deduction that can be made from it.

Thus, for a petty criticism, I find that half of the city is allowed for streets, not a foot is allowed for stair-way. But no architect would think of a house even two stories high without a suitable flight of stairs. But here we are treated to buildings 495,000 stories high, and unless the higher rooms are left useless, their occupants must either stay in them, or reach the golden pavement as best they can.

Some one may say there is no need of stairs, for the saints will have wings like the angels, and they can fly up and down at pleasure. And some one may ask if there is not good Scripture for this. "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?"

Well, I have no antipathy against wings, but dearly love those pictures of cherubs with children's faces and heavenly plumage. Indeed, my happiest dreams are of flying. And if the wings are ever offered, I am the last that shall refuse them a fair trial.

But I have one misgiving. There can be no flying without air, any more than one can breathe without air. The best lungs and the best wings are equally useless beyond the limits of an atmosphere. And there is a pretty unanimous verdict among philosophers, specially including the astronomers, that our atmosphere is only about 45 miles high. If this is true, then either a new and large supply of air must be furnished with the descent of the city; or, the existing atmosphere must be heaped around it, leaving the rest of the globe uninhabitable; or, about 480,690 of the higher stories, in Mr. T.'s programme of the city, must be without the means either of flying or of breathing. They may not be "beyond the bounds of time and space." But they would be as inaccessible as that poetic region, so far as science now informs us; and they would be as comfortless if we could even reach them.

And even if all these difficulties are surmounted, and if we are introduced to those uppermost rooms by wings or by some other kind of flight, and there to breathe or not to breath, still the whole thing has an air of high speculation. I see little to choose between it and the "sky kingdom" to which the readers of the Crisis are so little partial. The highest clouds soar only to about one fifth the height of the atmosphere; its surface, then, is beyond "cloud-land" four times over; and the highest story, in the scheme under consideration, would be more than thirty times as far from terra firma as that.

There are still other difficulties which I will not urge. But so many and weighty are they all that they have led some good men to doubt if the Greek text was not at fault. Indeed, the very next verse speaks of the "wall" as measuring only 144 cubits, or something over 200 feet. This can not be the length of the wall. It is not said to be its thickness. The most natural question respecting the wall of a city is of its height. It is certainly no very rash conjecture of Granville Penn, when he thinks the true text would read thus: "And he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs; the length and the breadth of it are equal. And he measured the height of the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel." This reading, according to the present state of science,—which may hold good for spiritual bodies we know not how far,—would be both more human and more humane.

ASK GREAT THINGS.

To a friend asking aid, Alexande gave a blank order on his treasurer to be filled with any sum he might choose. The indigent philosopher immediately demanded ten thousand pounds. When the treasurer, who had refused to pay the sum, remonstrated with the king, Alexander replied: "Let the money be instantly paid. I am delighted with this philosopher's way of thinking. He has done me a signal honor; by the largeness of his request he shows the high idea he has conceived both of my superior wealth and my royal munificence." Is not the King of kings honored by large requests. Few seem to be aware how he is dishonored by their not rising to a [illegible] comprehensive and vigorous grasp of

BRIEF OF TITLE TO THE INHERITANCE.

OR, JEHOVAH'S PROMISE TO ABRAHAM.

BY JACOB GRIM.

In summing up our argument on the above subject, we would call the attention of our readers to a few facts; the first is, That the promises were made to Abram when he had no children; and yet he and his seed were promised an everlasting inheritance in this land. Paul says that "Abraham by faith sojourned in a strange land....with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. Through faith Sarah received strength ....to bear a child when past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised. Therefore there sprang even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude. These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off....confessed they were strangers and pilgrims in the earth." Heb. xi. 9–13.

Now, if Paul refers to the natural seed of Abraham, they did not all die in faith, looking for the promises; for thousands, according to Paul's own showing, had no faith, and did not find what they sought after, because they had no faith. Again Paul says in 17 v., "By faith Abraham offered up Isaac....of whom it was said, in Isaac shall thy seed be called; accounting that God was able to raise (the dead) him up (that is, Isaac) from whence also he received him in figure."

And in closing up this chapter, Paul remarks, "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith received not the promises," (the reason is, dead men, or men in the flesh are not in a condition to enjoy an everlasting inheritance), "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect."

Second, We argue that this promise was made to Abraham through an elect seed, and Abraham's natural seed were only the instruments through whom the true seed was to come. Proof. Jacob and Esau were both the natural seed of Abraham, and before the children were born, "and neither having done good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand." Now the purpose of God was to give Christ the inheritance, and Jacob was elected to carry out God's purpose, that through his family and not through Esau, Christ was to come; and so through Judah, instead of the other families of Israel.

Third, We have shown, through Moses, Jesus, and the Apostles, that the title to the above named land was never in Israel in the flesh, but was retained in the hands of Jehovah, and leased only to Israel until the true heir, Jesus, should come. Proof. Jesus in he parable of the kingdom being taken from them and given to another nation.

Fourth, In the sign of circumcision, which was given to Abraham, as a covenant that God would fulfil his promise, and give him a seed, of whom Paul speaks as being Christ, and which covenant Jehovah said was to be enjoined upon all his seed, in all their generations. Now we find a point at which the apostle says, If ye be circumcised Christ profiteth you nothing. The reason assigned is, "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth before you crucified?" Gal. iii. 1. We find the Apostle, to these same Galatians, saying, If ye be circumcised Christ profiteth you nothing. Why? I answer, The sign of circumcision was to be continued in all Abraham's generations until God's promise was fulfilled, and the seed had come. The seed having come, and having been set forth before them, the sign that pointed to it had ceased; or in other words, If you are continuing the sign you deny the seed, (Christ) and he profiteth you nothing; for you are, through your sign, looking for another seed, or another Christ; and that is the condition of all the Jews at the present day; but Paul teaches them that Christ has come, and had been set forth before them; and circumcision and Abraham's generations ceased; for circumcision was to continue with Abraham's generations; but circumcision, according to the Apostle, has ceased; hence Abraham's generations have ceased, and Christ's generation has commenced; and Jesus stands the New Man, at the head of a new race, in whom all the inheritance is invested; if ye be Christ's then, (and not without) are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise.

Fifth. If the promise was made to Abraham and his seed, (Christ) by faith, it does not belong to Israel in the flesh, or through the law. We have shown that it was given to Abraham by faith; and circumcision was only given as a sign, and not in any way as a covenant of the land. This led Paul to say, that if the inheritance is by the law, it was not of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. And we repeat, if it belongs to Israel as a nation, in the flesh, under the law, it does not belong to Christ and his seed by promise: but, Paul says, it was given to Abraham and his seed by promise; and hence, says the Apostle, Abraham and the faithful are waiting for it by the resurrection of the dead.

Sixth. We have no authority, that I can find, to offer life, or hope, in the future, to Jew or Gentile, except through faith in Jesus Christ; and as that is God's present method of justification, I have no authority to hold out any other hope to Israel, or any other individual. And as Life only in Christ, is the present method of salvation, I cannot see what benefit it can be to me, or the sons of Israel, to point them to a hope that does not concern any individual who is under the gospel dispensation; hence, my mission is to preach Christ, and him crucified, the only hope, of the present age.

Seventh. And now having, as we think, proved, from Abraham down to Christ, a clear title to the inheritance through a line that centered in Jesus Christ; we shall claim for our client the Inheritance, as belonging to him, and his seed; and we believe, that at the proper time God will file a bill of ejectment against those that killed his servants, stoned his prophets, and, last of all, killed the heir, and will miserably destroy them, and give the kingdom to Jesus and his people, who will bring forth the fruits thereof.

I now close by saying, that after reading all that has been written, on the opposite side, my judgment fails to be convinced; for in those arguments all the promises are taken made under the law, and the conditions, I think, lost sight of, and in order to harmonize many of the difficulties, a ruling nation or kingly dynasty has been established; but the fact is, that Abraham was to have the land for an everlasting possession; which can only be enjoyed by a resurrection from the dead. Again, this ruling nation does not agree with the promise: "Thus saith Jehovah, Behold I will bring again the captives of Jacob's tent, ...And from them shall proceed thanksgiving....their children also shall be as formerly ....And their shall be of nobles themselves, and their governor shall proceed from the midst of them." Jer. xxx. 18—21. Now, this is not in harmony with the doctrine that out of the gentiles, is to be taken a people to be rulers, and Israel in the flesh are only to be servants in the land. We believe that our Ruler will be the man Christ Jesus, exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, and the Inheritor of God's promise to Abraham, with all the redeemed of all nations.

THE GLORY OF THE LATTER DAYS.

"Which in his times shall he shew who is the blessed Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords."—PAUL.

Kingdoms and Republics are liable, (as they ever have been inclined in practice,) to look to their own ways and to follow the policy of pride and interest. This, the Lord of kings will not tolerate forever. It is a pity they had not preferred the advice of a good prophet to a profane king, many years ago. It is this: "Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by showing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquility." Dan. iv. 27.

Inaugurated power or instituted authority, is a legitimate and essential condition for the people. The masses could not trust themselves without them. They expect to be ruled—they would not know what to do, left to themselves.

But while kings and cabinets are providentially instituted, and appointed to power, they ought to remember they are subordinates. There is a great "Lord of kings" that expects them to do his will. Like Cyrus, of whom it was written, "He shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem: Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid." Powers so appointed shall have plain indications under the divine rule—of their duty both in time and measure. In this we may be confident. God has his men—the kingdom, the time, the opportunity, the will, and the omnipotence. He is willing that men of power and kingdoms should work for him of choice, but work for him they must either from choice or constraint. "He shall do my pleasure." "Kings shall be nursing fathers, and queens nursing mothers." Neither shall their work be hard. God says, "I will go before thee and make the crooked places straight, I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut assunder the bars of iron, that thou mayest know that I the Lord which call thee by thy name am the God of Israel." Isa. xlv. 2. Cyrus was named a hundred years before he was born. The favored power of which we will speak was named many centuries before it was brought into use. But more of opportunity.

THEY SHALL HAVE AUTHORITY.—"Listen, O, isles unto me; and hearken ye people from afar; the LORD hath called me from the womb; and he hath made my mouth like a sharp sword, in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me, and made me a polished shaft; in his quiver hath he hid me. Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified,....And he said, It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel." "Thus saith the LORD, In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in the day of salvation have I helped thee; and I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people, to establish the earth tocause to inherit the desolate heritages. That thou mayest say to the prisoners, go forth; to them that are in darkness, show yourselves....I will make all my mountains away, and my highways shall be exalted."

THEY SHALL HAVE SUCCESS.—"Shall the prey be taken from the mighty; or the lawful captive be delivered? But thus saith the LORD Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken away, and the prey of the terrible shall be delivered, for I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and I will save thy children, I will feed them that oppress thee, with their own flesh, and they shall be drunken with their own blood, as with sweet wine." Isa. xlix.

The Anglo Saxons have stood in the breach, when papacy, the hater of our holy religion, broke forth like a flood upon the remnant of the woman's seed, and have maintained, for the most part, a consistent attitude in dealing with this power—the exception has been lenency to it, which popery cannot bear. It always would and ever will abuse privilege. Like the serpent in the fable, when warmed by hospitality and rendered suple, will bite its benefactor to death.

The Anglo Saxon power is destined to take possession of Turkey, Syria, and Palestine. Other powers covet the distinction. Russia would like to fasten the Greek religion upon Palestine. France or Austria the Latin. Neither is better than Musulmism, in which of either event the desolation would be prolonged, and that sublime country ridiculed by their insufferable mummery and superstition. Russia cannot afford to fight for this distinction. France and Austria must fight each other, and be broken, and go into perdition. For them there is no glory but carnage. No distinction, but "double destruction." They have popery about their necks as a mill-stone that will drag with it into the pit, every thing that is in any way allied to it, either in faith or politics.

England may, if it will, be the second Cyrus. Some power will fill this place assigned in prophecy. That land of which I am speaking must be restored. The "desolations of many generations must be repaired." The desolate must have many more children than the married wife. The Sarah—the free covenant must be more prolific than the Hagar or bond-woman covenant. Isa. liv.; Gal. iv. Jerusalem must break forth on the right and on the left, and her seed shall inherit the Gentiles. The woman forsaken, grieved in spirit, and the wife of youth must be received back again. Isa. liv.

But O thou tost and tempest afflicted, sad and sore,
Thy Maker is thy husband he will afflict no more,
Forget thy father's house with all,
Nor more thy shame regret,
So shall thy Lord delight in thee,
Thou shalt be honored yet.
Instead of noble ancestry, thy sons shall princes be,
Thy kingdom universal, shall stretch from sea to sea,

Mr. Wilson thinks that the Anglo Saxons are the real descendants of the ten tribes of Israel. If this be true, then without controversy they are the elect power.

But there is a special prophecy which will apply no where else as to them; found in Rev. xii. 5: "And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron, and the child was caught up to God and his throne."

It has been taken for granted that this child was Jesus, but without reason or fitness. I will name one objection, others will appear presently. Jesus went to heaven when a man, and after the dragon had killed him; but this figurative child is caught away as soon as it is born, to save its life—for the purpose of maturing and educating it at court, that at the proper time it would be qualified for its mission to "rule all nations with a rodof iron."

By common consent, this woman is the church—not particularly the Jewish, but the church, and more properly the Christian church. "And she being with child, cried travailing in birth and pained to be delivered."

The church expected glory and pre-eminence at the first advent; but instead, disgrace and suffering; she was made a victim (as sheep among wolves.) She was hated and killed for many years. This was the period of her travailing. She expressed herself in the following language: "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth."

THE THING BORN.—"Like begets its like," an allegorical woman—an associated power—a community of common sentiment, will make an impression of its own ideas. These ideas will be good or bad, true or false, dignified or mean—according to the presiding genius. This woman is a symbol at once of greatness, goodness, glory, and the highest style of wisdom. She is clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars. Here is a divinely illuminated community, sublimely taught, crowned with light and truth, with all, hated and pursued by the dragon. So under the pressure of persecution, she is in pain and cries to God, and is delivered. A man child is born. A great, manly sentiment is born. "Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help." Dan. xi. Personal liberty, and religious toleration, was the thing designed and obtained. But like all innovations—was conceived secretly—nurtured cautiously, and matured slowly, but firmly, like Moses hid for a while till the fulness of time. This child was brought forth in the persecution and taken into divine care —(educated at court,) and came to maturity in the reformation. This thing was schooled in experience and matured by trials.

The reformation was a bold manly mission, divinely appointed and endowed. The instrumentality appropriate and efficient. The men of those times were intelligent and sturdy, as well as pious. They had devotion without ostentation, truth, simple and bold, without cumbrous ceremonies, and stripped of the trappings imposed by supperstition and hypocrisy; they stood forth in all the greatness of manly integrity, and gave their cause to the world and posterity upon its own merits. Ever since sensible men have espoused it.

The Anglo Saxons constitutionally and politically, represent the great reformation doctrines in religion and politics. In religion, "justification by faith," and the Scriptures the the only rule of faith and practice. Politically, "Liberty of person and conscience."

This sentiment formed the watch-word of millions in 1848, in the whole of Europe, when it had a free pass through courts and kingdoms in these words—terrible to kings; "Liberty, equality and fraternity." This sentiment, then, like a rod of iron shivered thrones and cowed kings, and for the time suspended all the institutions of the eastern hemisphere.

THE PURPOSES OF ITS BIRTH.—"Rule all nations with a rod of iron." This purpose was well nigh fulfilled in the events just referred to in the neutralizing of European institutions.

God favors the rise of kingdoms, with the purpose of getting some service out of them. They are all born to a mission, but all work sparingly, except when new and unused to power—"new brooms sweep clean." Jehu was death on the house of Ahab—but soon left off to work for God. The whole Jewish nation was appointed to privilege and power. They had all the means of leading the rest of the world and of universal usefulness—but forebore to work, when they became a prey to outsiders; they first weakened themselves by turning from God's worship to that of idols, and then were robbed by idolaters, and last of all, removed out of his sight.

The rod of iron must represent the sword. "To rule," is to subdue and break the nations. The nations so subjected, embrace all superstitious heathen and idolatrous powers who only reign or bear rule for mischief, and are "destroyers of the earth;" of whom it is written, "And shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." Rev. xi. 18. And by the way, this term "earth" is often applied particularly to Palestine, and more probably in this instance.

Political power must wield this rod, when God will be glorified, Jesus inauguarated into full power upon David's throne," and the church redeemed forever. Our blessed Lord teaches the same doctrine in the following: "He will send forth his angels and gather out of his kingdom, all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire. etc....Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Matt. xiii. 41, 42. God's angels are not necessarily celestial beings, but whoever shall do his work. It is the privilege of some existing power to clear the site of Solomon's temple of its present incumbrance, and the whole territory must be purified of all idolatry, superstition and infidelity. "Gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." All these are judgments this side of (what is called) eternity.

"SERVE GOD JUST WHERE YOU ARE."

I was deeply interested in a short article in the Herald of Dec. 14, entitled, "Serve God just where you are," by Dr. Bushnell. Having been learning that lesson myself for many years, I would reiterate the sentiments contained therein.

It is profoundly true, and many learn it by sad experience. No doubt our heavenly Father places us in this life in just the circum stances best calculated to fit us for the next. He knows our besetting sins, and knows exactly what we need to purify us, and make us like Christ; and in wisdom and love he applies what may seem to us the rod of adversity, crosses and disappointments. Those of us who are parents, and who seek to train our children so that they may be subjects of God's kingdom, see the need of this.

And here I would say to young and inexperienced parents, if you would but do your work faithfully, there would be less for God to do; they would the more easily submit to his government.

It is oftentimes owing to the fact that a child's will is not broken that it is so hard for it to submit to God; and if I may use the expression, so hard for God to save it. First of all, let the will be broken; let the child see that you are firm, and that you are in earnest when you command; and that you expect to be obeyed. All is easy, if cheerful loving obedience is once secured. I have been led to suggest these thoughts to parents because I have often had occasion to see that the foundation was wrong, and when persons were brought to believe in Christ, the work of saving him in accordance with his word seems difficult, and for that reason many have endured for a time, and then gone back to the world in despair of ever arriving to the bible standard; whereas, if the will had been brought into subjection to the will of the parents in infancy, they would have found the yoke of Christ easy, and his burden light.

In a family where there are two or more children, we frequently see a vast difference in the disposition, temperament, &c.: each must be dealt with according to its peculiarities; thus our heavenly Father deals with us; we each need different treatment, and if we see that the circumstances in which he has seen fit to place us, differ from many others whom we see around us, we may be sure there is something in our case that requires it, and we should submit to the wisdom of the great Physician.

How lamentable, how deplorable it is, that those who profess to be learners in the school of Christ should so chafe and writhe at what he sees to be the best condition in which to try us and fit us to be living stones in the great temple which he would have us help adorn and beautify.

Let those of us who have the pure gospel, of all others, see to it that we are cheerful and happy with any lot that may be assigned to us. Let the thought that this is only a school, a trial state, reconcile us to any situation, inasmuch as it is, no doubt, the very best for us, and possibly the only one in which we could be purified and made fit for that great family of holy ones which our heavenly Father is preparing, if by any means we may attain to it. When we realize that God is taking here one and there another to bring to Mount Zion, oh, let us not resist the merciful hand that would lead us, but thank and praise his name continually that there is a hope held out to us, and that we may at last be deemed worthy of having not only a place in that family and kingdom, but of having an abundant entrance therein.

We need the inspiration of this hope day by day. Were it true that Christ was formed in us the hope of glory, how different would be the state of things even among those of whom we expect better things. This separation of husbands and wives, breaking up of families, alienation among the professed followers of Christ, and among those, too, who profess to have the truth in its purity, as they suppose; and above all, the lack of selfdenial manifested in the cause of spreading the truth, and thus glorifying its great Author, is to be attributed to the fact that this hope does not have sufficient weight with us, or that ours is not the gospel hope. Let us examine ourselves, and find where the great difficulty lies, and have it rooted out.

"I slept and dreamed that life was beauty;
I woke and found that life was duty."

Boston, Dec. 26, 1864.

[The following, written we presume by Prof. HUDSON, we take from the Crisis. It is a very pleasant take off of the fancy notion about the New Jerusalem and its mansions. It is a wonder to us how men of sense can be duped into the belief of such fancies: but so it is, and we suppose it will continue to be till reason and common sense shall take the place of a diseased imagination.—EDITOR.]

"SKY KINGDOM."

Since my last criticism upon Mr. Thurman's book I have matured nothing of importance respecting it. My queries about this, that, and the other point have not ripened for pen work. But there is a passage in page 219 which tempts me "from grave to gay," and I will indulge the pleasant humor.

A calculation is made respecting the number of mansions which the New Jerusalem might furnish according to the account of its dimensions as given in the received text of Rev. xxi. 16, which makes the length, breadth and heigth of the city twelve thousand furlongs each. Says Mr. T.: "If, leaving one half for those golden streets, which are as 'transparent as glass,' we divide the remaining portion of the city into rooms 16 feet square, and the same in height, it would contain 68,643,687,500,000,000 rooms; therefore our Lord could well say: 'In my Father's house are many mansions.'" He adds an estimate of 288,144,000,000 for all the people who have ever lived on earth, and finds that the unoccupied rooms would immensely out number the inhabitants of the world for 6000 years.

I do not quarrel with those figures. They are fairly done, and fairly deduced from King James' English of the divine word. Yet they give rise to curious thoughts and speculations. I am no rationalist. But if the city is not actually divided into so many rooms, which Mr. T. does not say and probably does not believe, still one will ask what can be the use of so much spare room if the city is really built so high.

He who makes a supposition is like one who takes a seat in an English or French railway car. One can not leave the train at pleasure, but stands committed—or sits "committed"—to go as far as the ticket will carry. So any supposition is open to be tried by any deduction that can be made from it.

Thus, for a petty criticism, I find that half of the city is allowed for streets, not a foot is allowed for stair-way. But no architect would think of a house even two stories high without a suitable flight of stairs. But here we are treated to buildings 495,000 stories high, and unless the higher rooms are left useless, their occupants must either stay in them, or reach the golden pavement as best they can.

Some one may say there is no need of stairs, for the saints will have wings like the angels, and they can fly up and down at pleasure. And some one may ask if there is not good Scripture for this. "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?"

Well, I have no antipathy against wings, but dearly love those pictures of cherubs with children's faces and heavenly plumage. Indeed, my happiest dreams are of flying. And if the wings are ever offered, I am the last that shall refuse them a fair trial.

But I have one misgiving. There can be no flying without air, any more than one can breathe without air. The best lungs and the best wings are equally useless beyond the limits of an atmosphere. And there is a pretty unanimous verdict among philosophers, specially including the astronomers, that our atmosphere is only about 45 miles high. If this is true, then either a new and large supply of air must be furnished with the descent of the city; or, the existing atmosphere must be heaped around it, leaving the rest of the globe uninhabitable; or, about 480,690 of the higher stories, in Mr. T.'s programme of the city, must be without the means either of flying or of breathing. They may not be "beyond the bounds of time and space." But they would be as inaccessible as that poetic region, so far as science now informs us; and they would be as comfortless if we could even reach them.

And even if all these difficulties are surmounted, and if we are introduced to those uppermost rooms by wings or by some other kind of flight, and there to breathe or not to breath, still the whole thing has an air of high speculation. I see little to choose between it and the "sky kingdom" to which the readers of the Crisis are so little partial. The highest clouds soar only to about one fifth the height of the atmosphere; its surface, then, is beyond "cloud-land" four times over; and the highest story, in the scheme under consideration, would be more than thirty times as far from terra firma as that.

There are still other difficulties which I will not urge. But so many and weighty are they all that they have led some good men to doubt if the Greek text was not at fault. Indeed, the very next verse speaks of the "wall" as measuring only 144 cubits, or something over 200 feet. This can not be the length of the wall. It is not said to be its thickness. The most natural question respecting the wall of a city is of its height. It is certainly no very rash conjecture of Granville Penn, when he thinks the true text would read thus: "And he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs; the length and the breadth of it are equal. And he measured the height of the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel." This reading, according to the present state of science,—which may hold good for spiritual bodies we know not how far,—would be both more human and more humane.

ASK GREAT THINGS.

To a friend asking aid, Alexande gave a blank order on his treasurer to be filled with any sum he might choose. The indigent philosopher immediately demanded ten thousand pounds. When the treasurer, who had refused to pay the sum, remonstrated with the king, Alexander replied: "Let the money be instantly paid. I am delighted with this philosopher's way of thinking. He has done me a signal honor; by the largeness of his request he shows the high idea he has conceived both of my superior wealth and my royal munificence." Is not the King of kings honored by large requests. Few seem to be aware how he is dishonored by their not rising to a [illegible] [illegible]rehensive and vigorous grasp of faith. All need to be placed in a school where they shall go on from one grade to another in learning the proper scope of supplication and the fullness of God's promises.

What a slight is it upon God, who has exhaustless treasures in store for the Church and the world, who throws wide open the door and invites believers to become almoners to the largest amount, for them to look doubtingly on, and take hardly enough each for himself, when thousands might as well be filled! Thus are souls kept starving and Zion languishing. O needless famine! O fraudulent bankruptcy! We would be no longer content with moderate desires and requests. In view of the promises, we would stir up ourselves to a devout enterprise; would strike out upon this broad ocean and spread all sail. There is as much encouragement to seek at all. Has not past experience some times surprised us by the largeness of bestowment, and that, too, merely as an earnest of what God is ever ready to grant?—Thompson's Mercy Seat.

Useless and Causeless.

BUNKER HILL, ILL., }
Christmas Eve., 1864. }

BR. STORRS:—A writer in the Crisis says this war is "useless and causeless." To me it seems the hight of ignorance to talk or write in that manner. Useless? It is an educator to millions: it has opened a door to the poor slave "that no man can shut." Look here, in my little room: see that picture? that's what made me snatch up my pen.

There, in the bright, cheerful fire-light, from the glowing grate of blazing coal, sits our dear old grandmother in her "arm chair;" at her feet, on her knees, book in hand, learning her letters, is my "contraband" woman, her baby on the floor, crowing manfully, and showing his delight in the scene, baby fashion; and as grandma tells Nanny the letters, and she repeats them, my little two year old pet, with her flaxen curles, nestled up by Nanny's dusky face, arm around her neck, says them in her queer broken manner, all the sweeter for her manner of saying them. Friend Buckley, where is the proud, boastful Southron, that to-day could fine and imprison me for learning that kind, trusty, faithful woman, to read her Bible? This war "useless"? Once

"I stood a periled stranger,
Had a home."

Why is it not so now? Once for a trifle, that woman could be, and has been whipped on the bare back, until it is one callous of scars. My eyes will never again be pained with the sight of the "chain gang." Poor fellows, I have fed them with their hands manacled. My ears will never hear again the pitiful, but at the same time thankful, "God bless you, Missus." No, no, thank God, and our noble President, as God's servant, those days are in the past, and fast passing. Over the din of battle rises the song of liberty. The South have "sown to the wind," they are reaping the "whirlwind" of God's wrath; they have "defiled the temple of the Holy Ghost," for their own vile purposes, and forgot it reads, "him will God destroy." This war "causeless"! Does that man know his Bible? Has he read James' fifth chapter? If not, will he do it, and then tell me where it applies? Will he tell me how the light of God's word was to reach that great class of people? How could they be warned of the coming of Jesus? He is opening the way; are you ready to "go through the gates?" to "gather out the stones?" (that is, ignorance), to "lift up a standard for the people?" "Behold the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold thy salvation cometh." Will you go to that people? You never could before. They shall be called "the holy people"? and thou shalt be, "not forsaken." While we, in our short-sightedness, were talking about Jesus' coming to save us (Adventists) we overlooked, and many are still determined to overlook the fact that millions in our own land had not been, and could not be, warned of the Judgment's close approximation; as though it was like God to destroy without warning! May he open the blind eyes to see this is not a "useless, causeless" war.

RELIGIOUS SECTS.—According to the most accurate attainable figures, the proportions of the various sects in the empire are as follows: The sect of the Khlysts, who number about 11,000 neither receives sacraments nor acknowledges a clergy; and believes that every man can, by self-denial become a Christian. One branch of these, the Skoptses, mutilate themselves. The Bezpopovtshini, as their name implies, acknowledge no priest. They allow only civic managers. They are distributed, to the number of 2000, over the governments of Archangel, Olonetz, Novgorod, and Pskov. Another sect recognizes no political power. They are found, to the number of a million nearly, on the shores of the Volga and and its tributary the Oka. Of Armenians, about 500,000 are counted, for the most part in the Caucasus, and in the government of Ekaterinoslay. Of Roman Catholics, 2,800,000 are counted. The Protestants, who number 1,960,000 are found principally in the Baltic provinces. Of Israelites, there are counted 1,450,000 in the Western provinces; but they have been endeavoring to diffuse themselves over the whole empire since the publication of the edict which allows them to reside everywhere. Of Mohammedans, there are about 5,700,000 in the southern governments. Over the vast plains of Siberia, about 500,000 heathens are scattered. The votaries of the Orthodox Church may be reckoned at about fifty-five millions.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 4, 1864.

The Providence Gathering.

The friends of the doctrine of LIFE IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, desiring to awaken the public mind to the vast importance of the subject, have determined to hold a meeting in Providence for that object. Hence it behooves all who can conveniently attend from abroad to do so.

The meeting will be held in NORMAL HALL, opposite Roger Williams Hall, on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, January 12, 13, 14, 15. On Wednesday evening a prayer meeting will be held in Newmarket Hall to supplicate the Divine benediction on our efforts to honor his name in the spread of the truth as it is in Christ. On Thursday a conference meeting will be held in Normal Hall at 10 A. M. Preaching at 2 and 7½ P. M. The other meetings will then be arranged.

J. T. CURRY,
Secretary L. & A. U

Remarks on Revelation xiv. 6--11.

"And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water." V 6.

The phrase, "everlasting gospel occurs nowhere else in the bible. The term gospel, as all know, signifies "good news." The Book of Revelation is largely occupied by various symbols, indicating the persecuting powers that would trouble the true church of God. It presents a dark picture of Pagan, Mohomedan, and Papal desolation. But this long, dark night was to have an end—it was not to last always. The "everlasting good news" that the long apostacy is ended—the long dark night of anti-christian superstition, tyranny, and usurpation is passed, and the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ is approaching, was to be sounded by messengers that God should raise up, symbolized by an angel flying through the midst of heaven. Such messengers God did provide, in the beginning of the 16th century, in the persons of Luther, Malencthon, Zwingle, and a host of others, who went forth crying, "Fear God [they had feared the Pope.] and give glory to him [the Papacy had claimed and received the glory due to God alone:] for the hour of his judgment is come." Not the day of Judgment is come; but the period had arrived when God was about to inflict judgment on the "Man of Sin," by consuming him "with the spirit of his mouth," prior to his destroying him "by the brightness of his coming." Speaking of his times, Luther says, "The Lord had arisen to judge among the nations."

These messengers were commissioned to proclaim the everlasting good news to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. In the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries it was death to read the scriptures in the language of the people. [See, "Gaussen on the bible," p. 89.] Luther and his fellow-laborers undertook to give the bible to the people in their own tongue. This everlasting good news has been proclaiming from the days of Luther to the present hour; that angel's message still continues, but we are not to suppose that his message ends before the next begins.

Verse 8, "And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication." When Luther and the other Reformers commenced their work they had no idea of making war on the Papal Church—their object was reform. But in their labor they found that the Church was incurably corrupt, that she had truly fallen past hope of cure; hence they attacked her as "Babylon."

Luther, in writing to his friend Spalatin in the early part of his attack on the Papal Church, as Babylon, says, "I restrain myself out of regard to the Elector [of Saxony] and the University [over which Luther presided at Wittemburg]; I keep back many things which I would employ against Babylon if I were elsewhere." He adds, "It is not possible to speak the truth concerning scripture and the Church, without rousing the beast." The historian, in speaking of some of Luther's attacks, says, "The infatuation of his enemies favored him as much as his own courage. They contended with much warmth and passion for things which were at most but secondary and subordinate opinions; and Luther assailed the very foundations of the Romish doctrine, they saw them struck without uttering a word. They exerted themselves to defend some advanced outworks at the very time that their intrepid adversary was penetrating into the citadel, and planting there the standard of truth. Hence they were afterward much astonished to see the fortresses of which they had constituted themselves the defenders, undermined, on fire, and sinking in the midst of the flames."

In 1520, Luther writes thus, "The Romanists have raised three barriers against all reformation. When the temporal power has attacked them, they have denied its authority, and asserted that the spiritual power was superior to it. When any one rebuked them out of the scriptures, they have answered that no one but the Pope was able to interpret the scriptures. When they have been threatened with a council, the reply has been, no one but the Sovereign Pontiff has authority to convoke a council. They have thus wrested from our hands the three rods destined to correct them, and have given the rein to all evil. But now, God help us, and give us one of those trumpets that overthrew the walls of Jericho! With the breath of our lips let us throw down the paper walls which the Romanists have built around them, and lift up scourges that punish the wicked, by exposing the wiles and strategems of the devil."

Says the historian, "Luther then begins the assault. He shakes to its very foundation that papal monarchy which had for centuries past banded together the nations of the west under the scepter of the Roman bishop."

In 1520, also, appeared his tract on the "Babylonian Captivity of the Church." He says, "I know that Papacy is nothing but the reign of Babylon, and the violence of the mighty hunter, Nimrod." Again he says, "Christian people are the true people of God, carried away captive to Babylon, and there stripped of what they had acquired by their baptism." In writing to Pope Leo X., he says, "Not that I dream of effecting anything in this Babylon of confusion against the opposition of sycophants; but I am a debtor to my brethren, that if possible some of them may escape these terrible scourges. You know that Rome, for many years past, has inundated the world with everything destructive to soul and body. The Church of Rome, formerly pre-eminent for sanctity, is become a den of thieves, a scene of open prostitution, a kingdom of death and hell." He adds, "There is no hope for Rome; the anger of God has gone forth [the hour of his judgment is come] and will consume her. She hates reproof and dreads reform; she refuses to restrain the madness of her impiety; and it may be said of her as of her mother, 'We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed; let us forsake her.' [Babylon is fallen, is fallen.] Luther adds, "Rome deserves no other ruler than Satan himself. And truly it is he who reigns in that Babylon."

These are a few scraps from the history of the reformation, but they are sufficient to show that the prophecy found its mate, or fulfilment in the onward progress of that great work, which God has been effecting during the three past centuries.

Verses 9–11, "And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever; and they have no rest night nor day, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name."

Luther and the other reformers had no intention, at first, of separating from the Church of Rome; but at last they were not only separated from it, but such language as the following was used in regard to connection with that church: "Be on your guard," said Luther; "against the laws and statutes of the Pope. I have burned the decretals, [referring to his burning the Pope's Bull of excommunication, and the volumes of ecclesiastical decrees,] but that is mere child's play. It is time and more than time, that the Pope himself were burned—I mean," he immediately subjoined, "the Papal chair, with all its false doctrines, and all its abominations." Assuming a more solemn tone, he said, "If you do not with your whole hearts resist the impious usurpation of the pope, you can not be saved. Whosoever takes pleasure in the Popish doctrine and worship, will be lost to all eternity in the world to come." He added, "So long as my life shall last, I, for my part will never cease to warn my brethren of the wound and plague of Babylon, lest any of those who now walk with us should slide back like the rest into the pit of hell."

Thus again the prophecy finds its mate in history; and from the days of the Reformation downward, toward the present period, the "everlasting good news" of the "hour of God's judgment," on the persecuting powers, has had following in its train, the second and third angel's messages. In proclaiming these messages it may be truly said, as in the 12th verse; "Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." Yes, their patience, or perseverance, for so the word signifies, has been sorely tried in making a stand and proclaiming God's threatened judgments on the Man of Sin, or Babylon. Those who did this were those that kept the "commandments of God [not the decrees of the Pope;] and the faith of Jesus." "Faith in Christ," as the only way of salvation, was the grand doctrine that characterized the Reformation; and this was opposed to faith in the Pope, and his endless nonsense of trusting in works, penance, the Virgin Mary, dead saints, &c., &c.

In this great and glorious work, the Reformers and their successors were exposed to death from the "Italian Beast," or Babylonish "whore"—the Papal Church. To arm them for the war, they are told, verse 13, "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." The voice from heaven pronounced them blessed, even though they should die under the curse of Babylon. Nor was that all; their work, which they had commenced, should not stop if they did die by the wrath of Babylon. No, their works should follow them, or go forward to a consumation, even while they rested from their labor. This was indeed an encouraging consideration to the suffering Reformers; and it did encourage them. Said Luther on one occasion, "Papacy has ceased to be what it was once...Excommunicate me, and burn my writings it may; aye, and put me to death! but that which is now going forward it can never stop." No, for God had caused it to be proclaimed from heaven that, though they should die in their work, their works should go forward still. In that faith the Reformers went to their work and met death with triumph when called to it.

Papacy has struggled hard and long for its continued life, and its death effort to live is probably to be made in this country. It has clearly enough shown its hatred to our republican institutions, and is likely to make a dying struggle for power in our land. If another war, after the present slaveholders' war, is to be the fate of the United States, it will be a papal war for supremacy in this land; but if it begins it here, it will, most likely, be a short one; for the Anglo Saxons will not long endure its haughty persecuting spirit; and if it is once fully developed, as it seems likely to be, it will experience the full measure of the "third angel's" woe, denounced in verses 9–11 of this chapter. Let all beware of connection with that harlot power, lest these judgments, so solemnly proclaimed, be visited on them.

Who Believes It?

Believes what? That Christ will come in 1868. Is there any means by which we can tell? Let us see. If we understand the constitution of the human mind, it is philosophically true that whatever any man really believes, will produce a corresponding effect upon his life. No man can heartily believe any sentiment, especially of the character of the one under consideration, and remain unmoved by that belief. When that event, the coming of Christ, shall transpire, it concludes all matters connected with a mortal, corruptible state. When our Lord shall come, the destiny of Adam's race is unalterably fixed for an eternal condition. The consequence is, when we fully and rationally believe that Christ will come at a given point of time, all our calculations, both as respects things of this world, and that which is to come, will be arranged strictly in accordance with our faith, as to when our Lord shall come. This principle by an unalterable law of our nature, must always hold good. We have not a word to say at present, pro or con, with respect to whether Christ will come in 1868. We do not write for the purpose of discussing that question. We have no fault to find with any that are disposed to inquire "how long?" But we are opposed to the plan entered on by some, viz.: the advocating of any thing and every thing that may strike their fancy, without any regard to what will be the consequence to those who may be led honestly to indorse their positions.

Believing in definite time, in the past, has been a matter of great moment to some; and if we are to have another "time movement," let us be careful on what basis our time argument is builded. Now, for instance, if God requires faith in any calculation of the prophotic periods, that calculation must be so very simple that all the church may easily understand it. To suppose that God will require the church to exercise confidence in a proposition that can not be demonstrated only as we have a knowledge of the higher branches of mathematics, astronomy, etc., etc., is to charge God with an unjust act; for the majority of the church never have, and never can understand these things. It certainly can not be expected that the unlearned can be fully posted on questions where the most learned of all ages have always differed. I refer of course to the science named above. That God will lead the most illiterate in such a manner that they will be saved through the sanctifying power of truth, I have not the slightest doubt. But that God will learn men astronomy, I as yet have no evidence. Some men will say, "I believe," though they only know so much about what they believe as has been told them by some dear brother, in whom they have the utmost confidence; and that brother has read Mr. Thurman's or somebody else's chronology, and being wholly unable to do more, has simply adopted Mr. T's, or Mr. Somebody-else's premises, dates, calculations, etc., and concluded, either because he honestly thinks Mr. so and so is right, or to have a hand in making a "time movement go," that Christ will come at a given point of time.

I think we ought, while we duly reverence the opinions of all honest men, to come to the task, if task it is, of settling questions of this character for ourselves. It is a matter about which men, christians, should not be careless. If we deal carelessly with this question, we may put the day too far away; and be found off our watch. Events are being seen in all the world around that most emphatically determine our conclusions that the day of God is now just at hand; and I would not for my life put it off one year, one day, or one hour beyond God's appointed time.

I say again, let us be careful how we lead the lowest, trusting ones into unwarrantable conclusions. For ourselves, we shall expect all who teach the people that Christ will come in 1868, or at an earlier period of time, to live just as though they expected it at that time, or they will stand convicted in the judgment of all consistent men, of either folly or hypocrasy.

We come to this conclusion from the rule already laid down, as also from experiences of the past. We as a people have had two "time movements" in the past, and in both of them, I as an individual was most deeply and honestly interested. I can speak from experience when I say, we know just how men will act who believe definite time. It is true that in the past some preachers even did act as though they believed anything rather than what they preached. It is true that some of them, to my own knoledge, had on hand money to put on interest after the time passed; money too that they took from their brethren, who, more honest than themselves, were willing to risk all on what they really believed. But these men only proved themselves to be hypocrites; and their course is loathed by all honest men. It is best for us to put no trust in man, but go to the word of God for ourselves.

Our Lord is very soon coming; and those who are honest, consistent, Godly men, will be saved in a future life, though they may not be able to say any humanly devised "Shiboleth," either on time or any thing else. Amen.

God's Individual Plan.---No. 5.

Thus far in the treatment of our subject, we have assumed the mortality of the natural man; but the popular credence in that detestable figment—the immortality of the soul—disallows the omission of an argument for the true doctrine as to man's nature. And in the first place, we remark that the duality of man is a pure fable. We admit that he has a soul or spirit or mind which constitutes his essential identity, but we deny—now and forever—that this soul, or spirit, or mind is capable of a living existence apart from the body. We admit that it can be reproduced in a different organization, that its earthly house may be exchanged for a heavenly one, but this work is not of nature, but of God through his Spirit. Hence, those who are not made the subjects of Divine favor and connected with the spiritual Adam must perish in their own corruption. It is a fact worthy of notice that the texts of Scripture most frequently relied on by the advocates of natural immortality, refer only to Christians. To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise"—"To be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord"—"To depart, and to be with Christ"—if received as evidence of survivance after death would prove nothing concerning the natural man. If, through the Spirit in them, the righteous were carried directly to heaven at the expiration of their animal life, what would that avail in behalf of the survivance of the unspiritual? Nothing at all. In saying this, we do not allow that the righteous have a conscious existence between death and the resurrection, but we wish to point out the non-sequitur in which many indulge themselves when they make the case of the righteous an index of the wicked.

There are, and can be but three views of man's condition at creation: he was immortal—he had an undying nature; or he was mortal—he had a dying nature; or he was neither mortal nor immortal. The last named theory is hardly worthy of notice, seeing that it involves an impossibility. Every living thing must be subject to death, or not subject. We cannot conceive the existence of a person apart from one of these conditions.

The first-named opinion is equally untenable; for if man was created a deathless being, how could he become subject to death? But here we are met by the dogma that man is a dual being; that his body was created mortal, but the soul or mind was made immortal. In this way, the plain averments of the death of the whole man, so thickly strewed throughout the sacred writings, are evaded. Let us sift this pitiful expedicut in the seive of candor, and we shall discover that there is not an atom left.

"And YAHVEH God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it. And YAHVEH God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii. 5–17. That the death threatened was a literal one is proven by Paul's assertions in Rom. v. and 1 Cor. xv. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." "Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." No one will dispute the literality of the resurrection spoken of. But if the resurrection is literal, the death must be; and Paul alludes to the death which is the consequence of sin in our first parent.

One question will dispose of the soul's immortality. Who, or what did YAHVEH God address? Not the body of Adam, but the soul or mind. He spoke to the spirit of understanding which is in man. "Thou"—the thinking and intelligent man—"shalt surely die." Now if the part which received the command was immortal, it could not die, and the serpent was justified in his utterance—"Ye shall not surely die."

After the transgression, God said "unto Adam"—the thinking, intelligent Adam—"Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it....in the sweat of thy face (Whose face?) shalt thou"—the thinking being that received the command, and that hearkened unto the woman—"eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii. 17–19. Can any untrammeled mind believe that the soul, the mind, the thinking part, the part that heard the command, that was seduced by the voice of the woman, the part that sinned, was left unnoticed in the sentence? Must the unthinking body which was compelled by the thinking soul to take of the fruit—must that suffer the penalty, and the real culprit go unharmed? Perish such unmitigated nonsense! No one who has a proper reverence for God's word will indulge the belief that the mind is immortal, when its death is so clearly affirmed.

But still further: "And YAHVEH God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever; therefore YAHVEH God sent him forth from the garden of Eden." Vs. 22, 23. Here it is positively declared that God prevented the thinking man, the man that knew good and evil, from continuing his existence. Is it not making God a liar, to assert notwithstanding that the thinking, knowing part is immortal? How long, ye professors of godliness will ye stop your ears to the plainest dictates of reason?

Thus, we are compelled to believe that man was created a mortal, perishable being. God could preserve him in this dying state as long as it might please him, but as for man—corruption was an integral element of his nature. He was "dust," "of the earth, earthy," and naturally tended to the ground from whence he was taken. "The creation made subject to vanity"—frailty, corruptibility—"not willingly"—not of its own choice, man had nothing to say as to how he should be created—"by reason of him who hath subjected it, in hope that even the creation itself shall be freed from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God." Rom. viii. 20, 21. It was necessary that the probationary state should be a mortal one, so thath none should gain immortality in an unworthy character. The first Adam and all in him were therefore created in dust, but the second Adam was to bring in the spiritual, immortal, divine nature for all and unto all those who should be called according to the original purpose which was in Christ Jesus before the world began.

J. T. C.

Our Condition and its Opportunities.

"So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." Ps. xc, 12.

These words are a part of the "prayer of Moses, the man of God." He commences this psalm in making a comparison between the immortal God and mortal man. Of God he says: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God....For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night." Of man he says: "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of the ground. ....Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down and withereth."

Not only here, but throughout the sacred records, the corruptibility of man is taught, in distinction from the uncorruptibility of God. Why then is there so much prating of man's natural immortality among those who profess to take the Scriptures as their standard of truth? "Ah;" says some profound one, "Moses speaks of man's body, which is indeed corruptible, but man's soul is immortal." But unfortunately for this Platonic theory, Moses speaks of "man." Divide man into as many parts as you please, and label each part with the most approved appellation that heathen philosophy can invent, the inspired declaration included them all in the term "man." "Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of the ground." Man is a child of the ground, and to the ground he naturally tends. "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man"—formed of the dust of the ground—became a living soul." After the trial in the garden of Eden demonstrated man's weakness before the spiritual law, and the way of escape from his natural condition had been set forth in the promised seed, the Creator proceeds to pronounce the final sentence on the living soul which he had made. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Moses, doubtless, refers to this sentence in the words—"Return, ye children of the ground."

If man is immortal by nature, why is it not somewhere stated in the word? and why is the contrary so constantly affirmed? If man is a dual being, composed of an immortal soul and a mortal body, why is this not somewhere alluded to? and why is man treated as a unit when his perishability is spoken of? Is man mocked by the Almighty with a revelation which conceals the most important fact of all from him? Must the "poor" who "have the gospel preached unto them" at last fall back upon the speculations of men who "by wisdom knew not God?" And must we refuse to believe God's word because Plato and other heathen theorized on a merely human basis? Or, if we admit their doctrine had an origin not human, have we any where to go except to

"Th' infernal serpent, whose guile deceived
The mother of mankind?"

Because he said—"Ye shall not surely die," must we believe it? We ask these questions to assist any minds that may be exercised on the subject of man's nature. For ourselves, we should as readily deny the inspiration of the Scriptures, and toss them away as so much chaff, as to doubt that they teach the entire mortality of the entire natural man.

When we consider the subject from the Gospel observatory, we have yet more evidence in the same direction. The Apostle Paul declares that "Christ hath counter-worked death, and hath brought life and incorruption faith. All need to be placed in a school where they shall go on from one grade to another in learning the proper scope of supplication and the fullness of God's promises.

What a slight is it upon God, who has exhaustless treasures in store for the Church and the world, who throws wide open the door and invites believers to become almoners to the largest amount, for them to look doubtingly on, and take hardly enough each for himself, when thousands might as well be filled! Thus are souls kept starving and Zion languishing. O needless famine! O fraudulent bankruptcy! We would be no longer content with moderate desires and requests. In view of the promises, we would stir up ourselves to a devout enterprise; would strike out upon this broad ocean and spread all sail. There is as much encouragement to seek at all. Has not past experience some times surpriseed us by the largeness of bestowment, and that, too, merely as an earnest of what God is ever ready to grant?—Thompson's Mercy Seat.

BUNKER HILL, ILL,
Christmas Eve., 1864.

BR. STORRS:—A writer in the Crisis says this war is "useless and causeless." To me it seems the hight of ignorance to talk or write in that manner. Useless? It is an educator to millions: it has opened a door to the poor slave "that no man can shut." Look here, in my little room: see that picture? that's what made me snatch up my pen.

There, in the bright, cheerful fire-light, from the glowing grate of blazing coal, sits our dear old grandmother in her "arm chair;" at her feet, on her knees, book in hand, learning her letters, is my "contraband" woman, her baby on the floor, crowing manfully, and showing his delight in the scene, baby fashion; and as grandma tells Nanny the letters, and she repeats them, my little two year old pet, with her flaxen curles, nestled up by Nanny's dusky face, arm around her neck, says them in her queer broken manner, all the sweeter for her manner of saying them. Friend Buckley, where is the proud, boastful Southron, that to-day could fine and imprison me for learning that kind, trusty, faithful woman, to read her Bible? This war "useless"? Once

"I stood a periled stranger,

Why is it not so now? Once for a trifle, that woman could be, and has been whipped on the bare back, until it is one callous of scars. My eyes will never again be pained with the sight of the "chain gang." Poor fellows, I have fed them with their hands manacled. My ears will never hear again the pitiful, but at the same time thankful, "God bless you, Missus." No, no, thank God, and our noble President, as God's servant, those days are in the past, and fast passing. Over the din of battle rises the song of liberty. The South have "sown to the wind," they are reaping the "whirlwind" of God's wrath; they have "defiled the temple of the Holy Ghost," for their own vile purposes, and forgot it reads, "him will God destroy." This war "causeless"! Does that man know his Bible? Has he read James' fifth chapter? If not, will he do it, and then tell me where it applies? Will he tell me how the light of God's word was to reach that great class of people? How could they be warned of the coming of Jesus? He is opening the way; are you ready to "go through the gates?" to "gather out the stones?" (that is, ignorance), to "lift up a standard for the people?" "Behold the Lord hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold thy salvation cometh." Will you go to that people? You never could before. They shall be called "the holy people"? and thou shalt be, "not forsaken." While we, in our short-sightedness, were talking about Jesus' coming to save us (Adventists) we overlooked, and many are still determined to overlook the fact that millions in our own land had not been, and could not be, warned of the Judgment's close approximation; as though it was like God to destroy without warning! May he open the blind eyes to see this is not a "useless, causeless" war.

RELIGIOUS SECTS.—According to the most accurate attainable figures, the proportions of the various sects in the empire are as follows: The sect of the Khlysts, who number about 11,000 neither receives sacraments nor acknowledges a clergy; and believes that every man can, by self-denial become a Christian. One branch of these, the Skoptses, mutilate themselves. The Bezpopovtshini, as their name implies, acknowledge no priest. They allow only civic managers. They are distributed, to the number of 2000, over the governments of Archangel, Olonetz, Novgorod, and Pskov. Another sect recognizes no political power. They are found, to the number of a million nearly, on the shores of the Volga and and its tributary the Oka. Of Armenians, about 500,000 are counted, for the most part in the Caucasus, and in the government of Ekaterinoslay. Of Roman Catholics, 2,800,000 are counted. The Protestants, who number 1,960,000 are found principally in the Baltic provinces. Of Israelites, there are counted 1,450,000 in the Western provinces; but they have been endeavoring to diffuse themselves over the whole empire since the publication of the edict which allows them to reside everywhere. Of Mohammedans, there are about 5,700,000 in the southern governments. Over the vast plains of Siberia, about 500,000 heathens are scattered. The votaries of the Orthodox Church may be reckoned at about fifty-five millions.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 4, 1864.

The Providence Gathering.

The friends of the doctrine of LIFE IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, desiring to awaken the public mind to the vast importance of the subject, have determined to hold a meeting in Providence for that object. Hence it behooves all who can conveniently attend from abroad to do so.

The meeting will be held in NORMAL HALL, opposite Roger Williams Hall, on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, January 12, 13, 14, 15. On Wednesday evening a prayer meeting will be held in Newmarket Hall to supplicate the Divine benediction on our efforts to honor his name in the spread of the truth as it is in Christ. On Thursday a conference meeting will be held in Normal Hall at 10 A. M. Preaching at 2 and 7½ P. M. The other meetings will then be arranged.

"And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water." V 6.

The phrase, "everlasting gospel occurs nowhere else in the bible. The term gospel, as all know, signifies "good news." The Book of Revelation is largely occupied by various symbols, indicating the persecuting powers that would trouble the true church of God. It presents a dark picture of Pagan, Mohomedan, and Papal desolation. But this long, dark night was to have an end—it was not to last always. The "everlasting good news" that the long apostacy is ended—the long dark night of anti-christian superstition, tyranny, and usurpation is passed, and the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ is approaching, was to be sounded by messengers that God should raise up, symbolized by an angel flying through the midst of heaven. Such messengers God did provide, in the beginning of the 16th century, in the persons of Luther, Malencthon, Zwinglc, and a host of others, who went forth crying, "Fear God [they had feared the Pope.] and give glory to him [the Papacy had claimed and received the glory due to God alone:] for the hour of his judgment is come." Not the day of Judgment is come; but the period had arrived when God was about to inflict judgment on the "Man of Sin," by consuming him "with the spirit of his mouth," prior to his destroying him "by the brightness of his coming." Speaking of his times, Luther says, "The Lord had arisen to judge among the nations."

These messengers were commissioned to proclaim the everlasting good news to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. In the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries it was death to read the scriptures in the language of the people. [See, "Gaussen on the bible," p. 89.] Luther and his fellow-laborers undertook to give the bible to the people in their own tongue. This everlasting good news has been proclaiming from the days of Luther to the present hour; that angel's message still continues, but we are not to suppose that his message ends before the next begins.

Verse 8, "And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication." When Luther and the other Reformers commenced their work they had no idea of making war on the Papal Church—their object was reform. But in their labor they found that the Church was incurably corrupt, that she had truly fallen past hope of cure; hence they attacked her as "Babylon."

Luther, in writing to his friend Spalatin in the early part of his attack on the Papal Church, as Babylon, says, "I restrain myself out of regard to the Elector [of Saxony] and the University [over which Luther presided at Wittemburg]; I keep back many things which I would employ against Babylon if I were elsewhere." He adds, "It is not possible to speak the truth concerning scripture and the Church, without rousing the beast." The historian, in speaking of some of Luther's attacks, says, "The infatuation of his enemies favored him as much as his own courage. They contended with much warmth and passion for things which were at most but secondary and subordinate opinions; and Luther assailed the very foundations of the Romish doctrine, they saw them struck without uttering a word. They exerted themselves to defend some advanced outworks at the very time that their intrepid adversary was penetrating into the citadel, and planting there the standard of truth. Hence they were afterward much astonished to see the fortresses of which they had constituted themselves the defenders, undermined, on fire, and sinking in the midst of the flames."

In 1520, Luther writes thus, "The Romanists have raised three barriers against all reformation. When the temporal power has attacked them, they have denied its authority, and asserted that the spiritual power was superior to it. When any one rebuked them out of the scriptures, they have answered that no one but the Pope was able to interpret the scriptures. When they have been threatened with a council, the reply has been, no one but the Sovereign Pontiff has authority to convoke a council. They have thus wrested from our hands the three rods destined to correct them, and have given the rein to all evil. But now, God help us, and give us one of those trumpets that overthrew the walls of Jericho! With the breath of our lips let us throw down the paper walls which the Romanists have built around them, and lift up scourges that punish the wicked, by exposing the wiles and strategems of the devil."

Says the historian, "Luther then begins the assault. He shakes to its very foundation that papal monarchy which had for centuries past banded together the nations of the west under the scepter of the Roman bishop."

In 1520, also, appeared his tract on the "Babylonian Captivity of the Church." He says, "I know that Papacy is nothing but the reign of Babylon, and the violence of the mighty hunter, Nimrod." Again he says, "Christian people are the true people of God, carried away captive to Babylon, and there stripped of what they had acquired by their baptism." In writing to Pope Leo X., he says, "Not that I dream of effecting anything in this Babylon of confusion against the opposition of sycophants; but I am a debtor to my brethren, that if possible some of them may escape these terrible scourges. You know that Rome, for many years past, has inundated the world with everything destructive to soul and body. The Church of Rome, formerly pre-eminent for sanctity, is become a den of thieves, a scene of open prostitution, a kingdom of death and hell." He adds, "There is no hope for Rome; the anger of God has gone forth [the hour of his judgment is come] and will consume her. She hates reproof and dreads reform; she refuses to restrain the madness of her impiety; and it may be said of her as of her mother, 'We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed; let us forsake her.' [Babylon is fallen, is fallen.] Luther adds, "Rome deserves no other ruler than Satan himself. And truly it is he who reigns in that Babylon."

These are a few scraps from the history of the reformation, but they are sufficient to show that the prophecy found its mate, or fulfilment in the onward progress of that great work, which God has been effecting during the three past centuries.

Verses 9–11, "And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever; and they have no rest night nor day, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name."

Luther and the other reformers had no intention, at first, of separating from the Church of Rome; but at last they were not only separated from it, but such language as the following was used in regard to connection with that church: "Be on your guard," said Luther; "against the laws and statutes of the Pope. I have burned the decretals, [referring to his burning the Pope's Bull of excommunication, and the volumes of ecclesiastical decrees,] but that is mere child's play. It is time and more than time, that the Pope himself were burned—I mean," he immediately subjoined, "the Papal chair, with all its false doctrines, and all its abominations." Assuming a more solemn tone, he said, "If you do not with your whole hearts resist the impious usurpation of the pope, you can not be saved. Whosoever takes pleasure in the Popish doctrine and worship, will be lost to all eternity in the world to come." He added, "So long as my life shall last, I, for my part will never cease to warn my brethren of the wound and plague of Babylon, lest any of those who now walk with us should slide back like the rest into the pit of hell."

Thus again the prophecy finds its mate in history; and from the days of the Reformation downward, toward the present period, the "everlasting good news" of the "hour of God's judgment," on the persecuting powers, has had following in its train, the second and third angel's messages. In proclaiming these messages it may be truly said, as in the 12th verse; "Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." Yes, their patience, or perseverance, for so the word signifies, has been sorely tried in making a stand and proclaiming God's threatened judgments on the Man of Sin, or Babylon. Those who did this were those that kept the "commandments of God [not the decrees of the Pope;] and the faith of Jesus." "Faith in Christ," as the only way of salvation, was the grand doctrine that characterized the Reformation; and this was opposed to faith in the Pope, and his endless nonsense of trusting in works, penance, the Virgin Mary, dead saints, &c., &c.

In this great and glorious work, the Reformers and their successors were exposed to death from the "Italian Beast," or Babylonish "whore"—the Papal Church. To arm them for the war, they are told, verse 13, "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." The voice from heaven pronounced them blessed, even though they should die under the curse of Babylon. Nor was that all; their work, which they had commenced, should not stop if they did die by the wrath of Babylon. No, their works should follow them, or go forward to a consumation, even while they rested from their labor. This was indeed an encouraging consideration to the suffering Reformers; and it did encourage them. Said Luther on one occasion, "Papacy has ceased to be what it was once...Excommunicate me, and burn my writings it may; aye, and put me to death! but that which is now going forward it can never stop." No, for God had caused it to be proclaimed from heaven that, though they should die in their work, their works should go forward still. In that faith the Reformers went to their work and met death with triumph when called to it.

Papacy has struggled hard and long for its continued life, and its death effort to live is probably to be made in this country. It has clearly enough shown its hatred to our republican institutions, and is likely to make a dying struggle for power in our land. If another war, after the present slaveholders' war, is to be the fate of the United States, it will be a papal war for supremacy in this land; but if it begins it here, it will, most likely, be a short one; for the Anglo Saxons will not long endure its haughty persecuting spirit; and if it is once fully developed, as it seems likely to be, it will experience the full measure of the "third angel's" woe, denounced in verses 9–11 of this chapter. Let all beware of connection with that harlot power, lest these judgments, so solemnly proclaimed, be visited on them.

Who Believes It?

Believes what? That Christ will come in 1868. Is there any means by which we can tell? Let us see. If we understand the constitution of the human mind, it is philosophically true that whatever any man really believes, will produce a corresponding effect upon his life. No man can heartily believe any sentiment, especially of the character of the one under consideration, and remain unmoved by that belief. When that event, the coming of Christ, shall transpire, it concludes all matters connected with a mortal, corruptible state. When our Lord shall come, the destiny of Adam's race is unalterably fixed for an eternal condition. The consequence is, when we fully and rationally believe that Christ will come at a given point of time, all our calculations, both as respects things of this world, and that which is to come, will be arranged strictly in accordance with our faith, as to when our Lord shall come. This principle by an unalterable law of our nature, must always hold good. We have not a word to say at present, pro or con, with respect to whether Christ will come in 1868. We do not write for the purpose of discussing that question. We have no fault to find with any that are disposed to inquire "how long?" But we are opposed to the plan entered on by some, viz.: the advocating of any thing and every thing that may strike their fancy, without any regard to what will be the consequence to those who may be led honestly to indorse their positions.

Believing in definite time, in the past, has been a matter of great moment to some; and if we are to have another "time movement," let us be careful on what basis our time argument is builded. Now, for instance, if God requires faith in any calculation of the prophetic periods, that calculation must be so very simple that all the church may easily understand it. To suppose that God will require the church to exercise confidence in a proposition that can not be demonstrated only as we have a knowledge of the higher branches of mathematics, astronomy, etc., etc., is to charge God with an unjust act; for the majority of the church never have, and never can understand these things. It certainly can not be expected that the unlearned can be fully posted on questions where the most learned of all ages have always differed. I refer of course to the science named above. That God will lead the most illiterate in such a manner that they will be saved through the sanctifying power of truth, I have not the slightest doubt. But that God will learn men astronomy, I as yet have no evidence. But men will say, "I believe," though they only know so much about what they believe as has been told them by some dear brother, in whom they have the utmost confidence; and that brother has read Mr. Thurman's or somebody else's chronology, and being wholly unable to do more, has simply adopted Mr. T's, or Mr. Somebody-else's premises, dates, calculations, etc., and concluded, either because he honestly thinks Mr. so and so is right, or to have a hand in making a "time movement go," that Christ will come at a given point of time.

I think we ought, while we duly reverence the opinions of all honest men, to come to the task, if task it is, of settling questions of this character for ourselves. It is a matter about which men, christians, should not be careless. If we deal carelessly with this question, we may put the day too far away; and be found off our watch. Events are being seen in all the world around that most emphatically determine our conclusions that the day of God is now just at hand; and I would not for my life put it off one year, one day, or one hour beyond God's appointed time.

I say again, let us be careful how we lead the lowest, trusting ones into unwarantable conclusions. For ourselves, we shall expect all who teach the people that Christ will come in 1868, or at an earlier period of time, to live just as though they expected it at that time, or they will stand convicted in the judgment of all consistent men, of either folly or hypocracy.

We come to this conclusion from the rule already laid down, as also from experiences of the past. We as a people have had two "time movements" in the past, and in both of them, I as an individual was most deeply and honestly interested. I can speak from experience when I say, we know just how men will act who believe definite time. It is true that in the past some preachers even did act as though they believed anything rather than what they preached. It is true that some of them, to my own knoledge, had on hand money to put on interest after the time passed; money too that they took from their brethren, who, more honest than themselves, were willing to risk all on what they really believed. But these men only proved themselves to be hypocrites; and their course is loathed by all honest men. It is best for us to put no trust in man, but go to the word of God for ourselves.

Our Lord is very soon coming; and those who are honest, consistent, Godly men, will be saved in a future life, though they may not be able to say any humanly devised "Shiboleth," either on time or any thing else. Amen.

God's Individual Plan.---No. 5.

Thus far in the treatment of our subject, we have assumed the mortality of the natural man; but the popular credence in that detestable figment—the immortality of the soul—disallows the omission of an argument for the true doctrine as to man's nature. And in the first place, we remark that the duality of man is a pure fable. We admit that he has a soul or spirit or mind which constitutes his essential identity, but we deny—now and forever—that this soul, or spirit, or mind is capable of a living existence apart from the body. We admit that it can be reproduced in a different organization, that its earthly house may be exchanged for a heavenly one, but this work is not of nature, but of God through his Spirit. Hence, those who are not made the subjects of Divine favor and connected with the spiritual Adam must perish in their own corruption. It is a fact worthy of notice that the texts of Scripture most frequently relied on by the advocates of natural immortality, refer only to Christians. To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise"—"To be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord"—"To depart, and to be with Christ"—if received as evidence of survivance after death would prove nothing concerning the natural man. If, through the Spirit in them, the righteous were carried directly to heaven at the expiration of their animal life, what would that avail in behalf of the survivance of the unspiritual? Nothing at all. In saying this, we do not allow that the righteous have a conscious existence between death and the resurrection, but we wish to point out the non-sequitur in which many indulge themselves when they make the case of the righteous an index of the wicked.

There are, and can be but three views of man's condition at creation: he was immortal—he had an undying nature; or he was mortal—he had a dying nature; or he was neither mortal nor immortal. The last named theory is hardly worthy of notice, seeing that it involves an impossibility. Every living thing must be subject to death, or not subject. We cannot conceive the existence of a person apart from one of these conditions.

The first-named opinion is equally untenable; for if man was created a deathless being, how could he become subject to death? But here we are met by the dogma that man is a dual being; that his body was created mortal, but the soul or mind was made immortal. In this way, the plain averments of the death of the whole man, so thickly strewed throughout the sacred writings, are evaded. Let us sift this pitiful expedient in the seive of candor, and we shall discover that there is not an atom left.

"And YAHVEH God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it. And YAHVEH God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii. 5–17. That the death threatened was a literal one is proven by Paul's assertions in Rom. v. and 1 Cor. xv. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." "Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." No one will dispute the literality of the resurrection spoken of. But if the resurrection is literal, the death must be; and Paul alludes to the death which is the consequence of sin in our first parent.

One question will dispose of the soul's immortality. Who, or what did YAHVEH God address? Not the body of Adam, but the soul or mind. He spoke to the spirit of understanding which is in man. "Thou"—the thinking and intelligent man—"shalt surely die." Now if the part which received the command was immortal, it could not die, and the serpent was justified in his utterance—"Ye shall not surely die."

After the transgression, God said "unto Adam"—the thinking, intelligent Adam—"Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it....in the sweat of thy face (Whose face?) shalt thou"—the thinking being that received the command, and that hearkened unto the woman—"eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii. 17–19. Can any untrammeled mind believe that the soul, the mind, the thinking part, the part that heard the command, that was seduced by the voice of the woman, the part that sinned, was left unnoticed in the sentence? Must the unthinking body which was compelled by the thinking soul to take of the fruit—must that suffer the penalty, and the real culprit go unharmed? Perish such unmitigated nonsense! No one who has a proper reverence for God's word will indulge the belief that the mind is immortal, when its death is so clearly affirmed.

But still further: "And YAHVEH God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever; therefore YAHVEH God sent him forth from the garden of Eden." Vs. 22, 23. Here it is positively declared that God prevented the thinking man, the man that knew good and evil, from continuing his existence. Is it not making God a liar, to assert notwithstanding that the thinking, knowing part is immortal? How long, ye professors of godliness will ye stop your ears to the plainest dictates of reason?

Thus, we are compelled to believe that man was created a mortal, perishable being. God could preserve him in this dying state as long as it might please him, but as for man—corruption was an integral element of his nature. He was "dust," "of the earth, earthy," and naturally tended to the ground from whence he was taken. "The creation made subject to vanity"—frailty, corruptibility—"not willingly"—not of its own choice, man had nothing to say as to how he should be created—"by reason of him who hath subjected it, in hope that even the creation itself shall be freed from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God." Rom. viii. 20, 21. It was necessary that the probationary state should be a mortal one, so thath none should gain immortality in an unworthy character. The first Adam and all in him were therefore created in dust, but the second Adam was to bring in the spiritual, immortal, divine nature for all and unto all those who should be called according to the original purpose which was in Christ Jesus before the world began.

Our Condition and its Opportunities.

"So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." Ps. xc, 12.

These words are a part of the "prayer of Moses, the man of God." He commences this psalm in making a comparison between the immortal God and mortal man. Of God he says: "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God....For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night." Of man he says: "Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of the ground. ....Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass, which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down and withereth."

Not only here, but throughout the sacred records, the corruptibility of man is taught, in distinction from the uncorruptibility of God. Why then is there so much prating of man's natural immortality among those who profess to take the Scriptures as their standard of truth? "Ah;" says some profound one, "Moses speaks of man's body, which is indeed corruptible, but man's soul is immortal." But unfortunately for this Platonic theory, Moses speaks of "man." Divide man into as many parts as you please, and label each part with the most approved appellation that heathen philosophy can invent, the inspired declaration included them all in the term "man." "Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of the ground." Man is a child of the ground, and to the ground he naturally tends. "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man"—formed of the dust of the ground—became a living soul." After the trial in the garden of Eden demonstrated man's weakness before the spiritual law, and the way of escape from his natural condition had been set forth in the promised seed, the Creator proceeds to pronounce the final sentence on the living soul which he had made. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Moses, doubtless, refers to this sentence in the words—"Return, ye children of the ground."

If man is immortal by nature, why is it not somewhere stated in the word? and why is the contrary so constantly affirmed? If man is a dual being, composed of an immortal soul and a mortal body, why is this not somewhere alluded to? and why is man treated as a unit when his perishability is spoken of? Is man mocked by the Almighty with a revelation which conceals the most important fact of all from him? Must the "poor" who "have the gospel preached unto them" at last fall back upon the speculations of men who "by wisdom knew not God?" And must we refuse to believe God's word because Plato and other heathen theorized on a merely human basis? Or, if we admit their doctrine had an origin not human, have we any where to go except to

The mother of mankind?"

Because he said—"Ye shall not surely die," must we believe it? We ask these questions to assist any minds that may be exercised on the subject of man's nature. For ourselves, we should as readily deny the inspiration of the Scriptures, and toss them away as so much chaff, as to doubt that they teach the entire mortality of the entire natural man.

When we consider the subject from the Gospel observatory, we have yet more evidence in the same direction. The Apostle Paul declares that "Christ hath counter-worked death, and hath brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. 1 10. But how could he bring life and immortality to light, if heathen wisdom had affirmed it for ages previous? Some will say that Christ made that certain which before had been seen "through a glass, darkly." But how could he confirm the immortality of the soul without mentioning it? Where does he use the phrase "immortal soul," or any other of like character? On the contrary, he expressly alludes to the perishing condition of the world, and offers himself as its Saviour and LIFE-GIVER, affirming his power and willingness to give everlasting life to all that will come to him for it, and promising to give it them at the resurrection in the last day. After teaching thus, he illustrates the plan of salvation by his death and resurrection, showing his followers that they are to attain immortality, not by the flight to heaven of an immortal soul at death, but by the resurrection of the entire man from the sheol of the Old Testament—the hades of the New.

Man being perishable, he should let the fact have its due influence on him. He should number his days, he should consider their fewness, that at the most favorable computation the days of his years are but threescore years and ten; and if on account of an uncommon constitutional strength they are fourscore years or more, yet is their strength labor and sorrow: for it is soon cut off, and we vanish from among the living. But evanescent as our life is, its improvement is of the greatest consequence. Our mortal existence, if we will so have it, shall prepare us for an immortal one. To all who patiently continue in well doing, God will render according to their deeds—eternal life. Rom. ii. 6, 7. In view of the brevity of life, and the great opportunity set before him, should he not, with utmost sincerity and fervor offer the prayer in our text? "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

The wisdom of this world is vain, and delusive. In the spring-time of life, it appears in golden hue, beckoning the youthful aspirant on to honor, fame, and happiness. But those who have followed after it with the most persevering tread, and have been crowned with its greenest chaplets, have been forced to acknowledge its insufficiency. "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain." "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness." "Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise."

The true wisdom is obtained by the humble. The proud, the haughty, the self-sufficient must always be ignorant. Whatever may be their apparent attainments, however gaudy and glittering their surface appearance, within is emptiness and poverty of spirit. The Christ of God proclaimed himself as "meek and lowly in heart," and it is only by learning of him that the same meekness and lowliness is acquired, and the wisdom of God discovered.

"Low down in that beautiful valley,
Where love crowns the meek and the lowly,
Where loud storms of anger and folly
Shall roll on their billows in vain.
O there, there the Lord will deliver,
And saints drink of that beautiful river,
Which flows peace for ever and ever,
Where love and joy shall ever increase."

With the beginning of the new year, we are reminded of the flight of time. It seems but yesterday since 1864 was ushered in by its predecessor. Where are our departed hours? "With the years beyond the flood." Truly, we spend our years as a tale that is told. But how have we used the last year-fragment of our life? Have we drawn nearer to God? Have we become more susceptive of the suggestions of his Holy Spirit? Have we been entirely honest with God? Have our purposes been formed and executed in the unrefracted light of his love? And if we have loved him that begat, have we also loved them that are begotten of him? Have we acted justly and lovingly toward our brethren in Christ? Have we shown a willingness to sacrifice our own inclinations for the good of all? or have we been obstinate and stiff-necked, careless of the rights of Christ's body, and determined to justify ourselves in palpable wrong, rather than confess our faults, and find the reward in God's favor? We know some who make great avowals of their love for the truth, who have shown a most grievous selfishness in their treatment of Christ's flock, and to this day continue a career that is unworthy their profession, insulting to God, and a cause of stumbling to them that are without. May God in his mercy forgive, and arrest them while there is hope!

But we thank God that his judgment is individual. To his own Master each one standeth or falleth. Hence each one must look to himself. If we are enabled to see our failures in the past year, let us be stirred up to begin this new year with a new consecration to God. As we number our days, let us with fresh zeal and renewed purpose apply our hearts unto wisdom.

"Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

The Celesta Fanaticism.

Not long since a dear Br. in Christ and subscriber to the "Herald," asked by letter, our opinion of Celesta, saying, he was "at times tempted to go to Celesta with Armstrong and retire from the world." We are glad that our Editor has raised his voice against this "Fanaticism" in season we trust, and in such a manner as to entirely dissuade him from such a course. And we are prompted to take this public manner of endorsing the remarks over Mr. Smith's letter that it may be seen there is one more who would deprecate any brother's going to Celesta.

We would offer a reason:—1st. The scriptures no where warrant God's people in secluding themselves from the world, not even in the past, much less now when the gospel is to be proclaimed among all peoples; and after our Lord said, "Let your light so shine before men (of the world) that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Matt. v. 16. When the saints are done witnessing for Jesus he will provide for their gathering: having said, "And he (the Son of man) shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other"; Matt. xxiv. 31; and he will not let his words fall to the ground. Bless his name.

2d. There is no warrant in the scriptures for any Communism. Even that which followed the day of Pentecost, though recognized of the Spirit, was not ordained of God and ended with the persecutions against the church; and all attempts since seem not to have benefitted mankind; being a burden to the well-disposed and industrious and a home for the lazy and effeminate who deserve no home at all.

The Communism of the Bible is "work with your own hands"—"distribute to the necessity of saints"—and "have fellowship one with another" in Christ Jesus. E. W.

The Quarterly Conference.

It is now well understood by our brethren that our next meeting will be held at Providence, R. I., Jan. 11, 1865. If any need farther information, we would remark that the meeting will last over the Sabbath, (15th) and will be free, as a conference of believers in the second advent of Christ. There will be preaching on the theme of "Life only in Christ," the second advent, and holiness; with conference and prayer meetings intermixed, as is usual at such meetings. And we expect the spirit of the gospel will prevail.

The brethren at Providence, who are well known in their efforts for the cause, and who dearly love the doctrines which are advocated by the Herald, and who strive as much as in them lieth to promote the general objects of the Union, send out a free and hearty invitation to the friends of the cause, and of Christ, to come together and enjoy this second quarterly meeting of the Union, and partake of its benefits.

There is not a company of brethren to be found who are more hearty in the work; but they are limited in numbers; which fact might deter some from coming; it need not, however; for they will make ample room for those who come. Come one, and all.

I have had the pleasure of laboring some in that city recently, as well as heretofore, and know whereof I affirm. They are expecting to obtain the large centrally located Hall, known as "Normal Hall;" which is much to be prefered to New Market Hall, where we now worship. We expect a large and powerful meeting. One which shall build up the people of the truth in the most holy faith of the gospel; which shall convert many of those to the light, who have not seen the full and perfect harmony of the Bible on mortality and we expect that sinners will be brought to the knowledge of God.

The blessed Conference which we had at Kast Hall, Boston, in October, is in its divine influence, fresh in the minds of those who attended. We well remember the services and the great resemblance to the past days of Advent Conferences. How really good, old-fashioned, and heavenly it was to find the spirit and soul of truth in a meeting of those who came out to wait and watch for the Prince of Life till he comes to give immortality to those who, "by patient continuance in well-doing," look for him. We can have, even a better Conference at Providence. Brethren, come praying; come full of faith and the Holy Ghost; come to work for God in all the exercises.

I have learned of two or three brethren in the ministry who are identified with us since the Conference at Boston; and thank God, he will take care of the cause if we will work and leave the result with him. "The things that happened to us" have turned out to "the furtherance of the truth."

Come then, brethren, expecting that an impression will be made on the religious sentiments of the city, which will lead to a true and better understanding of the Divine Plan—which will show the old brethren of the faith, who have seen fit to oppose and denounce, that these things were not done in a corner. That will help to spread the grand and glorious truth of immortality as it is revealed in the Bible, free from all connection with a purgatory after this life, and from the doctrine of literal suffering by any implication or suspicion, and from the dogma of penal infliction in another state, through the whole land.

Come then, we repeat, in the faith, in the work, in the Spirit. You will get acquainted with the flock in Providence; you will meet old friends; you will see and hear ministers whom you have heard and heard of.

There is another thought that I wish to urge; that is, that the whole cause is ours. Let all feel that what is done in Boston, Providence, New York, or Brooklyn; in the east or west; is done as unto the Lord; that the interest is common; and instead of a local selfish interest, we feel that we are called to spread the truth through the whole country.

W. S. CAMPBELL.

"Philip Findeth Nathanael."

There is a lovely, unshackled simplicity and naturalness in the way of the Spirit, in John's gospel. The divine life is seen acting in the most marked independence of every thing like human rules and regulations; and yet all is in the most striking and beautiful moral order. What, for instance, can be more simple or natural than the expression, "Philip findeth Nathanael"? There is nothing official, nothing mechanical, nothing of routine work here. But yet there is beauteous moral order. It is the energy of the implanted divine life, manifesting itself in its own genuine simplicity and native force. It is the living power of grace in the heart, expressing itself after its own peculiar fashion.

"Philip findeth Nathanael." But we must bear in mind that ere Philip found Nathanael he had found Christ. He was able to say, in all assurance and confidence, "We have found him." He does not say: "We are seeking him, and hope to find him; come and help us in the good work of searching." This may be all well enough. It is surely well for those who want to find to go and seek. But Philip was beyond this. His earnest searching had issued in a joyous finding, as is always the case; and having found Christ, he goes and finds Nathanael. As in the last chapter of Revelation, the soul, having heard from above the precious word come, immediately turns to the scene around, and repeats the "come." So it was with Philip; having found Christ for himself, he goes in search of a fellow sinner, to bring him into the enjoyment of the same blessedness.

Now, it is well to see that there is nothing official in this. No doubt office has its own place and its own value. But there is nothing of office in "Philip finding Nathanael." It is the power of life, and not the functions of office. It is the outflow of the stream of grace from an overflowing heart, made happy by a newly discovered object. And why insist on this? Simply to answer the pleadings of an indolent heart, which would take refuge behind, the claims of official authority, while failing to manifest the energy of divine life. A man may say, "I have no gift, no call, no office." Yes, but have you no life? You may not be called to stand before assembled thousands—often a very slippery place—but can you not find a Nathanael? Is there no one into whose ear you can drop those thrilling words, "I have found him"? Is there no friend, neighbor, or relative, to whom you can say "come"? You do not need to possess the gifts of a Paul, a Luther, a Whitefield, or a Chalmers, in order to say "come." What you really want is a heart filled to overflowing with the joy of a newly found treasure. This is what we all want. If there were more Philips to seek, there would be more Nathanaels found. If every one would just do as Philip did, how blessedly would the work of evangelization go on! This is the way it should be; and this is the way it would be, if persons were able to say, with unclouded confidence, "We have found him." It is the hesitancy as to this; it is the lack of holy confidence in the record of God, the absence of settled assurance as to the fulness and efficacy of the atonement, and its personal application, that produces such an unwillingness and incapacity to testify of Christ to others.

In a word, before ever Philip can find Nathanael, he must find Christ. The two findings go together. I must find my own way to the feet of the Saviour before I can conduct my fellow sinner thither. It is one thing to talk about religion, and another thing to be able to say, "I have found Christ." This latter is the secret of all successful evangelization. For a man to set about preaching Christ to others ere he has found him for himself, is a most frightful delusion—yea, it is positive folly and wickedness. There is no one in such an awfully dangerous position as a Christless preacher—a Christless talker about religion.

Reader, allow me to make a direct, solemn, personal appeal to your heart and conscience. How is it with you at this moment? Can you say with Philip, "I have found Christ"? Are you happy in the Saviour's love? Have you found pardon and peace in his atoning blood? If you can answer in the affirmative, if you can say, "Yes, thank God;" then, I ask, are you searching for Nathanael? Are you doing what you can to spread the knowledge of Jesus? Think, I pray you, of the beauteous moral order of Philip's history. It contains, in its brief compass, a volume of precious instruction. "The day following, Jesus would go forth into Galilee, and findeth Philip, and saith unto him, Follow me....Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found him of whom Moses in the law and in the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph....come and see." John i. 43–46.—Selected.

Pilgrimages in India.

The Bombey Times inserts the following statement:

"Thirty miles northeast of Sholapoor, at Toolazapoor, is the great temple of the goddess Bhowani, and twice in the year the place is thronged by men and women of every grade who come to pay their vows and sacrifices to the idol. Besides this, at every full moon, long trains of pilgrims may be seen flocking thither, and such is the faith of the people in the healing power of the goddess, that the sick are resorting here constantly in the vain hope of some relief. The temple at Punderpoor is still more renowned. Not to speak of the myriads who go there at the great festivals, persons make a pilgrimage thither every month from a distance of fifty to one hundred miles, and the practice is kept up for many years.

One man, who had apparently come from a distance, the writer saw near Barsee, making the journey by prostrations, measuring his length upon the ground. It was under the burning sun of noonday; and, hardly able to proceed, he seemed the very picture of despair.

But a case still more remarkable was that of a man performing the journey by rolling himself upon the ground. We came up with him two miles east of Wairag, and asked him where he was going, and why he was thus torturing himself. He at first did not seem to hear, but at length stopping, he lay exhausted upon the ground, and answered in a faint voice that he was going to Punderpoor. After some further questions, as the writer remonstrated with him upon the folly of such a course, he raised his head from the ground, and half reclining, said that he had come so far already that he could not desist now. He stated that his village was near Crandrapoor, four hundred and fifty miles to the east from there, and that he had spent fiften months on the way thus far, and that it was forty miles more, and he wished to complete the pilgrimage. He was accustomed to go about a mile each day. He would then note the place where he had stopped, and walking back to the nearest village would remain till the next day, receiving his food from the villagers. Then he would return, and from the place left the previous day, would begin again his toilsome silgrimage. If he came to a river that could not be passed in this manner, he would go back a distance equal to this space, and roll over the ground a second time. He had for clothing only a coarse cloth bound tightly about his loins, and another about his head, and thus, almost naked, over roads extremely rough and stony, exposed to heat and cold, sometimes drenched with rain or covered with mud, for a year and three months, this poor man had been rolling himself along toward the shrine of Vithoba. Yet it was not a sense of sin or a desire for pardon that induced him to undertake this painful journey. But it was evident, upon further conversation, that he was urged on by no higher motive than a selfish pride. He sought a reputation for holiness.

Letters and Extracts.

A Word From Scotland.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,
Dec. 27, 1864.

BR. STORRS:—I, this evening, on my arrival home from my daily toil, at the stereotype office, received a letter from my Scottish kinsman Br. James Grant; and as he made some remarks about our good paper, the Herald of Life, I thought yourself, Sister Helen Robertson, and our other beloved readers and contributors, would be pleased to hear a few words of encouragement from a "far awa'" writer in "Auld Scotia." And herewith give the following extract:

"I have to thank you, last, though not least, for the Herald of Life. Our D.... friends however do not join me in thanks for it. I have sent several numbers of it to them; but they look upon its teachings as wild delusions, and pity me and all others who are so blind as to embrace such damnable heresies. However, I can well afford to smile at their pity, and think they might find a more fitting subject to bestow it upon than myself.

"I have only found one person in Montrose (Scotland) who is inclined to read it. He is a teacher in one of our schools, He peruses it regularly, and likes it much.

"For myself, I don't so much need it, as an argument to convince me of the truth of the doctrines it advocates; for my mind was pretty thoroughly settled several years ago, on these points by reading the scriptures for myself, in the light of my own reason; but, nevertheless, I do most heartily value it for the evidence it affords me of encouragement, in finding through its columns so many who hold the same views of scripture truth as myself."

With greetings of christian love to yourself, dear editor, and to all the lovers of eternal life, I am your brother, of like precious faith and hope.

JAMES.

ANDREW O. HILLSTREAM, Campton, Iowa writes:—Loved friend and brother in Christ, with great love and thanks to God for all goodness and mercy, and for the blessed privileges that the true light now more and more appears to break through the clouds which so long overshadowed us; although in this vicinity almost all hardly believe any thing that is true, but hold on to false doctrines. There are a few who come to inquire after life in Christ, and commence to find out that without that life through Him there can be no resurrection and no change to a glorious eternal life. The Herald of Life and light, which I call a good paper, is so plainly expressing the bible truth that the humblest class can understand it very well. Christmas day we had no meeting of any sect here. We had a few families gathered and had a little conversation regarding the blessed will of God to our salvation. I send you three new subscribers to the Herald of Life.

Yours in hope of eternal life only through Christ.

BENJAMIN PARKS, Utica, N. Y., writes:—The Herald of Life has been a welcome visitor. For the last year those articles from Br. Curry, God's National plan, I consider worth far more than the subscription price. Any one somewhat acquainted with prophecy and Europeon history, for the eighteen centuries past, I think must be struck with the force and strength of his position there taken. I should like to add my mite to their publication in book form as soon as I can spare the means.

F.R., Philadelphia, writes:—I send $5, as a small sum to aid in the purchase of a horse for our brother in the west. May Heaven bless our brother, and may he go forth as a burning and shining light, spreading the glorious doctrine of life, eternal life, only through Christ the LIFE-GIVER, throughout the entire west. Thanks be to God that the glorious truths are spreading. May they continue to spread until the entire world may rejoice in them.

DAVID ROLLINS, Beaver Dam, Wis., writes:—I thank the Lord that I am in a condition to forward you another ten dollars as a kind of new year's donation to the Herald of Life, to aid in publishing the glorious truth of there being no life out of Christ, and of the soon coming and kingdom of our Lord. I do rejoice that I view these great bible truths in the light I do, comparing the present with my former belief. The Lord is good. Amen.

'Gods National Plan.'

It is not likely that this subject will be represented very soon in pamphlet form; but if the Lord will, I expect to get at it in good time. The funds already advanced towards the object will be reserved, and the contributors will receive the amount in copies of the work. Before its publication, it will be revised, and probably re-arranged. J. T. C.

A Conference in Maine.

BR. STORRS:—Will you please insert the following appointment in the Herald of Life.

There will be a Conference held in a Schoolhouse in WEST LEVANT, Me., known by the name of Shaw's, or Smiley's Schoolhouse, to commence Friday, January 27, 1865, at 10½ o'clock A. M., and continue over the following Sabbath. The Brethren from abroad are invited to attend this meeting. We expect all the preaching Brethren to be in attendance, as well as others; for some business in relation to our large tent will come before them.

Come Brethren and Sisters once more to this place, in the name of him who came to save and bring to life all the sleepers in the dominion of the king of the shades that shall be judged worthy of life, and make one effort to promote a holy and glorious cause. If some of the weights can be thrown off that have been heaped upon us, we shall be glad. In behalf of the Brethren,

JOHN BILLINGS.

Wallachia.

AN EXAMPLE TO ROME.—"There are, thank heaven," observes the Siecle, "countries where forced conversions are not held in honor, as at Rome. In a commune of the district of Ismali (Maldo Wallachia) some priests, belonging to a sect called the Lipovans, had abducted the daughter of a Jew, named Herchko Bercowitz. The unfortunate father, after vain efforts to obtain her restoration, repaired on foot to Bucharest, and asked for justice of the Minister of the Interior. The latter at once wrote as follows to the Prefect of Ismali: 'Paternal authority is sacred in the eye of the law, religion, and nationalities. I am astonished that in the position conferred on you by the law you should have been able to remain indifferent to such a scandalous act. Are you not aware that in Roumania, conformably with the traditions of our fathers, liberty of worship has always been respected? I cannot understand that, under the pretext of proselytism, any one should have dared to subtract a child from the authority of its parents.' The minister's letter is terminated by an order to restore the child to its parents, and to institute a prosecution against the authors of such an unpardonable outrage."

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so man on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR OF THE HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousands more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE DIADEM OF TRUTH.

Suggested by Br. Campbell's thanksgiving-day reminescences.

Earth's glittering diadems
Shed not their brilliancy o'er every brow—the kingly great—
Monarchs alone may glory in the royal coronet
Of evanescent gems.

But nobler, holier gleams
Herald us on from depths of ignorance to full clear light.
Though rugged be her path, truth in the end yields soul-felt pure delight:
Her's are unfading gems.

Their thrilling, living glow,
All, all may share—the purple-robed and poverty's sad sons
Alike may join their happy, grateful benisons;
While streams of knowledge flow.

No ignis fatuus glare
Of dazzling light allures our steps and mocks our longing grasp;
On her we may rely: for truth is true, and will at last
Richly repay our care.

Then brothers, sisters, all,
Go onward! sweet is your reward—your labors blest
To lead the untaught mind where heavenly wisdom's rill's spring forth:
It is the Master's call.

And higher, richer far
Is your reward when gathered 'round th' eternal throne
Each rescued, ransomed soul to your resplendant crown,
Shall add a victor's star.

When from that August Throne,
Is heard the Master's voice—beams full the Master's eye—
As gazing on the happy throng benignantly—
He speake the glad well-done!

Boston, Dec. 22, 1864. S. N. C.

LUTHER LEE ON IMMORTALITY.

Mr. Lee's next proof of the consciousness of the dead, is based upon our Lord's conversation with the Sadducees. Matt. xxii. 31, 32.

Notwithstanding all we have heretofore written upon this paragraph, we shall now examine it fully and impartially.

Mr. Lee denies that the resurrection is the only point presented in the text referred to, but I shall not allow him to decide that question. The apostle has settled it by the following:—"The same day came to him the Sadducees, who say there is no resurrection," &c. (verse 23.) Again, "therefore, in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven?" &c. Again, "for in the resurrection they neither marry," &c. (verses 28–30.) The resurrection then, and nothing but the resurrection, is the subject of discussion here, Mr. Lee's assertion to the contrary notwithstanding.

The question between Christ and the Sadducees was a resurrection, or no resurrection. Christ affirmed, and the Sadducees denied. And, as the Sadducees rejected the Prophets, he appealed to the Books of Moses, whose authority they regarded as divine. He makes the following points: 1st, "God is not the God of the dead." The Sadducees believed the dead would live no more, and therefore the Lord makes the first point to meet this objection—"God is not the God of the dead," who live no more, as you Sadducees believe. Jesus did not say that "God was not the God of the dead," in any other sense than that in which the Sadducees held the doctrine; which was in the sense of there being "no resurrection."

Mr. Lee labors to prove that these worthies are not dead—hence he says—"they must be living." What a strange doctrine that must be, which subverts the Christian's hope, and stultifies the meaning of language.

Now, I affirm that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are dead, unconscious and profoundly asleep in the dust. But they are not dead in the sense of the Sadducees, i. e., to live no more. We have the record of the death of these saints in the old testament, and Paul says, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises." They are dead then, and according to Mr. Lee's theory, never can be raised. This is modern Saduceeism.

Mr. Lee's doctrine of consciousness in death is based upon a rotten assumption, viz.; that a man may be dead and alive at the same time. This is just as absurd as to say a man may be in heaven, and in the grave rotten at the same instant! I know not by what term to designate this vain and foolish philosophy; it is so absurd, so baseless, so irrational and unphilosophical, that it defies language to describe it. Let it pass then, a thing of nought.

Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, iv. 17, thus writes, "As it is written, I have made thee (Abraham) a father of many nations before him whom he believed, even God, who reviveth the dead, and calleth those things (or persons) which are not as though they were." It is in this sense, Mr. Lee, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are living, and only in this sense; and, therefore, "God is the God of Abraham," &c.

Mr. Lee's doctrine is this—no consciousness in the intermediate state, no resurrection. His Language is, "There can be no resurrection unless the soul maintains its conscious existence during the interim," &c. Let the reader mark and remember this.

But, in opposition to the above, I state the position that, if Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are not dead, they can never be raised. This the word itself will prove. Anastasis, a rising up to live again, recover life. It is a re-living, a re-standing, and can only be applied to those who were dead. The living are not the subject of a resurrection. It is not a coming down, but an uprising. Mr. Lee's view renders the resurrection an impossibility. The dead, if unconscious, he says, never can be raised, and I affirm that the living are not raised: and therefore there is no resurrection.

The resurrection of the dead saints, and the change of the living saints is however clearly taught in the bible. And all that Mr. Lee says on this point is prompted by his strong desire to maintain his theory. Mr. Lee's whole reasoning tends to the point of no resurrection. His objections are those which infidels have made before him, and which, on his part, show a great want of faith. He reasons that as the particles of the body "may have floated in the clouds, flowed from the fountain, run in the stream, and mingled with the ocean," there can be no resurrection. This whole paragraph is rank infidelity. I say, all I have quoted and a vast deal more, is infidelity without a veil. This may be thought harsh, but the case calls for a prompt rebuke, and by the grace of God, I will expose this skepticism in the light of God's truth. And 1st Job's testimony is against Mr. Lee.

In Job xiv. 10–15, he says, "But man dieth, and wasteth away; yes, man yieldeth his breath, and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down, and riseth not till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep. O that thou wouldst hide me in the grave, that thou wouldst keep me secret, until thy wrath is past, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time, and remember me. If a man dieth shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come. Thou shall call and I will answer thee? thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hands."

Here Job teaches that the man dies, that he lieth down and shall not awake, nor be raised out of his sleep, till the heavens be no more. He prays to be hid in the grave till a set time, when he desired to be remembered. He asks the question, "If a man die shall he live again?" And says he would wait his appointed time, till his change, or resurrection, come. And affirms that then God would call and he would answer; that he would then "have a desire to the work of his hands." Again he speaks of resting in the dust. Again he says, "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he will stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though, after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God."

From this testimony we learn that the man dies, and that the man is raised. And Job, unlike Mr. Lee, and all others of his school, believed that, after the worms destroyed, or devoured, his body, yet in his immortal flesh, made alive from the dead, he should see God.

2. the testimony of Isaiah is against Mr. Lee.

Isaiah xxvi. 19. "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."

This requires no comment; it clearly proves that the body intered will be raised.

3. The evidence of Daniel is opposed to Mr. Lee.

Daniel xii. 2. "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," &c.

4. Jesus testifies against him.

"I will raise him up as the last day." John vi.

5. Paul's testimony is against Mr. Lee.

Rom. viii. 11. "But if the Spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you, he that raised Christ from the dead will also quicken our mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." The body that dies is quickened, or make alive. Again, "Who will change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like to his glorious body." Phil. iii. 21. (see chap. xv. 1 Cor.)

6. The resurrection of Christ testifies against Mr. Lee.

Jesus was brought again from the dead, his soul was not left in the grave. "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for ever more." He is the first fruits of them that slept, the first born from the dead, not the living. His resurrection is the model—the pattern of the saints. If he had brought up any body other than the one buried, it would have been no resurrection at all. And according to Mr. Lee, the disciples, or, indeed, the soldiers, might have stolen his body away, without invalidating his resurrection.

Mr. Lee "greatly errs, not knowing the scriptures nor the power of God."

The resurrection, then, does not depend upon the possession of an immortal soul, in which resides Mr. Lee's fancied personal identity. So far from it, his view is directly opposed to any resurrection, nullifies the gospel of the Son of God, and fosters the blackest infidelity; an infidelity that scruples not to assume the robes of an "angel of light." The true state of the question, then, is this:

God is not the God of the dead, who rise not;

But Abraham, Isaac and Jacob will rise;

Ergo: God is the God of Abraham, &c.

Mr. Lee's facts, then, have nothing to do with the great fact proved by the testimony submitted. And I care not if the body pass through a thousand changes, God's word stands pledged for its resurrection; and no man, unless to sustain a theory, or he be a skeptic in relation to God's word, will dispute it.

Mr. Lee evidently maintains the position that the body which dies will not be raised, which is tantamount to no resurrection at all. In opposition to this atheistic view, I have proved that it will be the same body in fact, changed from an earthly to a heavenly, from an animal to a spiritual nature. Those raised from the dead, "neither marry nor are given in marriage," which argues a change in the conformation of the body, and therefore, "in the resurrection are neither male nor female, but one in Christ." It was this glorious faith which prompted Joseph "to give commandment concerning his bones"—a commandment which Mr. Lee's infidelity would have prompted him to disregard. But space will not allow me to follow this argument further; I will therefore leave it for the next.

Mr. Lee's seventh argument is founded on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi. 22, 33. One would have thought after all that has been said and written on this portion of God's word, that no author would again refer to it in proof of the consciousness of the dead; but in this we are mistaken.

Without following Mr. Lee, I shall proceed to give, in as brief a manner as possible, the meaning of the paragraph.—And,

1. I regard it as a parable and not an history.

2. It is not designed to represent the condition of men between death and the resurrection.

3. It does not represent physical death at all.

4. The symbols used are not expressive of the state of the dead, as held by our opponents.

There are two classes of persons represented here by the rich man and Lazarus, viz.: Jews and Gentiles. Their politico-ecclesiastical and social conditions are described as follows: The rich man—the Jew—is represented as being clothed in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day." He was rich. This I regard as a true and graphic description of the Jew.

On the other hand, "there was a certain beggar named Lazarus [representing the Gentiles] who was laid at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table."

But the haughty Jew, who regarded the Gentiles as dogs, refused even these. He is therefore represented as dying, and being carried to Abraham's bosom by angels. An excellent illustration of the fact that when the gospel was rejected by the Jews, and they were consequently broken off, the Gentiles were grafted into the good olive, and made partakers of its fatness; and so became children of Abraham by faith, and heirs of the promises made to him.

The poor man is said to die in order to maintain the decorum of the parable; hence, it is immediately added, "The rich man also died and was buried—the Jew died and was buried politically and ecclesiastically, as well as socially; "and in hell—hades—he lifted up his eyes, being in torments," as their history for the last 1800 years fully proves, "and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom."

In this political torment he cries to Abraham for help, for mercy, for water to cool his tongue, "for I am tormented in this flame." But Abraham is represented as replying, "Son, remember that thou, in thy lifetime [in thy dispensation] receivedst thy good things [which were all abused] and likewise Lazaus evil things [being in "the valley and shadow of death" politically and ecclesiastically] but now he is comforted [by the gospel] and thou art tormented [by thy persecuters]. And besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed [the decree of God for their unbelief] so that they who would pass from hence to you [to aid you ecclesiastically, &c.] can not; neither can they [any of you] pass to us that would come from thence [for God has decreed you shall not] until the the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

Then the rich man—the Jew—is represented as supplicating for the remnant of Israel—the five brethren—lest they also come into this place of torment, and share the same fate. Abraham gives him to understand that "they have Moses and the prophets; let them them." The rich man replies, "No, father Abraham; but if one shall go to them from the dead, they will repent." Abraham responds, "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead," which was fully verified in the case of Christ, whom the Jews rejected both before and after he rose from the dead.

Such, I apprehend is the simple meaning of the parable. The word hades, in which the rich man is represented as being tormented, is not used as indicative of future punishment any where in the Bible. It is used however to express a low and abased condition, and such is the analogical meaning of the word.

Having made these observations upon the article before me, I shall conclude by remarking that Mr. Lee, and all others on his side of the question, and not a few on our side, have made sad havoc of this beautiful parable, which is such an admirable illustration of the condition of the Jewish world.

It costs us more to be miserable than would make us perfectly happy.

EDWIN AS HE WAS.

[We find the following, from Edwin Burnham, in the Newburyport Herald, where it appeared a few years since. The contrast with a late production of his, which we gave in our columns a few weeks since, is too striking to need comment. "O that he were as in months past." May be he will be. The Lord give him grace to that end.—EDITOR.]

SECTARIANISM.

I learned long ago that it is not with men we are at war, but with doctrines and sentiments. I do not therefore see any reason why we should act like the sons of Ishmael, toward each other. A man embraces a false sentiment—what then? Is he therefore a hypocrite, a scoundrel, or a liar? Who of all of us do not hold some sentiments which may be wrong? Shall we therefore all fall on each other with words and acts of cruelty? What little Pope among us will start up and say, "I am right—you are all wrong?" Is not every man entitled to respect, love, kindness, and consideration? Will it reform any man to look at him with a countenance fraught with wrath and thunder, and call him hard names? But the man is in a fatal error—what then? What will save him from his error? Will it make him see his error and our truth by appearing toward him unkind, vinegar-faced, and cloudy? Will turning him out of doors by treating him with such cold contempt that he can not remain in our company, draw him any nearer to the truth and to Christ? This was not the policy of the Galilean. The enemies of Christ said before him "Behold he receiveth sinners and eateth with them." Hear the reply of the Son of God to all such charges: "They that are whole need no physician, but they that are sick.

One of the primary laws of reformation, both in doctrine and in practice, is association. Jesus came down from heaven that he might associate with men and reform them. It does not make us sinners to talk with, walk with, eat with, worship with, sinners, of necessity. It does not make them saints to let them all see us shun them and treat them with contempt. When will men learn that bigotry, sectarianism, coldness, contempt, stiffness, and reserve, are not attractive elements? When will men learn that they can not scold, drive, frighten, or repulse human beings into truth? When shall we learn if men are brought into truth at all, it will be done by association, love, plainness, frankness, kindness, and argument?

Select a family of eight or ten members—one of the family embraces a fatal sentiment—fatal to the interests of the whole—what is to be done? When the hour of worship arrives, shall we, with cold contempt, show him he is unwelcome in the worshipping circle? Will that make him love our truth and our spirit more? Shall we refuse to walk with him to the place of true worship on Sunday because he sometimes goes to a place of false worship? Will that make him love true or false worship more? Shall we treat him with haughty and scornful reserve when he wishes to take part in the worship? Will that incline him to go with us? Shall we not rather help him in all he does attempt right? Shall we not say amen when he does say the truth? And when we do say nay, nay, say it like christians, and not like savages. But I know well the sentiments of community on these points. Here is the creed of the sectarian community: "Go with us, or we go against you." "Help build up my church, or I want nothing to do with you." "Be somebody or nobody." This creed is not universal—there are many honorable exceptions to it. May we not hope the exceptions will multiply?

EDWIN BURNHAM.

THE CAPTAIN AND THE QUADRANT.

A godly man, the master of an American ship, during one voyage found his ship bemisted for days, and he became rather anxious respecting her safety. He went down to his cabin and prayed. The thought struck him, if he had with confidence committed his soul to God, he might certainly commit his ship to him; and so, accordingly, he gave all into the hands of God, and felt at perfect peace; but still he prayed that if he would be pleased to give a cloudless sky at twelve o'clock, he should like to take an observation, to ascertain their position, and whether they were on the right course.

He came on deck at eleven o'clock, with the quadrant under his coat. As it was thick and drizzling, the men looked at him with amazement. He went down to his cabin, prayed, and came up. There seemed still to be no hope. Again he went down and prayed, and again he appeared on deck with his quadrant in his hand. It was now ten minutes to twelve o'clock, and still there was no appearance of a change; but he stood on the deck, waiting upon the Lord, when, in a few minutes, the mist seemed to be folded up and rolled away, as by an omnipotent and invisible hand; the sun shone clearly from the blue vault of heaven, and there stood the man of prayer with the quadrant in his hand; but so awe-struck did he feel, and so "dreadful" was that place, that he could scarcely take advantage of the answer to his prayer. He, however, succeeded, although with trembling hands, and found, to his comfort, that all was well. But no sooner had he finished taking the observation, than the mist rolled back over the heavens, and it began to drizzle as before.

This story of prayer was received from the lips of the good Captain Crossby, who was so useful in the Ardrossan awakening; and he himself was the man who prayed and waited upon his God with the quadrant in his hand.

"Prayer makes the darkened cloud withdraw;
Prayer climbs the ladder Jacob saw;
Gives exercise to faith and love;
Brings every blessing from above."

THE LITTLE GIRL AND HER COPY.

A little girl went to writing school. When she saw her copy, with every line so perfect, "I can never, never write like that," she said.

She looked steadfastly at its straight lines, which were so very straight, and the round lines so slim and graceful. Then she took up her pen and timidly put it on the paper. Her hand trembled; she drew it back; she stopped, studied the copy, and began again.

"I can but try," said the little girl; "I will do as well as I can."

She wrote half a page. The letters were crooked. What more could we expect from a first effort? The next scholar stretched across her desk and said:

"What scraggly things you make!"

Tears filled the little girl's eyes. She dreaded to have the teacher see her book. "He will be angry with me and scold," she said to herself.

But when the teacher came and looked, he smiled.

"I see you are trying, my little girl," he said kindly, "and that is enough for me."

She took courage. Again and again she studied the beautiful copy. She wanted to know how every line went, how every letter was rounded and made. Then she took up her pen and began again to write. She wrote carefully, with the copy always before her.

But O, what slow work it was! Her letters straddled here, they crowded there, and some of them looked "which-way."

The little girl trembled at the step of the teacher.

"I am afraid you will find fault with me," she said; "my letters are not fit to be on the same page with the copy."

"I do not find fault with you," said the teacher, "because I do not look so much at what you do, as to what you aim and have the heart to do. By sincerely trying, you will make a little improvement every day; and a little improvement every day will enable you to reach excellence by and by."

"Thank you, sir," said the little girl, and thus encouraged, she took up her pen with a greater spirit of application than before.

And so it is with the dear children who are trying to become like Jesus. God has given us a heavenly copy. He has given us his dear Son "for an example, that we should follow his steps." He "did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." How he loved people; how he forgave his enemies; how kind and tender he was; how "meek and lowly in heart;" how he "went about doing good!" He is "altogether lovely," and "full of grace and truth."

And when you study his character, "I can never reach that," you say. "I can never be like Jesus."

God does not expect you to be like his dear Son in a minute, or a day, or a year; but what pleases him is, that you should love him and have a disposition to try. It is that temper which helps you grow day by day, little by little, into his likeness, which God desires to see. Your companions may see no signs of improvement in your conduct; they may even laugh at your efforts; but God, with his all-seeing eye, can discern them. He looks at the heart. God sees you try. God loves you for trying, and he will give you his Holy Spirit to help you.

The younger you try, the easier it becomes. The harder you try, the sweeter you will find it. And what sight is more lovely to those who love you, than to mark you growing day by day into the temper and spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ?—Child's Paper.

CARLO.

On a pleasant afternoon in the summer, just as the sun was beginning to decline in the west, three schoolfellows were wandering through the forest paths which led to their homes. They lived in a section of the country which has not even yet been cleared and settled by the advancing step of civilization, and which, at the time of my story, was often the haunt of some wild animals, who were at least a match for an unarmed and unprotected man. The boys, however, were evidently under no apprehension from danger of this kind, and they laughed, ran, and shouted with the full gayety of high animal spirits, undarkened by any of the every-day ills of life.

At last they came to a moss-covered rock, by the side of a shallow run of water, and they sat down at the base of the rock to rest themselves for a few moments. The place where they stopped presented a scene which may often be witnessed in our American forests. The tall trees swung their branches over them, and through an opening or vista on one side the eye might roam over the distant hills, which veiled the horizon from the view.

While the three young companions were sporting beneath the shadow of the rock, a slight noise was heard in the bushes, and the next moment their favorite playmate, Carlo, bounded into the midst of them. Carlo was a dog of the spaniel breed, and it was his delight to traverse the woods with the boys of his master's family. His coming was now welcomed by all with caresses and words of endearment. But he had not fawned upon them long, ere he started up in evident agitation, and began to bark furiously. The boys, supposing that he had merely seen a rabbit or squirrel, did not take much notice of his noise; but at last, looking in the direction of the sounds, they beheld a panther crouching upon the ground and glaring on them in a way which was anything but polite or agreeable. They at once ceased from their sports, and Henry dropped the straw with which he had just been attempting to tickle Charlie's ear. They rose up, and scrambled across the brook in the direction of their homes.

In the meantime Carlo was barking with undiminished energy at the unwelcome intruder. The panther bounded over him in the direction of the retreating boys. But the dog instantly got before him again, and stood boldly opposed. The wild enemy, as if amazed at the audacity of a creature so inferior in size and strength, crouched upon the ground, as if meditating how to act. The result of his meditation evidently was to crush his yelping antagonist at once, for he made a tremendous bound in the direction of the dog; but the latter, by dexterously running forward at the moment, again avoided the clutches of his powerful opponent, Once more did the brave little Carlo place himself in front of the infuriated panther, who bounded upon him more suddenly than before. The dog escaped with a slight wound in his ear, and again opposed himself to his baffled foe. In this manner Carlo kept retreating, till a shot from an experienced woodsman went through the heart of the panther.

The boys escaped to their homes, somewhat frightened, but safe and sound. Carlo soon joined them, and seemed fully to enjoy and understand the praises and caresses which were lavished upon him. His wound was preperly taken care of, but a scar remained, which was always visible. Whenever the story of his bold resistance to the panther was related, Carlo would rise up, wag his tail, and place his head upon his master's knee, so that he might point out the place where he was wounded. No old veteran of the revolution could be prouder of his wooden leg than was Carlo of the scar, which remained a memorial of his gratitude and his bravery.

THE LAMB OF GOD.—A little boy reading to his mother about the lion, in a book of natural history, said:

"Mamma, the lion is a noble animal, but I love the lamb better; and I will tell you why I love it better; because Jesus Christ is called the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world."

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head.' Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. HONEST FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

BY JOHN RYLAND, M. A., ENGLAND, 1775.

In the conduct of my studies, many years ago, I fixed as an unalterable rule, that I would take nothing upon trust, but as far as possible see every thing with my own eyes, and feel the truth of every great subject of religion in my own mind, as the result of rational and solid conviction.

As I am fully convinced of the absolute necessity of a divine revelation, so I have inquired with the utmost care and deliberation into the possibility of it, and have proceeded to consider the nature of inspiration, as far as I could attain clear and determinate ideas on such a most delicate and sublime subject.

I have found by happy experience, that if a man have an honest love of truth, a just sense of the defects of his own mind, an humble dependence on God to assist him in laying aside prejudices, and if he proceed with caution and by slow and sure steps, there is no subject in the whole system of truth and religion but what he may investigate, so far as it hath a relation to his duty and happiness.

It is the greatest honor to a human character to be an honest inquirer after truth; and although I will not say I have attained this character, yet I will dare to affirm that I love and admire it, and I wish to possess so great an excellence.

As I write chiefly for my young friends, I will endeavor to give them the outlines of such a character; in order that they may keep it ever before their eyes, and feel a generous ambition to be what they love and revere.

All persons, who devote themselves to the study of religion and the pursuit of learning, profess themselves free inquirers after truth, and rational freethinkers; but if we try many of them by the true and eternal rules of just freethinking, we shall find them wanting in all the essential qualities of a true freethinker; and if my idea of freethinking be right, we may justly say, "How few honest and free searchers after truth are there to be found in the world; how arduous the labor; how honorable the character.

A most sincere and honest freethinker is just the opposite to an infidel, a skeptic, a sophist. An infidel is not willing that all should be true, which God has declared to be true. A skeptic doubts every thing, and is sure of nothing. A sophist attempts to impose on your understanding the most specious errors in the garb of truth; he deludes you with the shadow instead of the substance of the truth. Not so the honest freethinker: he is just the reverse of such odious and contemptible characters; he is heartily willing that all should be true, whether by reason or revelation. He is resolved to submit to evidence as fast as it shall arise before the eyes of his mind, and he scorns to impose one single thought on mankind, of which he is not fully convinced in his own conscience.

But to possess this glorious character, the mind must be smitten with the beauties and charms of truth; we must be purified from every species of lust, pride, and extravagant self-love; we must be cured of our boundless self-admiration, and fond desires of a vain distinction; we must be made honest in the very essence of the soul for ever.

He has an ardent love to truth, merely on account of its excellent nature, beauty, and goodness; he loves it purely for its own sake: an infidel does not; he doth not love truth for its own intrinsic goodness and beauty. The good man fears no consequences that can follow from truth, and therefore he lays open his whole soul to the light of evidence, and is determined to follow wherever truth shall lead the way.

He is willing from the very bottom of his soul to divest himself of all prejudices and to put off all opinions and notions, that will not stand the test of severe and impartial examination.

He is resolved to use all the best helps that God has put in his power, or laid within his reach for the attainment of truth.

He is determined to embrace truth, even all truth, wherever he meets with it, and from whatsoever hand it comes: whether from a throne or a dunghill; a palace or a cottage; from a child, a Newton, or a Paul.

He is invariably resolved to buy the truth at any rate, and sell it at no price; but will rather part with all that is dear to him in this world, than part with this jewel. He will give up his name, his estate, his blood and life, rather than betray or part with the truth. He makes an honest use of his reason to find out truth, or the real nature and relation of things.

He uses his understanding in such modes of operation as these: (viz.) in considering the degree of evidence or clear appearance of truth in the mind:—in determining to judge according to the apparent strength or weakness of the evidence before him, on any important question:—in ballancing evidence on both sides of a question, and embracing that side on which the weight of evidence preponderates.

Honest freethinking gloriously appears in thus considering impartially the nature of the evidence for or against any point that is proposed to us for truth.

A man of this spirit and disposition looks upon it as bondage of thought, and the mark of a low slavish soul, to contradict or despise a truth without inquiring into it, merely because it has been commonly received, for a thousand or seventeen hundred years past. Such is the bondage and slavery of soul in all those who contradict or despise the evidences of divine revelation.

True freethinking does not consist in a power or right to dissent from the eternal principles of right reason and truth, but in being superior to vile bigotry and low prejudices, which imprison and debase the soul.

An honest and generous freethinker is not attached to any low party or faction in divinity or philosophy; nor is he a slave to his own vile passions, or to the passions or humours of other men: he scorns to be under the arbitrary will, or the tyrannic pleasure and influence of his superiors, in mere civil power, or worldly honors and emoluments—but truth, eternal, almighty, and all amiable truth, is the sovereign of his soul, the empress of his heart. He dedicates himself to truth alone, and aims and wishes to be for ever a disciple to pure and beautiful truth.

An honest freethinker will not suffer himself to be driven from truth by the faults or the foolishness of those that profess it. He does not forsake revealed truth, and leave it bleeding in the dust, on account of sneaking and impure hypocrites, artful impostors, or imperious tyrants, who profess it and disgrace it; and are the curse and bane of the most sacred and beautiful system in the world.

To conclude this sketch of the beautiful character of an honest freethinker:—He disdains the thought of a secret indulgence of sensual lusts, or the foul appetites of the flesh:—he knows that a gratification of the unclean inclinations of his body, are utterly inconsistent with all greatness of soul, and generous freedom of thought.

An honest free inquirer after truth scorns to persist in an error, because he has in some things, and at sometimes, made a mistake, or formed a wrong apprehension of some objects.

He is not ashamed nor afraid to say, at such a time, or in such an affair, "I was mistaken."

This is not the temper of our modern deists, who having from some bad springs rejected divine revelation, and set themselves up as advocates for natural religion alone, their pride prompts them to persist in the way of error, and they disdain the thought of acknowledging themselves in the wrong.

Not so the true freethinker: he accounts it a victory to conquer his own pride; and to change an error for truth, he esteems an eternal gain.

"Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."

This text, by some, is thought to support the age to come doctrine. Now, though we do not believe the events prophesied in the book of Revelation are consecutive in every case, still we think the connections of this text will enable us to fix its chronology, which will assist to an understanding of it. To our mind it is quite clear that chap. xiii. presents papacy, merging into and succeeded by the revived dragon, and that this scene ends with the 5th verse of chap. xiv., because the Lamb stands on Mount Zion and begins the establishment of his kingdom in the time of dragon (devil) supremacy; hence the two are seen at the same time; that is, in the same vision.

Then commences another line of prophecy with verse 6, chap. xiv., presenting the great movements to instruct all nations that the judgment day is at hand, in which time papacy falls; this chapter finishes with the reaping time. But up to this time we have had the narrative of but two woe trumpets; which provides for a third, to our mind, this side of the French Revolution; and inasmuch as Rev. xv. 1 says, in the seven last plagues "is filled up the wrath of God," we conclude the seven last plagues comprise the third and last woe; which began to be poured out about the beginning of this century; but we trust no one ever thought they (the vials) would be finished in another age; no, surely in this.

Now, what is equally clear, chap. xv. introduces this interesting affair, while chap. xvi., to the close, details the pouring out of these vials. This would locate the prophecy in this age beyond dispute. If this be correct, then it is just to conclude that whatsoever is said in this connection is suggested by the circumstances, and hence applicable to that time, and not to be put in the future; and in keeping with this they sing, "For all nations shall come and—proskunesousin—shall prostrate—shall do homage before thee; because thy righteous judgments are made manifest;" (in the pouring out of the vials), while they are passing, not after they have passed. And who see that they are "righteous judgments"? the unbelieving? Where is such a doctrine taught in the bible? No, but the righteous. To this agrees the prophet: "For when thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants (a class) will learn righteousness. Let favor be shown to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness; in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, and will not behold the majesty of the Lord. Lord, when thy hand is lifted up they will not see (in time to profit), but they shall see, and be ashamed for their envy at thy (righteous) people; yea, the fire of (prepared for) thine enemies shall devour them." Isa. xxvi. 9–11.

In harmony with this, the "Emphatic Diaglott" gives the Vatican Manuscript, No. 1160, as authority for omitting "all nations," which would leave the text "for all shall come and worship before thee," leaving the sense to determine what "all" shall come. Again, we do not see any intimation that chap. xv. introduces any considerable part of the saints (as the age to come theory has it) but only that portion that "have gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name;" which quite probably represents that portion of the saints who have come in contact with the beast, &c., and rejoice to see and understand God's just judgments upon the wicked powers and institutions of earth, while they are saved out of them.

Beside, there is some collateral argument in this book to sustain the foregoing.

1st. Chap. xi.. Under the sounding of the seventh angel the kingdom of this world becomes the Lord's and his Christ's; being transferred from the kings, emperors, and other potentates, who have long had authority in the world; which transfer makes the nations mad, and involves their destruction: "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants, the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them which corrupt the earth." verse 18. This text, to our mind, is in keeping with the general tenor of the scriptures, and represents the feeling of the great bulk of the inhabitants of the different nations concerning the transfer of power to the Son of God; but it is very probable that there will be many among the people in these times of judgment, war, famine, and pestilence, that will learn righteousness, and be saved, that otherwise would not be saved; even now, it may be seen in this war; the widowed mother loses her darling boy in the fierce fight; he was her only prop on earth; she looks to heaven for a prop now; the wife with her little ones clinging to her is widowed; she is desolate, and looks to the widow's God for succor now; but what of the nation in general? They whet their sword for a fight with England, and dance and revel, and dress with harder hearts over the green graves of half a million of their countrymen.

2d. In keeping with this, chap. xix. presents a great battle. "And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army." Here they are fighting mad. This does not look much like doing homage before God, no; they are slain by the Lord Jesus; verse 21.

3d. Chap. xx. appears to present the great executive judgment day upon all people which is so thorough and complete that when its turmoil and confusion is past, there bursts, upon the sight of the Seer "a new heaven, and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away." Rev. xxi. 1. Neither is there any mention of probation again; but chap. xxi. presents the holy city blazing with the glory of God and the Lamb, and the "nations of them which are saved (not left) walk in the light of it. And the kings of the earth (made and appointed by the Lord Jesus) do bring their glory and honor into it." Verse 24.

With this view, we think, the best harmony of God's revelation is attained; but shall strive by the grace of God to keep in a frame of mind to receive instruction upon this, as well as all other questions, and hope that all, by exchanging thoughts, will reconcile differences, and mutually grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

Br. E. W. has his view of the Apocalypse, with which we shall not meddle. Whatever the book teaches, it can not conflict with the word of God as "spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets since the world began." But we are interested in preserving the integrity of God's word, and therefore we speak.

Our brother's argument depends on the omission of the word "nations" from the text. That would be an easy method of overthrowing the obnoxious doctrine, perhaps, if it were justifiable. If that terrible "age to come" is to be disposed of only by taking away "from the words of the book of this prophecy," we think it will scarcely pay.

As to the "Emphatic Diaglott," the less it is trusted on critical points, the better. Give us the opinions and statements of men who know whereof they affirm, and who are competent to judge in such matters.

It is said that the "Vatican Manuscript, No. 1160" omits "all nations" from the text. Our brother thinks that this "leaves the sense to determine what 'all' shall come." And this after striking out "all"! Admitting that the word "nations" is not found in the Manuscript referred to—what of it? Many other and far more authoritative MSS. contain the word.

The two leading MSS. of the Apocalypse are the Codex Alexandrinus and the Codex Ephræmi, both of the fifth century, and both have the reading; whereas, the Vatican MS. 1160, dates as late as the thirteenth century. Besides, this is not the best Vatican MS. of the Apocalypse. The oldest Vatican MS., No. 1209, does not contain the Apocalypse, but it has a supplementary MS. of the eighth century that does; and its attachment to No. 1209 shows that it is the principal Vatican copy. Will any one deny that it has the reading in question? There are two other Vatican MSS. of the same date as No. 1160. Will any one say that they omit the word? Other leading MSS. of the eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries have the reading. No critical student of the New Testament MSS. would dream of striking out "nations" from the text in question. The word is also found in the quotations of Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, third century, Andreas, Bishop of Cæsarea in Capadocia, sixth century, and Primasius, sixth century. See Alford's Greek Testament for the foregoing information. Let us have standard and trustworthy authority.

Another consideration confirms the reading. Verses 3, 4, are to be read together. "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of THE NATIONS. [This reading is the true one, and is adopted by all the critics—Griesbach, Scholz, Lachman, Tischendorf, Alford, &c.] Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy; for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." Here we have quotations from two passages in the Old Testament. The first is Jer. x. 7. "Thou art great, and thy name is great in might. Who would not fear thee, O King of nations?" The second is from Psa. lxxxvi. 8, 9. "Among Elohim there is none like unto thee, O Lord; neither are there any works like unto thy works. All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name. For thou art great, and doest wondrous things; thou art God alone." The writer of the Apocalypse goes to the Old Scriptures for his assertion that "all nations shall come and worship," and merely adds the reason of the fulfilment of the prophecy: "Thy judgments are made manifest." Now it is not worth while to strike out the quotation of "nations" in the Apocalypse unless we are willing to treat the Psalmist in the same way.

With the retention of the word in question, our brother's argument falls to the ground, and as we have vindicated the integrity of the text as it stands, another exposition is necessary.

J. T. C.

LUTHER LEE ON IMMORTALITY.

In Mr. Lee's article, No. 15, he bases an argument, in favor of the consciousness of the dead, on Luke xxiii: 42–43, and 46. The things to be examined in these passages are these:

1. The thief's request—"Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom."
2. Our Lord's answer—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."
3. Christ commending his spirit to God.
4. His giving up the ghost.

We may remark, on the first point, that the thief desired to be remembered at a particular time which he specifies, viz: "when thou comest into thy kingdom."

The Lord has not even yet come into his kingdom, and consequently, the theif's desire has not been realized. Christ's kingdom will be on earth—his throne in Jerusalem, and his dominion fill the world! When he comes into this kingdom, he will "come on the clouds of heaven," and the righteous dead will be raised to share the kingdom with him. The thief will then be with him, and realize his request.

On the second point, I will observe that, the Lord's answer is in perfect harmony with the thief's request—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," which is the kingdom referred to by the thief.

The word Paradeisos, a Persian word adopted into the Hebrew, and used by the "Seventy," in the Septuagint Greek of the Old Testament, to signify a park, a forest, a garden of trees of various kinds, a delightful grove, the garden of Eden. This word is never used to express the state or condition of the dead; neither is it the place of dead men's "ghosts!" Paul was caught away to, or had "a vision" of paradise; and in Rev. ii. 7., the Lord says—"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." (See, also, Rev. xxii.) The terms kingdom and paradise fix the meaning of the whole passage. The phrase "to-day" or "this day" must therefore be referred to the day of Christ's "coming into his kingdom." The Lord's answer is equivalent to his having said—I will remember you at the day, time, or period of which you speak. The term day, often refers to a time, or period, and not to a literal day. "Thou art to pass over Jordan this day." Deut. xi. 1. And yet they did not pass that day. In Gen. ii. 4, 17. "In the day (time or period) when God made the heavens and the earth." "To-day if you will hear his voice," &c. "Now is the day of salvation," &c., Heb. iii. 16. This day of salvation has lasted 1800 years.

Mr. Lee contends that Paradise means heaven above. In this he is utterly wrong; but, suppose, for the sake of argument, we grant it, and then what follows? why it follows that Jesus Christ did not go there; for he says to Mary after his resurrection—"Touch me not: for I have not yet ascended to my Father," &c.

Christ commended his spirit to his Father, and gave up the ghost. The Pneuma, here rendered spirit, signifies, when used in reference to man, the breath, or life, &c., and the word ekpneo, compounded of ek, out, and pneo, to breathe, and literally means to breathe out; so that the passage literally runs thus:—"Father, into thy hands I commend my life; and having said this, he breathed it out," expired or died.

Mr. Lee says—"Christ's soul, or ghost, which he commended into the hands of his Father and gave up, did not die with the body, and hence it was with it that the thief had the promise of being in paradise." While Mr. Lee was writing the above, he must have forgotten that "Christ's soul was poured out unto death"—that "it was made an offering for sin," and that in reference to it, it is said—"Thou wilt not leave my soul in the grave." Mr. Lee believes the soul goes to heaven at death, and, therefore, he comes under the condemnation of Justin Martyr, as well as the Bible.

Mr. Lee also refers to Acts vii. 59, where Stephen says—'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." This belongs to the class of texts already examined. This phraseology occurs in Job. xxxii. 8. Peter, also, refers to the same when he exhorts those, who "suffer according to the will of God, to commit the keeping of their souls to God." Mr. Lee refers to Mr. Grew's view of this text, and thinks his rendering "a violation of common sense." As Mr. Lee's common sense is not mine, I fully indorse Mr. Grew's that the life is not a distinct substance, susceptible of consciousness without the material organization. Life, being an attribute, and not an entity, as Mr. Lee supposes, can have no consciousness apart from the man of whom it is an attribute.

2. The argument on Rom. viii. 35, 38, 39, is not at all relevant to the subject. There is no point whatever in Mr. Lee's comments on the passage. Of course nothing but sin can separate the Christian from the love of Christ; his being asleep in the dust of the earth does not intercept the love Christ has for him; and, consequently, in proof of his great and abiding love for him, he "raises him up at the last day."

What Mr. Lee says on this text may serve to fill up his book, but the intelligent reader will fail to detect any proof of his position, or relevancy to the question in hand.

Mr. Lee remarks—that "to be the object of the love of God involves conscious existence;" if so, what "world" was that which "God so loved" that he gave his Son for it? I opine, thousands of persons, for whom Christ died, and whom God loved prospectively, had no "conscious existence" at that time. Mr. Lee is the most incautious writer I have ever read. Scarcely a sentence can be harmonized with the Holy Scriptures.

3. The argument founded on 2 Cor. v. 1–8, has been answered several times before, but Mr. Lee makes it a rule "not to know an argument" on the opposite side. Let us examine the text: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God; a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." This verse stands connected with the last verse of the preceding chapter, where Paul contrasts "things seen and unseen, things temporal and eternal." And then, speaking of those temporal things, which constitute our earthly house of dwelling, he says, "if this dwelling were dissolved," as Peter taught it would be, "we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Not in "heaven" above, as Mr. Lee imagines; but "in the new heavens and earth"—a city whose builder and maker is God; for which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob looked, as well as all those worthies enumerated by Paul. "For in this" dwelling place "we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed," or invested, "with our house," or building, "which is from heaven: if so be that being clothed," invested, "we shall not be found naked," or destitute. "For we that are in this tabernacle," or dwelling place, "do groan, being burdened; not because we would be uncloted," naked or destitute, "but clothed," or invested with an "eternal" dwelling place, "a building of God—not made with" human "hands"—"that mortality might be swallowed up by life."

In Rom. viii. 22, 23, Paul speaks of this "groaning" and waiting for the adoption—the redemption, or resurrection of the body. Now Paul did not wish to be unclothed, naked, or destitute; but he desired to be invested with that tabernacle, or dwelling place, into which he would be introduced when "mortality is swallowed up by life."

"Now," says he, "he that hath wrought us for this same thing, [a resurrection to life,] is God, who also hath given to us the earnest of the Spirit." "Therefore, [because we have the earnest of the Spirit,] we are always confident, [or full of confidence:] knowing that, while we are at home in the [mortal] body, we are absent from the Lord: (for we walk by faith, not by sight.) We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the [mortal] body, [in the sense of having it swallowed up by life,] and to be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labor, that whether present [with the Lord,] or absent [from him,] we may be accepted by him," when he shall come. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things in body, according to what he hath done, whether good or bad." Such is the meaning of the whole paragraph, I conceive, according to the text and context.

The Apostle did not desire to die; this is not the subject before him; neither did he desire to be without a tabernacle, or dwelling place; but he earnestly desired to be "clothed" and this he explains by "mortality being swallowed up by life." Mortality is not swallowed up by life at death; but, rather, life is swallowed up by mortality. The whole structure of the passage is incompatible with Mr. Lee's view; nor can he harmonize it, according to his theory, with other parts of God's word; nor, indeed, with itself. Mr. Lee has wrested it from its connexion, and pressed it into his service. His doctrine is not in it, nor can he prove it legitimately by it.

4. Mr. Lee's next argument is based on 2 Cor. xii. 2–4. "I knew a man in Christ," &c. (see the passage.) His first deduction from this, is, "the body and mind are two distinct things." I wonder how often Mr. Lee will repeat this. The mind and body, Mr. Lee, are not the same; but for you thence to infer that either the one or the other can be conscious separately, shocks all common sense.

The only real point of discussion in this text, is involved in the phrase—"Whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell." Mr. Lee, and all others, on his side of this question, supposes this text to prove the possibility of a man's being out of his body in a literal sense. But, I apprehend, to interpret the passage literally would be equivalent to saying a man could be out of himself, which is an absurdity. I understand the apostle simply to say, that he did not know whether, in his "vision," he was bodily caught away, or simply transported in mind, and thus mentally wrapt in "visions and revelations" of the future. And one thing is certain, if Paul's case was as Mr. Lee has represented it, Paul's body was dead, and he must have been raised from the dead after his vision ceased! Mr. Lee stumbles at the idea of Moses being raised from the dead; but, I opine, he will have to take the position that Paul was, if his doctrine be true. Having examined this passage fully before, we merely make the above remarks on it, that we may not seem to omit any thing said by Mr. Lee.

5. Mr. Lee refers to Eph. i. 10, in proof of his position. He misunderstands, and misapplies this text. The "dispensation of the fulness of time" is doubtless the age to come, when Christ will be the head of all political and ecclesiastical power on earth. Men will then be united, or "collected, in one" vast empire, so that the "things in the heavens"—political, "and on the earth," will be "under Christ." This text knows nothing of Mr. Lee's subject.

6. He also quotes chap. iii. 15, "of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." The being referred to here is the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." The family spoken of, is the family of the Father; and the text seems to indicate that the whole intelligent creation is referred to; but, whether this be true or not, the angels in heaven and saints on earth constitute one great family.

HONEST FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

BY JOHN RYLAND, M. A., ENGLAND, 1775.

In the conduct of my studies, many years ago, I fixed as an unalterable rule, that I would take nothing upon trust, but as far as possible see every thing with my own eyes, and feel the truth of every great subject of religion in my own mind, as the result of rational and solid conviction.

As I am fully convinced of the absolute necessity of a divine revelation, so I have inquired with the utmost care and deliberation into the possibility of it, and have proceeded to consider the nature of inspiration, as far as I could attain clear and determinate ideas on such a most delicate and sublime subject.

I have found by happy experience, that if a man have an honest love of truth, a just sense of the defects of his own mind, an humble dependence on God to assist him in laying aside prejudices, and if he proceed with caution and by slow and sure steps, there is no subject in the whole system of truth and religion but what he may investigate, so far as it hath a relation to his duty and happiness.

It is the greatest honor to a human character to be an honest inquirer after truth; and although I will not say I have attained this character, yet I will dare to affirm that I love and admire it, and I wish to possess so great an excellence.

As I write chiefly for my young friends, I will endeavor to give them the outlines of such a character; in order that they may keep it ever before their eyes, and feel a generous ambition to be what they love and revere.

All persons, who devote themselves to the study of religion and the pursuit of learning, profess themselves free inquirers after truth, and rational freethinkers; but if we try many of them by the true and eternal rules of just freethinking, we shall find them wanting in all the essential qualities of a true freethinker; and if my idea of freethinking be right, we may justly say, "How few honest and free searchers after truth are there to be found in the world; how arduous the labor; how honorable the character.

A most sincere and honest freethinker is just the opposite to an infidel, a skeptic, a sophist. An infidel is not willing that all should be true, which God has declared to be true. A skeptic doubts every thing, and is sure of nothing. A sophist attempts to impose on your understanding the most specious errors in the garb of truth; he deludes you with the shadow instead of the substance of the truth. Not so the honest freethinker: he is just the reverse of such odious and contemptible characters; he is heartily willing that all should be true, whether by reason or revelation. He is resolved to submit to evidence as fast as it shall arise before the eyes of his mind, and he scorns to impose one single thought on mankind, of which he is not fully convinced in his own conscience.

But to possess this glorious character, the mind must be smitten with the beauties and charms of truth; we must be purified from every species of lust, pride, and extravagant self-love; we must be cured of our boundless self-admiration, and fond desires of a vain distinction; we must be made honest in the very essence of the soul for ever.

He has an ardent love to truth, merely on account of its excellent nature, beauty, and goodness; he loves it purely for its own sake: an infidel does not; he doth not love truth for its own intrinsic goodness and beauty. The good man fears no consequences that can follow from truth, and therefore he lays open his whole soul to the light of evidence, and is determined to follow wherever truth shall lead the way.

He is willing from the very bottom of his soul to divest himself of all prejudices and to put off all opinions and notions, that will not stand the test of severe and impartial examination.

He is resolved to use all the best helps that God has put in his power, or laid within his reach for the attainment of truth.

He is determined to embrace truth, even all truth, wherever he meets with it, and from whatsoever hand it comes: whether from a throne or a dunghill; a palace or a cottage; from a child, a Newton, or a Paul.

He is invariably resolved to buy the truth at any rate, and sell it at no price; but will rather part with all that is dear to him in this world, than part with this jewel. He will give up his name, his estate, his blood and life, rather than betray or part with the truth. He makes an honest use of his reason to find out truth, or the real nature and relation of things.

He uses his understanding in such modes of operation as these: (viz.) in considering the degree of evidence or clear appearance of truth in the mind:—in determining to judge according to the apparent strength or weakness of the evidence before him, on any important question:—in ballancing evidence on both sides of a question, and embracing that side on which the weight of evidence preponderates.

Honest freethinking gloriously appears in thus considering impartially the nature of the evidence for or against any point that is proposed to us for truth.

A man of this spirit and disposition looks upon it as bondage of thought, and the mark of a low slavish soul, to contradict or despise a truth without inquiring into it, merely because it has been commonly received, for a thousand or seventeen hundred years past. Such is the bondage and slavery of soul in all those who contradict or despise the evidences of divine revelation.

True freethinking does not consist in a power or right to dissent from the eternal principles of right reason and truth, but in being superior to vile bigotry and low prejudices, which imprison and debase the soul.

An honest and generous freethinker is not attached to any low party or faction in divinity or philosophy; nor is he a slave to his own vile passions, or to the passions or humours of other men: he scorns to be under the arbitrary will, or the tyrannic pleasure and influence of his superiors, in mere civil power, or worldly honors and emoluments—but truth, eternal, almighty, and all amiable truth, is the sovereign of his soul, the empress of his heart. He dedicates himself to truth alone, and aims and wishes to be for ever a disciple to pure and beautiful truth.

An honest freethinker will not suffer himself to be driven from truth by the faults or the foolishness of those that profess it. He does not forsake revealed truth, and leave it bleeding in the dust, on account of sneaking and impure hypocrites, artful impostors, or imperious tyrants, who profess it and disgrace it; and are the curse and bane of the most sacred and beautiful system in the world.

To conclude this sketch of the beautiful character of an honest freethinker:—He disdains the thought of a secret indulgence of sensual lusts, or the foul appetites of the flesh:—he knows that a gratification of the unclean inclinations of his body, are utterly inconsistent with all greatness of soul, and generous freedom of thought.

An honest free inquirer after truth scorns to persist in an error, because he has in some things, and at sometimes, made a mistake, or formed a wrong apprehension of some objects.

He is not ashamed nor afraid to say, at such a time, or in such an affair, "I was mistaken."

This is not the temper of our modern deists, who having from some bad springs rejected divine revelation, and set themselves up as advocates for natural religion alone, their pride prompts them to persist in the way of error, and they disdain the thought of acknowledging themselves in the wrong.

Not so the true freethinker: he accounts it a victory to conquer his own pride; and to change an error for truth, he esteems an eternal gain.

"Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest."

This text, by some, is thought to support the age to come doctrine. Now, though we do not believe the events prophesied in the book of Revelation are consecutive in every case, still we think the connections of this text will enable us to fix its chronology, which will assist to an understanding of it. To our mind it is quite clear that chap. xiii. presents papacy, merging into and succeeded by the revived dragon, and that this scene ends with the 5th verse of chap. xiv., because the Lamb stands on Mount Zion and begins the establishment of his kingdom in the time of dragon (devil) supremacy; hence the two are seen at the same time; that is, in the same vision.

Then commences another line of prophecy with verse 6, chap. xiv., presenting the great movements to instruct all nations that the judgment day is at hand, in which time papacy falls; this chapter finishes with the reaping time. But up to this time we have had the narrative of but two woe trumpets; which provides for a third, to our mind, this side of the French Revolution; and inasmuch as Rev. xv. 1 says, in the seven last plagues "is filled up the wrath of God," we conclude the seven last plagues comprise the third and last woe; which began to be poured out about the beginning of this century; but we trust no one ever thought they (the vials) would be finished in another age; no, surely in this.

Now, what is equally clear, chap. xv. introduces this interesting affair, while chap. xvi., to the close, details the pouring out of these vials. This would locate the prophecy in this age beyond dispute. If this be correct, then it is just to conclude that whatsoever is said in this connection is suggested by the circumstances, and hence applicable to that time, and not to be put in the future; and in keeping with this they sing, "For all nations shall come and—proskunesousin—shall prostrate—shall do homage before thee; because thy righteous judgments are made manifest;" (in the pouring out of the vials), while they are passing, not after they have passed. And who see that they are "righteous judgments"? the unbelieving? Where is such a doctrine taught in the bible? No, but the righteous. To this agrees the prophet: "For when thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants (a class) will learn righteousness. Let favor be shown to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness; in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, and will not behold the majesty of the Lord. Lord, when thy hand is lifted up they will not see (in time to profit), but they shall see, and be ashamed for their envy at thy (righteous) people; yea, the fire of (prepared for) thine enemies shall devour them." Isa. xxvi. 9–11.

In harmony with this, the "Emphatic Diaglott" gives the Vatican Manuscript, No. 1160, as authority for omitting "all nations," which would leave the text "for all shall come and worship before thee," leaving the sense to determine what "all" shall come. Again, we do not see any intimation that chap. xv. introduces any considerable part of the saints (as the age to come theory has it) but only that portion that "have gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name;" which quite probably represents that portion of the saints who have come in contact with the beast, &c., and rejoice to see and understand God's just judgments upon the wicked powers and institutions of earth, while they are saved out of them.

Beside, there is some collateral argument in this book to sustain the foregoing.

1st. Chap. xi.. Under the sounding of the seventh angel the kingdom of this world becomes the Lord's and his Christ's; being transferred from the kings, emperors, and other potentates, who have long had authority in the world; which transfer makes the nations mad, and involves their destruction: "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants, the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them which corrupt the earth." verse 18. This text, to our mind, is in keeping with the general tenor of the scriptures, and represents the feeling of the great bulk of the inhabitants of the different nations concerning the transfer of power to the Son of God; but it is very probable that there will be many among the people in these times of judgment, war, famine, and pestilence, that will learn righteousness, and be saved, that otherwise would not be saved; even now, it may be seen in this war; the widowed mother loses her darling boy in the fierce fight; he was her only prop on earth; she looks to heaven for a prop now; the wife with her little ones clinging to her is widowed; she is desolate, and looks to the widow's God for succor now; but what of the nation in general? They whet their sword for a fight with England, and dance and revel, and dress with harder hearts over the green graves of half a million of their countrymen.

2d. In keeping with this, chap. xix. presents a great battle. "And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army." Here they are fighting mad. This does not look much like doing homage before God, no; they are slain by the Lord Jesus; verse 21.

3d. Chap. xx. appears to present the great executive judgment day upon all people which is so thorough and complete that when its turmoil and confusion is past, there bursts, upon the sight of the Seer "a new heaven, and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away." Rev. xxi. 1. Neither is there any mention of probation again; but chap. xxi. presents the holy city blazing with the glory of God and the Lamb, and the "nations of them which are saved (not left) walk in the light of it. And the kings of the earth (made and appointed by the Lord Jesus) do bring their glory and honor into it." Verse 24.

With this view, we think, the best harmony of God's revelation is attained; but shall strive by the grace of God to keep in a frame of mind to receive instruction upon this, as well as all other questions, and hope that all, by exchanging thoughts, will reconcile differences, and mutually grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

Br. E. W. has his view of the Apocalypse, with which we shall not meddle. Whatever the book teaches, it can not conflict with the word of God as "spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets since the world began." But we are interested in preserving the integrity of God's word, and therefore we speak.

Our brother's argument depends on the omission of the word "nations" from the text. That would be an easy method of overthrowing the obnoxious doctrine, perhaps, if it were justifiable. If that terrible "age to come" is to be disposed of only by taking away "from the words of the book of this prophecy," we think it will scarcely pay.

As to the "Emphatic Diaglott," the less it is trusted on critical points, the better. Give us the opinions and statements of men who know whereof they affirm, and who are competent to judge in such matters.

It is said that the "Vatican Manuscript, No. 1160" omits "all nations" from the text. Our brother thinks that this "leaves the sense to determine what 'all' shall come." And this after striking out "all"! Admitting that the word "nations" is not found in the Manuscript referred to—what of it? Many other and far more authoritative MSS. contain the word.

The two leading MSS. of the Apocalypse are the Codex Alexandrinus and the Codex Ephræmi, both of the fifth century, and both have the reading; whereas, the Vatican MS. 1160, dates as late as the thirteenth century. Besides, this is not the best Vatican MS. of the Apocalypse. The oldest Vatican MS., No. 1209, does not contain the Apocalypse, but it has a supplementary MS. of the eighth century that does; and its attachment to No. 1209 shows that it is the principal Vatican copy. Will any one deny that it has the reading in question? There are two other Vatican MSS. of the same date as No. 1160. Will any one say that they omit the word? Other leading MSS. of the eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries have the reading. No critical student of the New Testament MSS. would dream of striking out "nations" from the text in question. The word is also found in the quotations of Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, third century, Andreas, Bishop of Cæsarea in Capadocia, sixth century, and Primasius, sixth century. See Alford's Greek Testament for the foregoing information. Let us have standard and trustworthy authority.

Another consideration confirms the reading. Verses 3, 4, are to be read together. "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of THE NATIONS. [This reading is the true one, and is adopted by all the critics—Griesbach, Scholz, Lachman, Tischendorf, Alford, &c.] Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy; for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." Here we have quotations from two passages in the Old Testament. The first is Jer. x. 7. "Thou art great, and thy name is great in might. Who would not fear thee, O King of nations?" The second is from Psa. lxxxvi. 8, 9. "Among Elohim there is none like unto thee, O Lord; neither are there any works like unto thy works. All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name. For thou art great, and doest wondrous things; thou art God alone." The writer of the Apocalypse goes to the Old Scriptures for his assertion that "all nations shall come and worship," and merely adds the reason of the fulfilment of the prophecy: "Thy judgments are made manifest." Now it is not worth while to strike out the quotation of "nations" in the Apocalypse unless we are willing to treat the Psalmist in the same way.

With the retention of the word in question, our brother's argument falls to the ground, and as we have vindicated the integrity of the text as it stands, another exposition is necessary.

J. T. C.

LUTHER LEE ON IMMORTALITY.

In Mr. Lee's article, No. 15, he bases an argument, in favor of the consciousness of the dead, on Luke xxiii: 42–43, and 46. The things to be examined in these passages are these:

1. The thief's request—"Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom."
2. Our Lord's answer—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."
3. Christ commending his spirit to God.
4. His giving up the ghost.

We may remark, on the first point, that the thief desired to be remembered at a particular time which he specifies, viz: "when thou comest into thy kingdom."

The Lord has not even yet come into his kingdom, and consequently, the theif's desire has not been realized. Christ's kingdom will be on earth—his throne in Jerusalem, and his dominion fill the world! When he comes into this kingdom, he will "come on the clouds of heaven," and the righteous dead will be raised to share the kingdom with him. The thief will then be with him, and realize his request.

On the second point, I will observe that, the Lord's answer is in perfect harmony with the thief's request—"To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," which is the kingdom referred to by the thief.

The word Paradeisos, a Persian word adopted into the Hebrew, and used by the "Seventy," in the Septuagint Greek of the Old Testament, to signify a park, a forest, a garden of trees of various kinds, a delightful grove, the garden of Eden. This word is never used to express the state or condition of the dead; neither is it the place of dead men's "ghosts!" Paul was caught away to, or had "a vision" of paradise; and in Rev. ii. 7., the Lord says—"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." (See, also, Rev. xxii;) The terms kingdom and paradise fix the meaning of the whole passage. The phrase "to-day" or "this day" must therefore be referred to the day of Christ's "coming into his kingdom." The Lord's answer is equivalent to his having said—I will remember you at the day, time, or period of which you speak. The term day, often refers to a time, or period, and not to a literal day. "Thou art to pass over Jordan this day." Deut. xi. 1. And yet they did not pass that day. In Gen. ii. 4, 17. "In the day (time or period) when God made the heavens and the earth." "To-day if you will hear his voice," &c. "Now is the day of salvation," &c., Heb. iii. 16. This day of salvation has lasted 1800 years.

Mr. Lee contends that Paradise means heaven above. In this he is utterly wrong; but, suppose, for the sake of argument, we grant it, and then what follows? why it follows that Jesus Christ did not go there; for he says to Mary after his resurrection—"Touch me not: for I have not yet ascended to my Father," &c.

Christ commended his spirit to his Father, and gave up the ghost. The Pneuma, here rendered spirit, signifies, when used in reference to man, the breath, or life, &c., and the word ekpneo, compounded of ek, out, and pneo, to breathe, and literally means to breathe out; so that the passage literally runs thus:—"Father, into thy hands I commend my life; and having said this, he breathed it out," expired or died.

Mr. Lee says—"Christ's soul, or ghost, which he commended into the hands of his Father and gave up, did not die with the body, and hence it was with it that the thief had the promise of being in paradise." While Mr. Lee was writing the above, he must have forgotten that "Christ's soul was poured out unto death"—that "it was made an offering for sin," and that in reference to it, it is said—"Thou wilt not leave my soul in the grave." Mr. Lee believes the soul goes to heaven at death, and, therefore, he comes under the condemnation of Justin Martyr, as well as the Bible.

Mr. Lee also refers to Acts vii. 59, where Stephen says—"Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." This belongs to the class of texts already examined. This phraseology occurs in Job. xxxii. 8. Peter, also, refers to the same when he exhorts those, who "suffer according to the will of God, to commit the keeping of their souls to God." Mr. Lee refers to Mr. Grew's view of this text, and thinks his rendering "a violation of common sense." As Mr. Lee's common sense is not mine, I fully indorse Mr. Grew's that the life is not a distinct substance, susceptible of consciousness without the material organization. Life, being an attribute, and not an entity, as Mr. Lee supposes, can have no consciousness apart from the man of whom it is an attribute.

2. The argument on Rom. viii. 35, 38, 39, is not at all relevant to the subject. There is no point whatever in Mr. Lee's comments on the passage. Of course nothing but sin can separate the Christian from the love of Christ; his being asleep in the dust of the earth does not intercept the love Christ has for him; and, consequently, in proof of his great and abiding love for him, he "raises him up at the last day."

What Mr. Lee says on this text may serve to fill up his book, but the intelligent reader will fail to detect any proof of his position, or relevancy to the question in hand.

Mr. Lee remarks—that "to be the object of the love of God involves conscious existence;" if so, what "world" was that which "God so loved" that he gave his Son for it? I opine, thousands of persons, for whom Christ died, and whom God loved prospectively, had no "conscious existence" at that time. Mr. Lee is the most incautious writer I have ever read. Scarcely a sentence can be harmonized with the Holy Scriptures.

3. The argument founded on 2 Cor. v. 1–8, has been answered several times before, but Mr. Lee makes it a rule "not to know an argument" on the opposite side. Let us examine the text: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God; a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." This verse stands connected with the last verse of the preceding chapter, where Paul contrasts "things seen and unseen, things temporal and eternal." And then, speaking of those temporal things, which constitute our earthly house of dwelling, he says, "if this dwelling were dissolved," as Peter taught it would be, "we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Not in "heaven" above, as Mr. Lee imagines; but "in the new heavens and earth"—a city whose builder and maker is God; for which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob looked, as well as all those worthies enumerated by Paul. "For in this" dwelling place "we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed," or invested, "with our house," or building, "which is from heaven: if so be that being clothed," invested, "we shall not be found naked," or destitute. "For we that are in this tabernacle," or dwelling place, "do groan, being burdened; not because we would be uncloted," naked or destitute, "but clothed," or invested with an "eternal" dwelling place, "a building of God—not made with" human "hands"—"that mortality might be swallowed up by life."

In Rom. viii. 22, 23, Paul speaks of this "groaning" and waiting for the adoption—the redemption, or resurrection of the body. Now Paul did not wish to be unclothed, naked, or destitute; but he desired to be invested with that tabernacle, or dwelling place, into which he would be introduced when "mortality is swallowed up by life."

"Now," says he, "he that hath wrought us for this same thing, [a resurrection to life,] is God, who also hath given to us the earnest of the Spirit." "Therefore, [because we have the earnest of the Spirit,] we are always confident, [or full of confidence:] knowing that, while we are at home in the [mortal] body, we are absent from the Lord: (for we walk by faith, not by sight.) We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the [mortal] body, [in the sense of having it swallowed up by life,] and to be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labor, that whether present [with the Lord,] or absent [from him,] we may be accepted by him," when he shall come. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things in body, according to what he hath done, whether good or bad." Such is the meaning of the whole paragraph, I conceive, according to the text and context.

The Apostle did not desire to die; this is not the subject before him; neither did he desire to be without a tabernacle, or dwelling place; but he earnestly desired to be "clothed" and this he explains by "mortality being swallowed up by life." Mortality is not swallowed up by life at death; but, rather, life is swallowed up by mortality. The whole structure of the passage is incompatible with Mr. Lee's view; nor can he harmonize it, according to his theory, with other parts of God's word; nor, indeed, with itself. Mr. Lee has wrested it from its connexion, and pressed it into his service. His doctrine is not in it, nor can he prove it legitimately by it.

4. Mr. Lee's next argument is based on 2 Cor. xii. 2–4. "I knew a man in Christ," &c. (see the passage.) His first deduction from this, is, "the body and mind are two distinct things." I wonder how often Mr. Lee will repeat this. The mind and body, Mr. Lee, are not the same; but for you thence to infer that either the one or the other can be conscious separately, shocks all common sense.

The only real point of discussion in this text, is involved in the phrase—"Whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell." Mr. Lee, and all others, on his side of this question, supposes this text to prove the possibility of a man's being out of his body in a literal sense. But, I apprehend, to interpret the passage literally would be equivalent to saying a man could be out of himself, which is an absurdity. I understand the apostle simply to say, that he did not know whether, in his "vision," he was bodily caught away, or simply transported in mind, and thus mentally wrapt in "visions and revelations" of the future. And one thing is certain, if Paul's case was as Mr. Lee has represented it, Paul's body was dead, and he must have been raised from the dead after his vision ceased! Mr. Lee stumbles at the idea of Moses being raised from the dead; but, I opine, he will have to take the position that Paul was, if his doctrine be true. Having examined this passage fully before, we merely make the above remarks on it, that we may not seem to omit any thing said by Mr. Lee.

5. Mr. Lee refers to Eph. i. 10, in proof of his position. He misunderstands, and misapplies this text. The "dispensation of the fulness of time" is doubtless the age to come, when Christ will be the head of all political and ecclesiastical power on earth. Men will then be united, or "collected, in one" vast empire, so that the "things in the heavens"—political, "and on the earth," will be "under Christ." This text knows nothing of Mr. Lee's subject.

6. He also quotes chap. iii. 15, "of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." The being referred to here is the "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." The family spoken of, is the family of the Father; and the text seems to indicate that the whole intelligent creation is referred to; but, whether this be true or not, the angels in heaven and saints on earth constitute one great family.

HOMO.

When comparing opinions or practices with the standard of God's word we must beware, lest we suffer these opinions or practices to bend the rule by which they are to be measured.—Bishop Whately.

Let Us Try Our Own Spirits.

In talking of the penalty of sin, God's penalty, that the wages of sin is death, &c., we find some, even professed christians, who have personal enemies, and they can not feel satisfied unless these enemies are to have more punishment than "simple death." They say, "Why, God could not be just and let these fellows pass; let them perish for ever in death, and not bring them up to see that we have been right and they wrong. They have all that heart can wish in this world; they have got all this by oppressing us and others, and wont God bring them up to torment them? for they have had no trouble in this life." Thus they speak of personal enemies.

Others who may have no personal revenge, or have not simplicity enough to say so, speak of it in more general terms. Such an one we met the other day, a minister of the gospel, too. He took up several passages of scripture, and tried to turn them to his own advantage. For instance, when it says in Luke xx. "Neither can they die any more," he said that meant that some would die twice. And again, in Acts xxiv. 15, "And have hope toward God which they themselves also allow." He said the they referred to the law and the prophets. We tried to show him that he wrested these scriptures; and also that Jesus suffered the penalty when he gave up his animal life to take it up no more. For he was put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the Spirit. If Jesus suffered the penalty, then that penalty was death; if he did not, then we have no Saviour, and consequently no atonement; hence they also which have fallen asleep in Christ must perish. But he went on to talk largely of what christians have suffered in this life at the hands of cruel men; how they had oppressed and killed the just, and they had not resisted them; and would not God in justice raise up these fellows to show before angels and men that they were wrong, and thus torment them?

We have thought of the subject considerable since, and compared that spirit of retribution with the spirit of the bible. We know that David had cruel and wicked enemies, and that he prayed for wrath to come upon them; but do we ever find David asking God to raise him up from the dead and set him in a place of honor at his right hand; and also raise his enemies up to life, set them at his left, thus bring them face to face, place David's foes there before an assembled world, torment them in the worst way imaginable, then kill them a second time? No, David looked upon the wicked more as the enemies of God than his own; and he prayed, let God arise, let his enemies be scattered; let them also that hate him flee before him. As smoke is driven away, so drive them away; as wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of the Lord. David wanted them out of existence; he did not want evil to come up a second time. He said, "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity;" for they shall be raised up to life when Christ comes, and you shall have full vengeance or retribution on them, and see them killed a second time? No, no, "For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither like the green herb. Evil doers shall be cut off. The wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away." Thus David writes in many places. Let us take heed to our spirit; and let us consider our enemies God's enemies, and leave all their repaying to him.

Let us hear Jesus on the subject. He says, "I say unto you, love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you; that you may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." Let us take care; we need these enemies to develop our character; to see if we will be perfect even as our father in heaven is perfect.

But did Jesus show this spirit himself? Let us see. We find that he went about continually doing good; that he healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, &c.; and in return, was falsely accused, spit upon, and even condemned to death. Did he then ask his Father, at some future day, to raise to life those his murderers, and clear him before an assembled universe? No, no. He prayed with his dying breath, Father, forgive them, they know not what they do. If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. Let us examine our own selves.

But are we able to come up to this standard? Let us see. We have an example in Stephen. He was a man, but full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. We find him full of faith and power; did great wonders and miracles among the people. How did they repay him for these his good deeds to them? They disputed with him; stirred up the people, the elders and scribes; set up false witnesses, and unjustly brought him to judgment. He spoke the truth to them; but they stopped their ears, cried with a loud voice, and ran upon him with one accord; cast him out of the city, and stoned him to death.

Did he then cry for a future tribunal and retribution? No. He kneeled down and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge; and when he had said this, he fell asleep. In order to exhibit this spirit of forgiveness, we must become partakers of the divine nature. Father help us. Amen.

No Paper Next Week.

As this number goes out to our subscribers, the EDITOR will be on his way to the Quarterly Conference, of the Life and Advent Union, at Providence, R. I., and will not return in time to get out a paper next week, but hopes to have out No. 15 early the week after. Please bear this notice in mind, so that you shall not think you have lost a paper by not getting one next week.

The True State of the Case.

The Advent Herald, Boston, in 1862, then edited by SYLVESTER BLISS, since deceased, speaking of those who hold to life only through Christ, said:

"There is an important issue here involved,—between the two classes of those claiming to hold 'no life out of Christ.' For if life there means existence, it would preclude the resurrection of the wicked; but if that life is a specific condition of existence, it knocks from under [them] the prop on which unconsciousness rests. The advocates of final extinction of being, and yet holding the resurrection of the wicked, are in a dilemma,—either horn of which is fatal to them. For, to be consistent, they must give up either the one or the other of those positions."

We thanked the Herald for saying thus much. That is the true state of the case. Prove the wicked dead have a resurrection into life—by which we mean a living "existence"—and we will yield the whole argument: for "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, even the resurrection from the dead....cannot die any more." There is no "final extinction of being" to any soul of man who lives again from the dead at the last day. Settle the point that all men will have a revival into a living state from the dead, and one of two things inevitably follows, viz., eternal misery to the wicked, or universal salvation and glory. "The advocates of final extinction of being, and yet holding the resurrection of the wicked, are," truly, in a sad "dilemma;" and to them it is a "fatal" one. They came up to the crowning truth of the theory of "No life out of Christ," viz., "No life from the dead for the wicked," and here they halted, stumbled, and fell. They are like those disciples, who at the close of Jesus great life sermon, John vi. said, "This is a hard saying: who can hear it?" From that time they "went back and walked no more with Him." So we expect it will be now. It is impossible to maintain the position they at present occupy.

Everything in that Book.

The study of the scriptures is the most important and useful of all studies. The surprise of Gen. Putnam at the apt selection of a text by Dr. Dwight to preach a sermon to the army, after the surrender of Gen. Burgoyne, is thus set forth in Headley's Chaplains and Clergy of the Revolution, published by Scribner:

"The news of the surrender reached camp on Saturday. Next day Dwight preached at headquarters. Putnam and his principal officers were present, and never before did the young chaplain seem so inspired. His patriotic heart, like that of the meanest soldier, had been thrown into ecstacy at the glorious tidings, and it was now too full and too eager for utterance, to require any preparation. Rising before his attentive, brilliant auditory, he took for his text Joel ii. 20—'I will remove far from you the Northern army.' The effect of its enunciation was astonishing, and seemed like a voice from heaven, reminding them of the deliverance so often promised by the chaplain.

"The language of the chapter applied with wonderful force to the invasion and overthrow of Burgoyne. The 'day of darkness and gloominess, the day of clouds and thick darkness' had indeed come upon them. Before the resistless legions of Burgoyne, the inhabitants of the land had fled in terror, and desolation marked their progress. It was a time for 'the ministers of the Lord to weep between the porch and the altar,' and cry, 'Spare thy people, O Lord.' Their prayer had been answered, and now they could shout aloud, 'Fear not O land, be glad and rejoice." The theme was one peculiarly adapted to Dwight's glowing imagination and enthusiastic patriotism. He painted in vivid colors the terror and dismay this northern invasion had spread through the land, described the victory and the exultation of the people, giving God all the glory, and declaring he saw in it the bright assurance of final triumph.

"The officers and soldiers were carried away by his eloquence, and Putnam was especially delighted, and did not attempt to conceal his pleasure, but nodded and smiled in delighted approval through the discourse, though he did not for a moment suppose the text was in the bible, but rather an inference which Dwight had drawn from the preceding passages.

"After service was over, he was loud in expressions of admiration of the sermon and the preacher, but remarked at the same time to some of his officers, that of course there was no such text in the bible, and that it was made up by Dwight for the occasion. The officers smiled in reply, saying that Dwight had taken no such liberty with the sacred volume, for the text was really in it.

"Putnam, however, stoutly denied it, and refused to yield the point till one of them brought a bible and pointed it out to him. He could at first hardly believe his eyes, yet there it was, beyond all cavil. He read it over carefully, and then exclaimed, 'Well, there is everything in that book, and Dwight knows just where to lay his finger on it.'

[If people would study their bible more, they would not only find "everything in that book," but they would be saved from many theological errors now imposed on them, and would find consolation and support always at hand, all through life, and under all circumstances; yea, they would become "mighty in the scriptures," and be able to confound or convince all gainsayers. O, that all felt the value of that precious book.—EDITOR OF HER.

The Return of Israel in the Flesh.

Why should they not return? Have not the prophets declared it? Is it not clearly laid down in the plan of God, as recorded in his word? Does it not vindicate God's declarations to the fathers?

But here we are met by a question: "Is it according to the Gospel plan, to hold out a hope or promise of entering the inheritance in the flesh, without a resurrection of the dead?" We answer—The plan of Life in Jesus Christ implies the incorruptibility of all who attain the kingship with him. Abraham, and all who have died in the faith of Abraham, are heirs, not merely of the covenanted land, but of the whole earth. "The greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." The mistake of the questioner consists in ignoring that class who will inherit the land, not as kings, but as subjects. The kings are sometimes called by way of distinction from the rest of the seed of Abraham—"the seed of David." "Thus saith YAHVEH, If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night....then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne....As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured; so will I multiply the seed of David my servant....Thus saith YAHVEH, If my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, so that I will not take of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them."—Jer. xxxiii. 20–26.

The fact that God taught Abraham that his personal realization of the promise depended on his resurrection from the dead by no means proves that no one can have its blessings without a resurrection. The two classes of Abraham's seed must be distinguished—the seed of David in Christ, the immortal kings—and the seed of Jacob who are to return from captivity, and be visited with God's "mercy." The seed of David are the rulers; the seed of Jacob are the ruled, and each class in its allotted sphere is to inherit the land.

But some are afraid that ungodly persons will possess the inheritance. Never fear. The same word that predicts the restoration shows that the people will be righteous. See Isa. lx. 21, 22. Ezek. xxxvi. 8–38, xxxvii. 21–28. Ps. cx 3. Jer. xxxii. 37–42, xxxiii. 7–16, xxxi. 27–37.

J. T. C.

Prof. Mattison on Immortality.

The other day we remarked on the endorsement of this book by the Christian Advocate and Journal. It is that endorsement which renders the work worthy of notice. Prof. M.'s true character was effectually manifested in the discussion with George Storrs in 1854, and all who are familiar with the details will not care a straw for Prof. M's opinion on this or any other topic. But in view of the fact that many will depend on the work on account of the C. A. and J., we propose to review some portions of it. We shall not follow any particular course, but each article will be independent, so that any one else who is disposed may "pitch in"—as the Professor, with classical elegance, remarked in his letter to G. S.—Jan. 11, 1855.

The first chapter lays down the worn-out and exploded theory of the "distinction between matter and spirit." Every thing that the Professor takes cognizance of with his "natural senses" he calls matter, and everything that cannot be thus recognized he calls spirit. He knows matter by its "qualities, or attributes, or phenomena" but he declares that "intelligence, reason, judgment, memory, consciousness, reflection and hope are not known to belong to matter." He then divides the universe "into matter and spirit. On the one side of this boundary line, are God and angels, and the spirits of men; and on the other side all things material, whether animal, vegetable, or mineral; organic or inorganic; fluids, or solids; atoms, worlds, or systems."

Give a false theory rope and it will hang itself. The following is from the second chapter:

First, The Lord God "formed man of the dust of the ground." This was of course a material body. There it lay, perfect in all its parts, but cold and motionless. The bones, and muscles, and tendons, and veins, and heart, and arteries, and brain, and nerves, and lungs, and eyes, and ears, were all in place and ready for action; but as yet, there was no consciousness, nor sensation, nor life, nor motion. The heart had never throbbed, nor the lungs respired. The brain could not think, nor the nerves feel. The eye could not see, the ear hear, nor the palate taste. And why not? Was not the animal organism perfect and complete? And if thought and reason are the result of animal organization alone, why could not the brain have thought, the nerves felt, and the eyes seen? What need of the "breath of life" to set this wonderful machinery in motion? But there was no life, no motion, no intelligence. The eye could no more see of itself than a refracting telescope. The ear could no more hear than a metallic ear trumpet. The quenchless fires of the immortal nature had not yet been kindled. The intelligent conscious spirit was not yet there.

Now let us put this and that together. The second chapter says that the body of man is a material nature. And so, says the first chapter, are all things animal—the beast of the field, the fowl of the air, the fish of the sea, &c. The second chapter says that muscles, nerves, lungs, eyes, ears, heart, brain, make up the material nature of man. And these belong to all things animal. But says the second chapter, the material nature of man had no consciousness, nor sensation, nor life, nor motion, until "the quenchless fires of the immortal nature had been kindled," until "the intelligent conscious spirit" had been added. Until this spirit was infused, "the brain could not think, nor the nerves feel. The eye could not see, the ear hear, nor the palate taste." What follows? Why, plainly, that the Professor has digged a ditch for himself. He has put "all things animal" in the material world, thereby denying that they have any thing to do with spirit; and yet he claims that the material machinery cannot act without the presence of spirit. How can the horse, the dog, the mouse, or the fly, any more than man, see without the "quenchless fires" of the immortal spirit? How can the fox, the rabbit, or the cat, hear? How can the ichneumon or the weasel taste? "The eye," says the Professor, "could no more see of itself than a refracting telescope. The ear could no more hear than a metallic ear trumpet." Is not this the cap-sheaf of stultiloquence? And it is such stuff that the C. A. and J. endorses.

The Professor has started with an assumption. He claims that "all things animal" are without "intelligence, reason, judgment, memory, consciousness, reflection and hope." Let us take one of these terms—"memory." Has not the dog memory? Every one that observes knows that he has. And so with many other animals. Every one of the mentioned attributes are possessed—to a very limited extent, we admit—by the brute creation. The students of nature all know this. Sir Benj. Brodie, for instance, affirms that "the mental principle in animals is of the same essence as that of human beings; so that even in the humbler classes we may trace the rudiments of those faculties to which, in their state of more complete development, we are indebted for the grandest results of human genius." This position is not affected by the immense distance between the mental development in the brute and that in man. There is a great diversity in this matter among the brutes themselves. The serpent is "more subtle" than many other creatures. Jesus said—"Be wise as serpents." The elephant evinces a great superiority over the cat. But does this manifest supereminence prove that one is immortal and the other not so?

If Prof. M. or any other supporter of the serpent's lie, wishes to be consistent in claiming that the mental principle is spiritual and immortal, let him take the ground of Dr. E Thomson—now a Bishop of the M. E. Church—late Editor of the C. A. and J. He says that the distinction so commonly drawn between the mental powers and the animal body "would prove also the immortality of brutes. At such a conclusion many revolt: no wonder, for it carries with it the immortality, not merely of horses and lions, but of frogs and flies." He then proceeds to defend the revolting theory. See his article in the Methodist Quarterly, January, 1860.

The division of the universe into material and immaterial is nonsensical. The fact is, everything is material—that is, everything is substance. Take away the substantiality and you take away the thing. But there are different kinds of substance. Man is one kind, God is another. Man is "flesh," "God is spirit;" but is it not folly to claim that God is any less a substance than man? Shall we make man something, and God nothing.

God has been pleased to place the creature man among "things animal." By nature, "man hath no preeminence [in respect of life] above a beast." "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath [or spirit—ruah]. Eccl. iii. 19. There is great force in the noble language of John Ruskin in his "Stones of Venice;" although it may be slightly defective in statement, yet we cannot do better than to present it as written: "All the divisions of humanity are noble or brutal, immortal or mortal according to the degree of their sanctification; and there is no part of man which is not immortal and divine when it is once given to God, and no part of him which is not mortal by the second death, and brutal before the first, when it is withdrawn from God. For to what shall we trust for our distinction from the beasts that perish? To our higher intellect? Yet are we not bidden to be as wise as the serpent, and to consider the ways of the ant? Or to our affections? Nay! these are more shared by the lowest animals than our intelligence! Hamlet leaps into the grave of his beloved, and leaves it—a dog had stayed. Humanity and immortality consist neither in reason nor in love, not in the body, nor in the animation of the heart of it, nor in the thoughts and stirrings of the brain of it, but in the dedication of them all to Him who will raise them up at the last day."

QUESTION.—Bro. Litch—Please inform us through the Herald, by what rule of chronology or anything else, Mr. Baxter keeps moving along the time of the return of our Lord?

H.

ANSWER.

We do not know of any rule for it. The evident reason is, the failure of former times fixed for certain events. We exceedingly regreat that it should do so. In doing so he is compelled to abandon his historical and chronological data; and, so far as we can see, his present periods, although uttered with a great deal of positiveness, are the result of pure conjecture and assumption, and therefore without a show of authority. We are willing to listen to any reasonable argument on the prophetic periods, founded on historical and chronological facts, but to require or expect faith on bare assertion is unreasonable. —Advent Herald.

God's Individual Plan.---No. 6.

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

We are now prepared to consider the condemnation by Adam; the common theory of which we regard as exceedingly erroneous and pernicious. It is supposed that because of Adam's sin as an individual, all his posterity were condemned. This is manifestly an unjust doctrine, because it involves the thousands of millions of Adam's children in a ruin which comes, not from any act or choice of their own, but from the momentary impulse of a single individual whom they never knew. If the United States' government should try and execute a criminal, and not content with his death, should proceed to pronounce sentence on all his offspring to the remotest generations, the decree would be greeted with the unanimous execration of the world. But what would be regarded as an high handed outrage, if perpetrated by human government, we have foolishly imputed to the Divine.

The injustice of such a decree is recognized by those who believe in it. Thus it is said: "We are not to blame for Adam's sin, and yet we suffer on account of his transgressions; and therefore justice demands that our natural life should be restored to us." And it is further held that Christ was introduced to restore this life "that man might have no injustice of which to complain." The shallowness of these statements is evident. The idea of mere worms demanding a future life on the score of justice is too silly to be entertained for a moment. But we refer to these arguments to show how the injustice of the common theory of condemnation is unwittingly recognized even by those who teach it. For when should we demand the restoratian of the Adamic life unless it has been unjustly taken from us?

And yet these selfsame impeachers of Divine justice, will, in the next breath, teach that the resurrection life that comes, as they think, to restore the equilibrium of the Divine economy, and which compensates for past wrong by future right, is a free gift. How a free gift can be claimed as a right can be seen only by the blind. Men who keep their eyes open can not fail to avoid such a ditch of inconsistency.

These absurdities find their protection in the false philosophy of condemnation, and the only alternative is to present the true one. We believe that the Edenic probation of Adam was instituted, not to determine his final individual destiny,—for it is not according to Divine procedure to hang an individual's fate upon a solitary violation; if it were, who would escape destruction?—but to fix the terms of probation for all, to show the standard of good and evil to all generations. And how it suits with the rectitude of the Divine character that this should be done at the beginning!

We have noticed how God's original purpose is accomplished in a double creation, how it is begun in the first Adam, and completed in the second, and how the present animal condition of man is necessarily a temporal thing, to be superseded eventually by the perfect state. If our earthly house of tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal and heavenly. We have also noticed how our ultimate fate depends on our choice—whether we prefer our present fleshly nature, or take hold of the spiritual in Christ Jesus. And here we shall find the standard of good and evil. The flesh leads us to gratify our fleshly passions, while the Spirit wooes us in the other direction. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other." Gal. v. 17. In the conflict of these two opposing forces character is evolved either for loss or gain, blessing or cursing, nonexistence or immortality. Is the antediluvian world destroyed? It is because they gave no heed to the striving Spirit. Gen. vi. 3. Are the fathers in the wilderness blotted out? John vi. 49–58. It is because they "vexed his holy Spirit." Isa. lxiii. 10. Heb. iii. 7–19. Acts vii. 51. Is any man beyond the reach of mercy? It is because he blasphemes the Holy Spirit. Matt. xii. 31, 32. On the other hand, is any one made free from the law of sin and death? It is by the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. Rom. viii. 2. Is any one sealed to the day of redemption? It is by the holy Spirit of promise. Eph. i. 13. Is any one adopted into the Divine family? It is by the Spirit of God. Rom. viii. 14, 15. Thus, evil consists in preferring the flesh, good in preferring the Spirit. But when was this standard definitely fixed, if not in the beginning? When was the fleshly nature of man condemned as sinful, if not in the beginning? When was the need of the holy Spirit demonstrated to mankind, if not in the beginning? It seems very clear to us that the flesh itself must have been put on trial, and found wanting ere the distinction and antagonism between the flesh and the Spirit could be established in the mind of man. And there is abundant reason to believe that this was done in the Edenic trial. Let us look at the facts.

We have shown that Adam was created mortal, and animal, and that he was not spiritual. 1 Cor, xv. 46. After his creation he was put in the garden of Eden. The garden of Eden was not his original dwelling place; he was put in it for a purpose. As soon as he entered Eden, his position was changed. Before, he was in a dying state, and tended to corruption; now, although still mortal in nature, yet the tree of life counteracts the law of dissolution, and by eating of its fruits Adam may protract his existence. While in Eden he will not die. But Eden is a type of the future. God is present there diffusing blessedness from his gracious countenance. And if God is there, his law is there. And what is the nature of God's law? "The law is spiritual." Rom. vii. 14. This law if obeyed, allows man to live on, for it is ordained for the life of all who agree with it. Rom. vii. 10. But here a query arises. If Adam is animal, and not spiritual, how can he harmonize with the spiritual law? Such a thing is an impossibility. His nature will irresistibly lead him to gratify his passions. This being so, the individual Adam is not on trial at all, for trial pre-supposes power of independent action. What then is on trial? The answer is given in a statement of the object of the trial. We have affirmed it to be to fix the standard of good and evil for all generations, to demonstrate the essential antagonism of man's nature to the Spirit. The trial is to show man's physical incapacity of agreeing with the spiritual law. "Law entered that the offence might abound." Rom. v. 20. The individual Adam is not on trial; it is Adam, the representative of the animal race. The nature is on trial. God demonstrates the natural unfitness of man to dwell in Eden. "Law" in Eden, as since, "worketh wrath" to the flesh. Rom. iv. 15. It was there and then proven that "the mind of the flesh is enmity against God;" that "it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Rom. viii. 7.

After the transgression the eyes of man "were opened" to his true condition. The trial of his nature taught him the standard of "good and evil." The evil was self evident. The flesh and the law were opposed. And now the Creator introduces the good. The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. The spiritual nature is offered. Although man can not agree with the spiritual law, yet there is hope for him in the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. The law can not give life to the flesh, but the promise of the Spirit will work a reconciliation for all who will partake of the reconciling element.

The standard of good and evil being fixed, God sent the man forth from Eden "to till the ground from whence he was taken." God had said, "In the day that thou eatest thou shalt surely die." Man's expulsion from Eden fulfilled the threat. The moment he left the tree of life, there was no healing element to save him from the principle of decay in his nature. Death was inevitable.

How I Have Been Led.

MALDEN, ILL., Jan. 1865

BR. STORRS:—I would like to say a few words through the columns of the Herald; and I hope no one's feelings may be hurt by what I shall have to say.

I have taken and read the Herald of Life from the time the first number was issued up to the present time, and have been very much pleased with most of the articles. I highly prize the doctrine of no life out of Christ: or, the final destruction of the wicked. I will state the reason why I was led to believe in the final destruction of the wicked.

About twenty-years ago, I read in the hearing of a friend of mine, from Rev. xx. 7, 9, thus: "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them."

My friend remarked, that if God devoured them, he did not understand how there could be anything more of them. I commenced from that time to search the scriptures on that particular question, and I found that they taught me different from what I had been taught by my parents and religious teachers. My human teachers had taught that man was immortal, and would exist as long as my Creator existed, either in a state of happiness or misery; that is, man would either enjoy the blessings of an etherial heavens somewhere, or suffer the torments of a hell beneath, enternally. But my divine Teacher taught another doctrine, viz., "That the wicked would be as though they never had been: yet a little while and the wicked shall not be: they shall consume away: they shall be burned up root and branch." They are like the pile of chaff that is burned up with an unquenchable fire. I learned from my divine Teacher, that man is mortal; that the dead know not any thing; that in the day that a man dies his thoughts perish. And the only way to gain immortality and eternal life, is through faith in Christ the LIFE-GIVER

I had believed that the wicked would have a resurrection, after the thousand years of millennium had past, and suffer that second death, that St. John speaks of in Rev. xx. And I must confess there are some things in the foregoing chapter that, to me, do not appear perfectly to harmonize with the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked to life; for it appears that the second death hath no power on such as have a part in the first resurrection: but whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire; and this is second death. I have thought that great company that is to encompass the camp of the saints about, after the thousand years, were the wicked dead that Satan went out to deceive, and to gather them together to battle. If it is not so, there must be wicked nations existing on the earth

Will some brother, versed in the scriptures, give us a little more light on that particular point? But with all these difficulties in the way, I am constrained to believe in the non-resurrection of the wicked to life, from the overwhelming number of passages found in the word of God, that are positive in their assertions; such as, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." "The wages of sin is death." "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." The wicked are to "remain in the congregation of the dead." "They shall be as though they had not been."

Now, if those that have a resurrection are raised with an immortal or spiritual body, which cannot die, I cannot conceive how the wicked can have a resurrection to life. However, I would like it if some one would explain the teachings of Rev. xx., so that it would harmonize with the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked to life.

LOVER OF TRUTH.

How Will You Make a Harmony?

In the Herald of Life, May 4, 1864, No. 28, this paragraph appears: "Jesus discouraged his disciples from entertaining the desire for ruling over one another, or lording it over others."

I am asked to harmonize my paragraph with the following: "Ye that have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall set up the throne of his glory, ye shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 28. We add the following, verse 29: "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters ....or lands, for my sake, shall receive an hundred fold (Luke has it "in the present time") and in the world to come everlasting life." This word, regeneration, occurs but twice in the new testament; in the above text, and in Tit. iii. 5.

In Ezekiel xxi. 27, we read that the Lord said, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is, and I will give it (to him)." Now we believe the regeneration spoken of in the above text does not refer to individuals, but to the kingdom of God, which John the Baptist and Jesus came preaching. Now if Israel had accepted of the terms that Jesus came to offer, he would have established them in their kingdom. He says, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered you, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." Here the conditions are all on the side of Israel, and they failed through their own neglect.

Now, that Jesus did come to perform the mercies which God promised to our fathers, is proven from the words of Zacharias, in Luke i. 67–80; and also, from the parable of our Lord, when he said the Lord of the vineyard sent forth the Heir of the kingdom. Now, as I understand the subject, Jesus came to establish his kingdom, and those that left all, and followed him, when that temporal kingdom was established, should in the partition of their inheritance, receive an hundred fold, and in the world to come, everlasting life. Now, that this offer was made to Israel, is manifest; for Jesus was only sent to them; and when claimed by Gentile believers, is false, because it was never promised them; and when these same apostles came to Jesus, after his rejection, Acts i. 3, Jesus tarried with them forty days, speaking to them of things partaining to the kingdom of God. He said nothing about their sitting on twelve thrones; but when they asked him, "Lord, wilt thou, at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" what a beautiful opportunity for Jesus to make known to them something about this earthly kingdom, or age; but he answers, "It is not for you to know the times, and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." No information now, although he had been preaching the kingdom of God at hand. Now it is out of his power, and in the Father's own hand.

The next passage my attention is called to is that of the nobleman who went into a far country to receive the sovereignty or kingdom. I do not think this proves the doctrine of Christ's children ruling in the age to come. What the true meaning of this parable is, I do not undertake to say; for unlike many of the other parables, our Lord does not explain it; but whatever it means, it relates to the Jews; for to them it was spoken, as all of Christ's teachings and parables were; but there is no resurrection referred to, unless it is assumed that the nobleman is Christ, and his going away means his death, and his going away means to get a kingdom, which does not agree with the other teachings of divine truth, for the kingdom is here, and when he comes, he comes to receive his kingdom; and that is why the Jews were rejected, because they would not give him his kingdom, and accept him as their King; and we think the fact is carried out in the 27th verse of this chapter, Luke xix. "But these mine enemies, who would not that I should reign over them, bring here and slaughter before me," 43d verse. The same judgments are taught against the same people; and to recur to another parable, that in Matt. xxii., of the marriage supper; if the Jews, the first invited guests, had come to the wedding, there would have been no invitation to the Gentiles in the streets and alleys; but all these things depended upon the contingency of the acceptance of Israel's King; and when they rejected him, and would not have him to reign over them, then the Lord passed the various judgments upon them, and offered the kingdom to a prepared people.

I conclude by saying that to my mind all the teachings of Jesus relate to the Children of Israel; and if I understand the new testament teachings, they teach the doctrine that Jesus came to set up a kingdom; and John the Baptist taught the same doctrine; and Jesus, when he commenced his public ministry, began by saying, "The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye, and believe the gospel of the kingdom of God." Mark i. 15. Now, we believe the time that Jesus alluded to was Daniel ix.; and the time had come for the old covenant of the law to cease, and the new covenant of the gospel to be established, and the kingdom under the new covenant established; but Israel failing in the conditions, and there being no people prepared for the reception of it, God is taking out of the nations a prepared people for himself, and when that work is done, we believe Jesus will assert his rights, and dash the nations to pieces, as a potter's vessel.

"And when he was come near, he beheld the city and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace; but now they are hidden from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side....because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation."

Query, Will Br. Storrs answer what would have been the condition of Israel and her city if they had known the time of her visitation?

Yours, JACOB GRIM.

"BR. STORRS" will take advantage of his Yankee proclivity, and ask Br. Grim "What would have been the condition" of his "resurrected heirs of the inheritance," if the "Jews had accepted Christ as their King," and he had "established the new covenant and the kingdom under" it? And "what would have been the condition" of the Gentiles, who were to have been "heirs of faith," according to the covenant "established with Abraham"? Yes, and what would have become of an immortal "kingdom belonging only to the resurrected," if the Jews in the flesh had accepted Jesus, and he had taken the throne at his first advent, as Br. Grim clearly teaches they might have done, and ought to have done? If they had done so, would we Gentiles ever had any part in the kingdom? and if so, what part or place would we have occupied? Would the immortal age have been at once introduced? or would there have been a mixture of mortals and immortals living on the earth after the kingdom had been established, by the Jews accepting their King? and if so, how would that state of things differ from what is now termed "the age to come"? When these queries are all answered, we will see if there are any more.—EDITOR.

Luther's Faith.

It is faith which gives Luther this clearness of vision. "I have lately seen two miracles," he says; "the first as I looked out of my window, and saw the stars in heaven and all that beautiful vaulted roof of God, and yet saw no pillar on which the Master builder had fixed his vault; yet the heaven fell not, but all that grand arch stood firm. Now there are some who search for such pillars, and want to touch and grasp them, and since they can not, wonder and tremble as if the heaven must certainly fall, for no other reason but because they can not touch and grasp its pillars. If they could lay hold of these, think they then the heaven would stand firm?

"The second miracle was, I saw great clouds rolling over us, with such a ponderous weight that they might be compared to a great ocean, and yet I saw no foundation on which they rested, or were based, or any shore which kept them back—the rainbow! Yet that was indeed a weak, thin, slight foundation and roof, which soon melted away into the clouds, and was more like a shadowy prism, such as we see through colored glass, than a strong, firm foundation; so that we might well distrust that feeble dike which kept back that terrible weight of waters. Yet we found in fact that this unsubstantial prism could bear up the weight of waters, and that it guards us safely. But there are some who look rather at the thickness and massy weight of the waters and clouds than at this thin, slight, narrow bow of promise. They would like to feel the strength of that shadowy, evanescent arch, and because they can not do this they are ever fearing that the clouds will bring back the deluge.—[Schonberg-Cotta Family.

EDWIN ONCE MORE.

[The following is another article from Edwin Burnham, which also appeared some years since. Too good to lose; so we let him be seen as he was, hoping he may again become what is so lovely.—EDITOR.]

LIBERALITY OF SENTIMENT.

What an idea some people have of the human mind! They seem to think it a wonderful crime for any person or persons to differ from them in anything or on any subject. Just as if they know everything! Just as if God had set them up for religious, moral, and political regulators in particular!

The truth is, men and women can no more think alike than they can look, eat, sleep alike. Because some men have light hair and blue eyes, and wish to sleep eight hours in twenty-four, they are no less men than those who have black hair and dark eyes, and wish to sleep but five hours in twenty-four. And because some women have pretty curls, and pretty eyes, and pretty forms and faces, they are no more women than those who are too homely to be looked at.

So it is in the thinking world. Some think fast and some think slow. Some think under one shade of circumstances, and others think under a very different shade. Some are educated to one bias of thought, and others to another bias. Who, therefore, can not see the importance of liberality of sentiment, in order that we may cultivate friendly and kindly feelings in relations with each other? Am I unrighteous simply because I differ from you in sentiment? Who makes us differ? What makes differ? You hold the very best sentiment you can; and so do I—and who is to be blamed? We would both hold very different opinions, could we think different sentiments to be right; but we can not. And again I ask, who is to be blamed? Are you sure you are right in every opinion you hold? may you not possibly be wrong in some things? May not your friends be right where you are wrong?

Be liberal then. Put off that vinegar-faced-self-wisdom-fideness, and be a brother—be a man, not a Pope. You can not press human minds all into one mass of thought. You may as well think of pressing a heap of cannon balls into a solid body, for then there are no balls there—they lose their identity in the jam; and so human minds would cease to be human minds, when merged in one mass. Think and let others think, and still live.—Newburyport Herald. E. B.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thomas W. Smith.

ALDEN, HADIN CO., IOWA, Dec. 27, 1864.

BELOVED FRIEND:—I have just concluded a meeting at Otisville, Wright Co. The truth has conquered about nine persons. My other engagements prevent me from laboring there longer. Several think that the doctrine of no life out of Christ presents an ennobling and attractive view of God. One gentleman remarked that if the wicked relived, he must believe in universal salvation; for if their resurrection is taught at all, the time thereof is at the last day, or when the trumpet sounds; and then "the dead are raised incorruptible." So we think. I find many who claim John v. 28, 29 proves the reliving of the wicked; but I opine that they prove too much. They cannot arrange them satisfactorily without "spiritualizing the hour, and make it include the resurrection of Lazarus, &c., and reach to the end of the one thousand years. A tolerable lengthy hour! And all that are in their graves includes all that were "burnt up root and branch" at Sodom's destruction, and the thousand's burnt upon the funeral pile in Hindostan; and the thousands devoured by wild beasts, eaten by fishes, blown to atoms on steamboats, &c. But I said that these texts prove too much. Thus John v. 28, 29, declares that all that are in their graves shall hear his (Christ's) voice and come forth," &c. Paul says, 1 Cor. xv. 52, that when the trumpet shall sound, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." He further teaches, 1 Thess. iv. 16, that Christ sounds the trumpet, and sounds it with the voice of the archangel (or his own voice), and the dead in Christ shall arise first, then the living saints are changed, So it seems that the teachings of these several scriptures is this,

1. That the dead who hear Christ's "voice" are raised.

2. That his "voice" is heard through only the trumpet.

3. That the trumpet sounds at the coming of Christ, or at the time he descends from heaven.

4. That when the trumpet sounds the dead are raised incorruptible.

6. Conclusion. They that hear the "voice of the Son of man," and come forth, are they who are raised to incorrupribility; and, per consequence, the wicked do not hear the voice and do not live. But if they are raised, it is when Christ comes; and if raised then, they are not wicked, but "are Christ's."—1 Cor. xv. 23.

I have scattered most of the tracts, and they are at work. The truth progresses gloriously. I see no cause of discouragement, but rather of rejoicing. Send me three copies of Life from the Dead, six copies Six Sermons, one Discussion with Mattison, tracts, &c., if you can spare any.

As ever, yours in hope of life.

J. S. B., Dracat, Mass., writes:—I admire the spirit in which your paper is conducted. You manifest a desire to give all a portion of meat, which is a difficult task in these days of mysticism; for what is meat to one most certainly cannot be for all. Although I cannot indorse every sentiment contained in the paper, yet I like the lenient spirit it exhibits. With other inquirers after truth, I would like to hear more on God's National Plan, and the Coming Age wherein the saints are to possess the Kingdom under the whole heavens, with the Prince of Peace on the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever. Luke i. 32. That will be glorious beyond description.

In No. 12 of your paper, a writer assert that Millenarians, by the rule of all contracts, bargains, &c., make the reign of Christ a failure, lasting only 1000 years. If Christ reigns a thousand years in a special sense, and forever in a subordinate sense, I don't see any failure, but rather a perfect fulfilment of prophecy.

It is further stated that every form of power is destroyed at the Second Advent of Christ, and Dan. ii., vii., is referred to for proof. In Dan. vii. 14, I read "there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a Kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages, should serve him." The Brother answers that the stone kingdom does the execution, becomes a great mountain, and fills the whole earth. I would ask, Did not the fourth beast—diverse from all the others, with great iron teeth—in devouring, breaking in pieces, and stamping the residue with his feet, do execution, and did not the elements of Power remain under it in a subdued condition? From a well-wisher to the truth.

"A FRIEND OF TRUTH," Rochester, N. Y., writes:—Some months since I remitted $5 for two subscribers. I now remit $3 more to be credited to the same subscribers, $5 to the "knockers' fund" for a horse for the preacher out west; also, $2 for the publication of "God's National Plan" in pamphlet form, and I pledge $5 more when it is determined to publish it.

S. A. KEMP, Florida, Mass., writes:—I send $5; part to pay for the Herald of Life for the soldier's poor widow, mentioned in No. 12, for one year. The remainder use for any other like purpose, to benefit the poor, and spreading the truth of life only in Christ.

JOHN WOODFALL, Rockport, Mass., writes:—I send $2, and am much obliged for your continuing to send the Herald of Life, for I love it above all others, because it teaches life and death. Life to all who will come to Christ: and death to such as do not come; for he who spake as never man spake said, "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life. Yours, in hope of the coming kingdom.

JOHN JACKSON, Richmond, Ind., sends his subscription money and writes:—I am very much comforted in reading the Herald of Life; and, were it in my power, would like to do more towards spreading its truth over the land, specially among those so strongly blinded and wedded to orthodoxy. My prayer is, that you may prosper in the good work of scattering the seeds of truth and making known the way of eternal life through Jesus, the LIFE-GIVER. I am yours, in hope of a resurrection.

O. S. PARKER, Lapeer, N. Y., writes:—I love the Herald of Life, and think it the best paper I have ever taken; and I am almost persuaded the wicked will never have a resurrection to life; whatever their resurrection is, it is not to life, but damnation. Br. Jas. Henry Jacobs preached here last Sunday. He is a lovely brother.

S. D. MORSE, Manchester, N. H., writes:—We hope our preaching brethren will remember us, and make arrangements to visit us. Those coming will please drop me a line, or send an appointment through the Herald one week in advance. The fourth Sunday of every month is our preaching time.

Obituary.

Fell asleep, in Warner, N. H., Dec. 24th, 1864, Br. Nathaniel Bean. Aged 55 yrs.

He was chopping alone in a wood-lot not far from his own residence, when by some accident his axe glanced, and buried its keen edge in his foot. He bound up his wound with his handkerchief, and judging from evidences left on the blood-crimsoned snow, he knelt down and committed himself to the care of his Father in heaven, and then started for home. He was able to proceed only about a rod, when, doubtless feeling faint from the loss of blood, he laid down on the snow, where he was found dead.

It was thought he lived only a few minutes, though he was evidently conscious when he laid down, as his hat was doubled together and laid under his head for a pillow.

He was formerly a believer in the near coming of the Lord, but had grown weary in well-doing; and for several years had been living in a backslidden state. A few weeks previous to his sudden death, however, he was led (oh, how fortunately for him!) to reflect—"How many hired servants of my Father's have bread enough and to spare, while I perish with hunger." At length the resolution was made, "I WILL ARISE AND GO UNTO MY FATHER;" and his tearful eyes and earnest, heart-felt exhortations in our late interesting meetings, gave ample testimony that his Father had met him; and the "robe," the "shoes," the "ring," and the kiss of reconciliation had not been withholden.

I doubt not but he sleeps in Jesus; and the calm and peaceful expression that rested on his countenance in death, suggested the thought that his "dying bed," though a cold and snowy one, with no gentle loving hand to smooth it, was made "as soft as downy pillows are." And though called so suddenly to part with "the life that now is," yet having formed a vital union with Him who is the resurrection and the life, he has thereby secured that better life which is to come; and in a calm, unbroken, unconscious sleep, he is awaiting "the manifestations of the sons of God." "Precious in the sight of the Lord, is the death of his saints." Yea, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

PITY THE SORROWS OF A POOR OLD MAN.—A correspondent of the Independence Belge says: "Speaking of Rome reminds me that the collection of Peter's pence has commenced in the churches of Paris. On Sunday morning last, during the mass always said at eight o'clock for the pupils of private and public schools, in a church of the 20th arrondissement, I heard a priest who was passing through the ranks of 500 or 600 boys whose fathers are mostly poor working men say to them: 'Come, my boys, your parents must have given you a sou or two for your Sunday; you had better bestow them on the poor Holy Father, who is in great distress—very great distress.' And on leaving the church one of the boys inquired of me, 'Has not the Pope got anything to eat?' "

"Peter's Pence at Rome," says the Opinion Nationale, "produces less and less. At the commencement the produce was about 4000 Roman crowns a month; it afterwards fell to 2000, and goes on decreasing. November only gave 700, including offerings from Tuscany."

The Russian journals contain details respecting the progress of the emancipation of the serfs up to the month of August last, at which date there were only eight regulating charters still uncompleted, while 111,568 have been already brought into execution, and these refer to estates on which reside 10,001,220 country people. As many as 2,133,043 people have come into complete possession of their plots of land, and of this number 430,702 have required no assistance from the State. A transitory condition is prevalent in provinces like Moscow and St. Petersburg, where the former serfs, rather artisans than cultivators of the soil, have not the same interest in at present becoming freed from their obligations towards their former masters.

The Emperor of Russia has issued a ukase, extending the abolition of serfdom to Transcaucasia, the only province of the Russian Empire where that institution still exists.

To Purchase a Horse.

"That horse" is an important "animal" to help on the cause of truth in the far west, where railroads are few; and we are satisfied $100 will be well laid out in helping the Brother, whose heart is in the work, to such a means of conveyance. We want the hundred dollars, and we shall keep "knocking on the dear Lord" till it comes; and come it will, for "the cattle upon the thousand hills are his."

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, i he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousands more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

IN MEMORIAM.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

Departed this life, in Springfield, Vt., Nov. 6, 1864, Sherwin Kingsburg, (a nephew of the writer). Aged 19 years.

Gone to the silent mansions of the dead,
In the first flush of early manhood; while
Youth kindled still the fire in his dark eyes,
And wreathed his chiseled lips with many a smile.

Gone to the silent mansions of the dead;
The hope of loving parents, and their pride;
A cherished sister's pet, a brother's joy,
Her ALL, who nestled closest by his side.

And colder on her heart, his youthful bride,
Who scarce three months before, was joyously
Clasped to his noble breast, in manly pride.

So young, so fair, so pure,—alas! too soon
Is severed the fond tie that made them one;
And from the grasp of bleeding hearts, is torn
The husband dear, the brother, and the son.

O Death! relentless death; this is thy work!
No other power seems so unpitying;
What stirs our deepest sympathies, still fails,
To thy cold heart, one tender thought to bring.

* * * * * * *

We murmur not—the broken law of God
Demand our life—it shall be yielded up:
Heartless, and coldly—cruel as thou art,
Thy claim is just, O death! we'll drink the cup!

But listen, monster! One, our nature took,
Possessed of higher life, by right divine:
Though at thy summons, made in name of law,
He freely gave that life akin to mine.

Dost thou remember, (yea, I know thou dost!)
How but three days elapsed ere thy dominion,
By the strong arm of the Omnipotent,
Was shaken—and the Just One lived again?

That was the triumph of a life divine;
And what a triumph! What a victory!
"The effectual working of that mighty power."
Opened thy prison doors, and took the key!

And all who're made partakers of that life,
Secured by faith in the life-giving Word;
Shall yet, O Death! in majesty come forth,
And share the triumph of their risen Lord!

MUSINGS—HOW THINGS LOOK!

The night is bitterly cold, and the winter winds like demon fierce, howl around my dwelling. But I am sheltered, and sitting here alone in the quietude of my pleasant, comfortable room, my mind wanders out over the land. Before me rise scenes of destitution and suffering, of neglect and wrongs; homes desolated, aching, broken hearts, mourning, sorrowing ones who refuse to be comforted because their loved are not, or what may be even worse, are lying among the sick and dying in some far-off hospital or prison, or exposed to the chilly night air within some southern stockade. Or, I see thousands recently liberated from bondage, whose patient, uncomplaining endurance of hardship and privation calls loudly for sympathy and aid and instruction, and from my inmost heart arises, unitedly with ascriptions of praise for the mercies that crown my life, a petition for mercy and help for the suffering. And I ask, "Lord what can I do for others?"

Over beyond, a little in the future, the picture is all fair and bright and blessed and glorious; for sin is not, and Jesus reigns. We delight to dwell upon it, but we are not there yet, and until then, what? And here a thousand questionings arise, and clamoring loudly, will not be put down, so writing them out, perhaps some one wiser than myself can instruct me.

Can no wrongs be righted, no grievances redressed, no evils remedied, no suffering relieved, no burdened hearts be made glad and joyous, until Jesus comes? Must the work be wholly left for him to accomplish, while so many who profess to be Christians and hope to share in the coming glory are unwilling to share in the toil and sacrifice that may secure blessings to others? How is it that many who talk much of the love of Jesus and his appearing, and with solemn faces, and long-drawn sighs, bemoan the sorrow and suffering with which the world is filled, seem never ready to make any effort to lift the burden from others, are never found looking for the afflicted or speaking words of comfort to the sorrowing heart? Why is it, that some who most loudly denounce the sins of the age, and in horror cry out for the wickedness that abounds, and warn sinners to prepare for an awful judgment day a little in the future, can never be induced to seek out the perishing, or extend a helping hand to one who, in an evil hour, has fallen; but as if in fear of contamination by coming in contact with "publicans and sinners," fold their garments closely about them and turn away with the oft repeated "Thank God, all these things will end soon?" And if reminded of duty, and the labors of some in behalf of the needy and oppressed, piously suggest that any effort in such directions, savors too much of conformity to the world, from which we must keep ourselves unspotted! Does a belief in the soon coming of the Lord, render people insensible to the wants of others, or may that be attributed to some other cause?

I wonder if any one has yet learned how to answer the questions of the Saviour, "For if ye love them which love you, or if ye do good to them which do good to you, or if ye lend to them from whom ye hope to receive again, what thank have ye? Do not even sinners the same?" Or the apostle, "But whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" "For if he loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" "Who is my brother, and my neighbor, who?" Is it him only who believes just as I do?

Can it be that the human heart is still as deceitful as in the old prophet's time, and can it be possible that any other motive than love to God can lead any one to desire the coming of the Lord? May we not with the mouth say "Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly," and at the same time in the heart there be found selfishness, love of ease, and a desire to be free from trouble and every other disagreeable thing?

Again, my thoughts turn in another direction. Among my papers my eye rests upon the Herald of Life. How I prize it. Others I receive, from which I glean much that is good and comforting, but in this I find more to feed, instruct, and strengthen. I thank God for it, and that it is not sustained at the expense of sacrificing its Editor's manhood, or any principle of truth, right, or justice. In that case I would not value it, and had rather it would go down.

And this reminds me of some who have recently withdrawn their support, and I wonder why it is that some can not endure an idea in conflict with their own? How is it that many who think they have sacrificed and suffered for the truth's sake, are so unwilling to accord to others, what they will fight to secure for themselves, viz.: freedom of thought and expression?

Another thing has for a long time been a source of wonder and perplexity to me. I can not understand how a people who have devoted so much time to the study of ancient history, who have acquainted themselves with the politics of different nations in the past,—the cause of the various changes and revolutions which have transpired in the world, often introducing the subject into their sermons and writings, should condemn any interest in present movements, or our own national affairs, as sinful, or at least dangerous? I wonder if the signification of politics, as laid down in our lexicons, is correct; or if politics in our own age of the world do not mean something entirely different from politics in another age? Does a knowledge of, and interest in these things unchristianize a person? If so, 'tis surely "folly to be wise, and ignorance is bliss." Is it any thing worse to expose and condemn the evils and sins of the present time, as for instance those of slavery, than to expose and condemn the evils of the papacy in the past? or, is wrong, wrong in one age and right in another? Is it wrong to seek to know what is right and what is wrong in national affairs? and if some one thinks they do know, it is wrong to speak what they think? If one does this, and chances to sympathize with the government under which he lives, does he necessarily love war, bloodshed, &c.?

Because we are "looking for a better country, that is an heavenly," and for a different form of government, does it necessarily follow that we must not seek to make our present earthly abode as comfortable a place to stay in as possible? and if one endeavors to effect any change or reform for the benefit of suffering humanity, must he, forsooth, have lost all interest in, and forfeit all claim to the future blessed and immortal state, where there will be no necessity of reformation? Is it true, as some tell us, that at the present, there is no choice, but every thing and all is wrong, and nothing worth the saving? I wonder if He who loves mercy and justice, and who will vindicate the cause of the oppressed, thinks so too? If one looks to the watchmen for light on these matters, and they tell you there is nothing but gross darkness, and if in consequence, the hearts of the timid only grow more fearful, what can one do? If those in the dark attempt to lead others, and they will be led, what will become of them all?

May it not possibly be true, that the Lord is dealing with the nation and has a work to accomplish for it, upon which coming events may throw more light? May not a late writer be be correct, who says, while speaking of the Lord's training of the nations, "that often the conflict is going on so near to us, we cannot tell how the battle is turning," but the future may reveal it, and isn't it best, instead of dooming every thing national, by one fell swoop to immediate destruction, to leave it all with the Lord to manage as he sees fit; and in the meantime trust him for ourselves, and resting securely under the shadow of the Almighty, be kept in perfect peace?

I wish I knew if I ought to pry into these matters; and if the reason I can not see clearly is because I am a woman, and therefore am not able to comprehend and judge rightly of these things. But I believe a woman may ask questions, with limitation. Perhaps some may be displeased with my interogations, but then I am by no means presuming to dictate to others what position they must occupy, or what opinions they should entertain, but only hinting how, from my stand-point, things look to me

I think, on the whole, I will cease from man, and continue, as I have done, carefully to study the word of God, and look to the Lord for instructions, and watch and wait. As I wait, I'll sing,

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform.
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill,
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his sovereign will,

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take;
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face.

His purposes will ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour;
The bud may have a bitter taste,
But sweet will be the flower.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter;
And he will make it plain."

OLD BIGOTRY EXPOSED.

June, 16, 1864.

TO E. WOLCOTT: Dear Br. in Jesus our Saviour:—Although a stranger to you personally, I am impelled to write, hoping the light vouchsafed to you and pertaining to the kingdom of God may be of some benefit to one all alone in a community where the glorious truths of the gospel of Jesus are almost smothered. We are situated here with few gospel privileges: a Methodist sermon once in two weeks by one Edwards, lately stationed here, and who made me a visitation on Tuesday. We had something of a discussion on the subject of immortality and kindred truths. I found him somewhat conversant with our ideas and some of our Teachers, but seeming wilfully blind as to the spiritual understanding of those glorious truths which relate to the future state of man.

In the course of conversation he stated that the spotted fever had severely desolated your section, and indirectly ascribed the fatality which ensued as a manifestation of the displeasure of Providence against the propagation of doctrines utterly subversive of Christianity. And now, in fear that I may have to combat his ideas on this one subject, please give me any facts in relation to the disease, and upon whom it mostly fell, that I may know upon what grounds to refute any unjust inferences against our heavenly Father and the glorious truths of eternal life through Christ alone. I also bandied him a little upon preaching the literal coming of Christ to reign on the earth. He said that he did preach on the subject once a year. I then said, suppose you write and ask Br. Wolcott to come and visit us and enlighten us on the glorious themes. Why, says he, I would not have him come here for anything. I inferred that he would rather see the spotted fever raging here than the promulgation of our glorious doctrines. Oh how I wish that some one would come and missionary a little. I think some good might be done in the name of Jesus among the mountains. Cannot you or some one of your acquaintance, visit us among the mines of N. J., for a short time at least? Hoping soon to hear from you, I remain yours truly, waiting for the manifectation of the sons of God. R. D. CHASE.

R. D. CHASE: Dear Br. in Christ:—Yours of the 16th inst., came to hand Saturday evening last. Was comforted by it. Can to some extent conceive the absence of kindred minds. It looks as though your were set for the defence of the truth in Berkshire Valley; and may our Lord help you to be valiant. Jude 3. The Edwards you speak of is Henry, I expect, who once lived in the village of Oceanport, we entered the Methodist Church together, nearly in the winter of '55 and '56, or thereabouts. I was never taken into full connection; for soon after began to learn that God and his servants meant what they said; but, Br. Henry, faithful to the prejudices of his church, could see occasion to brand me with infidelity.

His implications concerning the spotted fever comport very well with his faithfulness to God's honor as well with his discrimination of what is true. That you may understand this matter more perfectly, I will give you a bit of the geography of this section. On the Atlantic, south of Sandy Hook some 8 or 9 miles, are the Long Branch boarding houses: coming west 1 1-2 miles is the village of Long Branch; which, though dense only for a little space, includes a large area densely populated for a rural district; adjoining and sometimes included in the general term—Long Branch—is the village of Branch Port, or Shell Dock, and a neighborhood called Fresh-pond; while a little to the south is another small village, and still farther—a mile—another village—Mechanicsville. Laying 1 1-2 miles to the northwest of Long Branch proper is the quiet village of Oceanport, where I have lived 18 years, and from which I removed to Eatontown since receiving your letter.

It was in the village of Long Branch proper that the spotted fever first showed itself, and from thence it spread to surrounding vicinity, though at no place like as in the village. Now comes the point of interest: Long Branch and vicinity, so far as a profession of religion is concerned, is almost exclusively Methodist, (there are two other churches, but their congregations are small) and what is still more interesting, not a believer in our views, or a sympathizer even, live in the section so terribly visited, notwithstanding tracts have been sent and distributed among them, while our views have been urged upon the consideration of every attentive ear, but all to no avail. If we are in error, and to resist it be a virtue, should they not have had the benefit of it from a wise and just Father of us all? and what a libel to attribute to God such wrong! Thus his worthy name is blasphemed. To God's praise let me say, at Oceanport where there is a little body of believers, not a believer was taken, and only 5 in the village, 8 of whom were children; and in another neighborhood where there is another body of the faith not one was touched. So you can defend a just God; for just and good is He.

Concerning coming to your place, I would be pleased to do so, but at present am not in health to do it. If the Lord please to give me strength, will go any where, publishing life through Jesus Christ alone. O Br., what a glorious doctrine; what a sublime message! How holy are we called upon to live who see such great things out of God's law. I do feel full of praise to God for every one with whom I become acquainted in any way who loves these truths; because it will require the sanctifying power of truth to preserve us blameless unto the coming of the day of God, which hasteth greatly.

Have you tracts sufficient for your position? If you have not will send you some of mine, and some of Br. Storrs' also.

May God sustain you and give you grace and wisdom for your day and trial, and finally a crown of glory when the chief Shepherd doth appear. Yours, in waiting for the rightful king of earth to come and relieve his downtrodden ones. E. WOLCOTT.

PRAYER AND CONFERENCE MEETINGS.

A prayer and conference meeting, according to my experience, is a meeting where all that love God have an equal chance of following the influence of the Spirit of God. When we come together, if any one hath a hymn, sing it; if the spirit of prayer, pray; if an exhortation, give it; if a scripture, read or quoteit, that the body may be edified, strengthened, and built up in the most holy faith. We meet to mingle our voices together in praise to him to whom praise belongeth, and by supplication and prayer, with thanksgiving, make our request known unto God. We meet also to give our testimony of the goodness of God in furnishing us a way of escape out of the many temptations we have had, and for the numerous encouragements we find to press forward toward the mark for the prize.

Meetings of this kind are always beneficial whenever it is a proper time to hold them. God has an order, and when we observe it, it is often the case that a very marked effect is produced; sometimes in awaking the careless and indifferent, who may have happened to drop in; and what is more frequent, some that are in difficulty, in darkness and doubt, whose faith is shattered by many hurtful influences, find something that gives strength and encouragement. Inasmuch as these things are so, how necessary are such meetings, and how necessary they should be led by the Lord. Our prayers will then be in the Spirit; our exhortations also, and the whole meeting will savor of good.

If I am right in the matter, why is it that those claiming the right to lead such meetings, because of experience, so often switch off the track, and prove a hindrance, instead of a blessing? I will now give a reason for an exercise of mind upon this subject.

Not many days ago I attended a meeting, at the close of which an aged brother, whom I shall call Br. Leader, arose and gave notice of the afternoon meeting, and said there would be a prayer and conference meeting to commence one hour before the preaching, and desired all who could attend, to do so. Accordingly, as soon as I could get leave of absence, I went, feeling rejoiced that I was to have a priviledge of this kind. They were singing when I went in; after which Br. Leader asked a brother if he would pray. He, probably not feeling the spirit of prayer, declined. Br. Leader then offered a well worded prayer; after which a hymn was sung. Immediately Br. Leader arose and commenced speaking.

Now, the subject of the forenoon's discourse was to disprove the age to come theory; and those who believed with the speaker thought it a very strong argument; while those on the opposite side had many objections. A portion of the intermission was occupied in discussions upon the subject; and I saw there was not just the right feeling manifested, and the same feeling could be clearly seen during the afternoon's discourse.

But to Br. Leader: he took up the subject of the forenoon's discourse, and used up a large portion of the time in quoting scripture that he considered, beyond a doubt, proved his position; several times alledging that his mind was fully settled upon that point, and that he did not know how any one could come to any other conclusion. After a long theological harangue (for to my mind it was nothing else) he closed.

I do not speak disrepectful of the scriptures in speaking thus; for they are true though every man were a liar; yet when used out of place, lose their power. The opposite side was represented as much out of place as the other, when we take into consideration the nature of the meeting, as appointed. I speak plain, and the necessity of the case demands it. Brethren and sisters are robbed of their rights, and that too to a loss of spirituality, because men lead in their own spirit, and are constantly harping upon some particular doctrine, scarcely ever looking after the spiritual condition of the body. We ought to be able to admonish one another; and brethren who can speak publicly should strive to hand out the right food in the right place. We naturally look to the aged and experienced for assistance; and to a certain extent it is right that we should; for of many we can truly say, they are fathers in Israel. Then there are those of whom it may be said, a multitude of years have not given wisdom.

Let us then look well to these things; for there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth it understanding, without asking as to age, but in accordance with the capability of receiving it. We see that the Lord is the real Leader, and if it be thus acknowledged, such meetings as the one referred to, will be less frequent. I am in favor of scriptural discussions, if it be in the spirit of truth and order of God. But, to turn a prayer and conference meeting into such, is contrary to sound judgment. I was disappointed, and I was not the only one, for there were those there that would have relished a good meeting. I could see nothing but distraction and death in the so called prayer and conference meeting.

Now to you that have the lead of meetings bear the word of exhortation. Remember you are not to lead those that submit to you by your own wisdom; but you are to be led by the Lord Jesus Christ for their upbuilding in the faith of the gospel. You are in truth servants of the Church, to be used at the discretion of the great Head of the Church, and the position you occupy is after this order, or it is not genuine. Take heed, therefore, lest instead of gathering in, ye scatter abroad. Instead of building up, ye even pull down that which is already begun. Be thou examples in righteousness and ye shall have favor with God, and all the good will rejoice therein. Let your experience show an increase of faith, and let your admonitions be upon the righteous principle of the gospel, and doubtless you shall come home bringing your sheaves with you. CHAS. GARDNER.

THE NEW YEAR'S PURSE.

"Nurse, I wish I could make something for a New Year's present for mamma," said little Rosa one morning about the first of December. "But I only know how to hem, and I haven't money enough to buy her a nice pocket-handkerchief."

"Knit her a pair of red stockings," said Rosa's little sister Mary.

"What an idea! Mamma would not wear red stockings, and I could not make the heel, if she would."

"Well, ask Aunt Pauline, she will show you," said Mary.

"I know what I will do; I will go and ask her to show me how to crochet a purse," and away Rosa ran to ask her mamma if she might go and see her Aunt Pauline.

Mrs. Armand told her little girls they might go and stay an hour. Rosa and Mary hurried away.

"Auntie, auntie, Rosa wishes you to show her how to make a purse for mamma for New Year's," said little Mary, all out of breath, and put up her little rosy mouth to be kissed before her aunt could say "Good-morning."

"Oh, yes, auntie, will you? I will be very careful and try very hard not to make any mistakes," said Rosa.

"How much money have you to buy the silk?"

"I have three shillings: will that be enough?" said Rosa.

"That will buy the silk, but it will take two shillings more for the tassels and rings."

"I've got two shillings you can have if Rosa will let me hold one of the tassels when she carries the purse to mamma," little Mary said, looking up from the corner where she was playing with the kitten.

"Can it begin to-day, auntie?"

"No, dear, it is time for you to go home. I will go out and buy the silk and call at your house, and ask your mamma to allow you to spend two hours with me to-morrow."

"Be sure and not tell mamma," said the little girls as they started for home.

After tea, Rosa asked Mary if it would not be nice to go and tell papa about the purse.

"Oh, yes, if he will promise surely not to tell mamma, becaase he always tells her every thing, you know."

They went into the library, and finding their papa alone, told him all about the purse, while he promised to keep their secret.

The next day, Rosa and Mary went to see their aunt. Rosa was quite haughty towards her little sister because she could not learn to make purses. But Mary took a little stool, and sat down by her aunt, and watched very closely while Rosa was learning to crochet. At the end of two hours Rosa's fingers were tired and the little girls went home. The days passed on and the purse grew slowly. Rosa made mistakes and it had to be pulled out. When the purse was nearly done, Aunt Pauline was called away to see her sick mother, and she sent Rosa the purse and silk and tassels.

Rosa was very much puzzled, for she feared she could not finish the purse by New Year's.

Some times Mary would take it up and try to crochet, but Rosa would always speak so cross to her that she would go away and cry.

On Christmas day, when Rosa and Mary returned from church with their mamma, they were very cold, and Rosa trembled and shook so much that her mamma put her in bed, and went out to get her some medicine. Rosa began to cry, and told Mary that she could not finish the purse, now she was sick; then seeing the purse in Mary's hand, she said: "What are you doing? Put down my work."

"But you are sick, and cannot work; see, I can crochet."

"I don't believe it," said Rosa angrily. But Mary was gentle and kind, and carried the purse to the bed.

"That's queer, you can crochet. How did you learn?"

"I looked at auntie and you; then when I came home, nurse gave me an old crochet needle and some cotton, and I kept trying until I could take the stitch pretty well."

"I'm real glad, for I am sick and can't work," said Rosa, ashamed that she had been so cross.

Hearing their mamma coming with the medicine Mary put the purse out of sight.

In two or three days Rosa was well, and Mary had finished the purse all but a few stitches, when one morning Rosa went into her room a moment, and found the little kitten playing with the ball of silk, which had fallen off the table. She took up the purse, and found that Miss Puss had pulled out nearly an inch. Rosa was angry in a moment, and gave the poor kitten such a kick that it sent her and the ball under the bed, and pulled out nearly a half an inch more of the purse. The nurse, hearing the noise, came in, saying: "What is the matter, Rosa?"

"My purse is all pulled out; naughty Minet has been here—and—and—oh, dear, what shall I do? I surely cannot get my purse done now."

Just then Mary came in, picked up the ball, and began to crochet. Rosa saw her, and cried out: "Let that alone; you are as simple as the cat, and gave her a blow. Poor Mary was so grieved, she began to sob, and wipe away her tears. Rosa's papa came in the hall, and hearing Mary's sobs, came in just as Rosa had raised her hand to strike her sister again. He took Rosa into the library, and told her to tell him all about it. Rosa did so, adding that the kitten was very troublesome, and Mary cried so easily.

"But, my child, you have been very naughty, and I wish you to go and ask your sister to forgive you. And is there no one else that you wish to pardon you?"

"Yes, papa, I have made the kind Father angry with me."

"Your mamma has gone out. Go to her room, and pray God to forgive you and make you gentle and sweet tempered."

Rosa did as her papa required. Soon after the little girls finished the purse, and the nurse sewed on the tassels, and put on the rings.

Rosa and Mary awoke at seven o'clock on New Year's morning, and dressed very quickly and hurried down stairs. Mary took one tassel and Rosa the other, and went into their mamma's room. "Here is a purse we have made for you. Rosa gave three shillings and I gave only two, and Rosa has made nearly all of it," said little Mary.

"But mamma, Mary has been good, and I have been very naughty some times."

"Thank you, my dear children, you give me a great deal of pleasure this morning."

"Happy New-Year, Rosa, Mary," said their papa, coming in. "After your New Year's gifts, are you? Look over there, and see how how you like that."

Rosa ran across the room, and Mary after her, and opened the door of a handsome cupboard. On the lowest shelf was a little stove, with kettles, sauce-pans, and skillets. Hanging on little nails were a dipper, pans, skimmer, and a pail. On the next shelf were plates, cups, and saucers, vegetable dishes, sugar-bowl, cream-pitcher, and tumblers. On the top shelf were spoons, knives, and forks, and a nice little waiter. "There is sugar in the bowl, see, Rosa."

"Yes, and milk in the pitcher, Mary."

"And look here, Rosa, nice little napkins, and two table-cloths."

"Oh, dear mamma, you are too kind to us," said little Mary.

Just then the breakfast-bell rang. After dinner Rosa and Mary played with their little dishes until bed-time.

When they knelt to pray, they thanked God for their kind parents, and asked him to bless all the poor little girls who had no kind friends to love them. Soon after they were fast asleep.—Translated from the French of Madame De Witt.

LUTHER LEE ON IMMORTALITY.

Mr. Lee's seventh argument is based on Phil. i. 21—24; and here he merely reiterates what has been said a hundred times before; and said too much better than he has said it. In reply to this argument, I shall repeat what I have before written, and which Mr. Lee has failed to refute, that Paul points the Philippians to "the day of Christ," as the time of their reward; and it would be preposterous to suppose he expected to meet with his before them. His address to Timothy is proof of this. Paul did not discuss his own fate, except so far as Christ and his Gospel were involved. He says all his afflictions, bonds and imprisonments had furthered the Gospel, instead of retarding its progress. And in reference to this he makes one bold and unmistakable declaration, that "Christ will be magnified in my body, whether by life or by death"—it mattered not,—this would be the result. Having thus driven the nail, he clinches it by saying, "For me to live, is Christ,"—it will redound to his glory, for "I am set for the defence of the gospel;" "and to die," in such a cause, and for Christ's sake, "is gain;" not to me, Paul, but to Christ; for otherwise how could "Christ be magnified in my body by death?" The reader will please note the fact, that it was "in body," and not out of it, nor in the "spirit world," that Christ was to be magnified. "But," says Paul, "if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour; yet what I shall choose I know not." Why did he not know what to choose? "For," or because, "I am in a straight betwixt two." What "two" things were these, between which he was in a straight? Were they life and death? Then, according to this view, he did not know which to choose, life or death. While in this straight, therefore, what choice did he make? Did he choose life? Did he make choice of death? No; for between these two he could make no selection; but there was a third point in reference to which he could, and did make a choice; and that was "the returning and being with Christ," which was far better than life or death.

Mr. Lee says—"His (Paul's) choice was between dying then and being with Christ, and living longer to serve the Church," &c. This is the point of his argument, and it is a pure assumption, as a faithful exegesis of the passage will show; and, as we think, we have already shown. That Paul expected to be with Christ, in death, is not so much as hinted at in the whole para graph. It was not a "departure" that Paul desired, but a "returning and being with Christ," a point totally distinct from either dying or living in the present state.

Mr. Lee's eighth proof is Rev. vi. 9, where John "Saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God," &c. Upon this text I shall not dwell, for it must be obvious to every intelligent reader of the Scriptures, that John gives a symbolical description of What he saw; and that he speaks of things which had no real existence when he saw them; and, therefore, that they were merely images, or symbols, representing other things. That John should see the "souls" of the martyrs under the altar, and that those souls should be represented as "crying with a loud voice," is all in perfect harmony with the whole subject. The blood of Abel cried from the ground; and the blood of Christ is said "to speak better things than the blood of Abel;" and, in perfect harmony with the nature and decorum of the figure, the blood or souls of the saints, slain for the word of God, is represented as being "under the altar," upon which we may suppose they were sacrificed.

Thus we have followed Mr. Lee through all his proofs of the consciousness of the dead; and, having done so, I will now offer some direct proofs that the dead know nothing. And,

1. Apart from the fact, that there is no promise of rewards or punishments to the dead, the following testimonies clearly sustain the position, that they are unconscious. Job asks—"Why died I not from the womb? Why did I not expire at the time of my birth? Why did the knees receive me? Or why the breast that I should be nursed? For now should I have been still, and been quiet—I should have slept: then had I been at rest, with kings and counsellors of the earth, who built desolate places for themselves; or with princes that had gold, who filled their houses with silver: or as a hidden untimely birth I had not been: as infants which never saw light." Job iii. 11, 12, &c.

This passage clearly proves the dead unconscious. They sleep: they rest in the dust: they are as though they had not been, even as infants who never saw light.

Again, "As the cloud is consumed, and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more," &c., chap. vii. 9. Here we are taught that "he" the man, "goes down to the grave," and comes up no more till the resurrection; but Mr. Lee says, the man goes to heaven!

"Why hast thou brought me forth from the womb? O that I had expired, and no eye had seen me; I should have been as though I had not been. I should have been carried from the womb to the grave. Are not my days few? Cease then and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness, and the shades of death; a land of darkness as darkness itself; and the shades of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness." chap. x. 18—22. Reader, behold the contrast! Mr. Lee says the saint when he dies goes to heaven—to the "spirit world;" but Job teaches otherwise; he tells us they go to the "land of darkness—to the shades of death—a land of darkness as darkness itself, where there is no order, and where the light is as darkness." Is this Heaven, Mr. Lee?

"But man dieth, and wasteth away; yea, man yieldeth up his breath, and where is he?" Mr. Lee says, in heaven or in hell; but what says Job? "As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up; So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep. O that thou wouldst hide me in the grave." Mr. Lee would say, "O that thou wouldst hide me in heaven!" "That thou wouldst keep me secret, until thy wrath is passed, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time, and remember me. If a man die shall he live again?" Hold! says Mr. Lee, man does not die—his body merely dies, but his soul goes to heaven; and the soul will never have that body again, for before the resurrection it will have passed through a thousand changes, and have entered into the organization of other substances—trees, animals, water, dust, wind! Its resurrection is impossible! But, says Job—"All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee; thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hands." chap. xiv., 10—15. No, says, Mr Lee, God will have no "desire to the work of his hands"—the body is gone—crumbled into dust, so that God, Himself, cannot raise it!

"If I wait, the grave is my house; I have made my bed in darkness." No, says Mr. Lee, heaven is my "house," and, instead of a "bed of darkness," I wing my flight to the regions of glory!

Job continues—"I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister." But what would Mr. Lee say? I am immortal; "corruption is not my father;" neither is "the worm my mother nor sister." But let us hear Job again—"And where now is my hope? As for my hope, who will see it? They shall go down to the pit, when our rest is together in the dust," chap. xviii. 13—16. When Job died, he expected to find his "rest in the dust;" but Mr. Lee expects to find his in a place which he calls "the spirit world."

David asks—"Wilt thou show wonders to the dead? Shall the dead arise, and praise thee? Shall thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave? Or thy faithfulness in destruction? Shall thy wonders be known in the dark?—and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?" Ps. lxxxviii. 10—12. Here we learn, that for the dead to praise the Lord, they must arise; that the state of the dead is one of destruction, disorganization, or corruption; that their abode is dark, and that they dwell in a land of forgetfulness. How strongly, again, does this contrast with Mr. Lee's theory. But let us proceed.

"The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." Ps. cxv. 17.

Here is a text which sweeps Mr. Lee's theory from the face of day. He cannot make it harmonize with it, by all the logic he can command. It will defy all his mental powers, and withstand all his sophistry. The Spirit of the Living God says by the mouth of David, "the dead praise not the Lord." But Mr. Lee, and his pious associates in the advocacy of pagan superstition and infidelity, declare that the dead do praise the Lord—and that they are with Him. But, as if the above was not enough; and lest there might be some skeptic on the subject, like Mr. Lee, the Holy Spirit adds this sweeping clause—"neither any that go down into silence."

Again, "For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten."

Here we are taught that the dead know nothing; but what says Mr. Lee? He tells us the dead know a vast deal—that they are in heaven, receiving a "reward." "Also, their love, and their hatred, and their envy hath now perished," &c. Say you, that such a person is conscious? But more still—"Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave—sheol, whither thou goest." Eccl. ix. 5, 6. The state, then, into which men pass at death, is one where there is no love, no envy, no hatred, no work, no device, no knowledge, nor wisdom.

Once more: "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." Ps. cxlvi. 4.

I feel satisfied to leave this question just here. The view we have taken is the only one which harmonizes with the teachings of the Scriptures; while it is impossible for our opponents to explain the proofs we have submitted, and make them accord with their Platonic speculations. HOMO.

THE AGE TO COME: QUESTIONS.

BY POLLY G. PITTS.

BR. STORRS:—We are striving to live in the Spirit, that Spirit that leads into ALL TRUTH, the Spirit that raised up our Lord from the dead. O blessed Spirit, whose fruit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, &c.; against such a spirit there is no law. I would bless the Lord that so many of the writers of the Herald of Life, seem to possess this spirit. I think the matter in the Herald grows better and better.

I often feel that I should like to ask some questions of some that write for the Herald; yes and of some that do not. While reading the communication of "E. W.," on the age to come, I was impressed to ask him a few questions, when I read the last sentence in his piece. He says, "So we conclude, with present light, the Saviour did not have in the gospel any probation in a future age; neither on earth, nor after he ascended to his Father and received the Revelation."

Now I would say, "Brother E. W., believest thou the prophets? believest thou that they spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit? If thou dost, let us in the spirit of meekness read Isaiah xi.; at least a part of it.

"And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord. And shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord: and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity the meek of the earth: he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard also shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

I would ask E. W., how came these little ones in the kingdom? for surely this state of things can not be till the root of Jesse stands for an ensign of the people, when his rest shall be glorious. You will not say that they are the offspring of the immortal saints, for they neither marry nor are given in marriage. But the sucking child is there, and the weaned child, and the beasts are tamed. How is it, my brother? it has never been so in this age; then it must be in the age to come, or as Paul says, "in the ages to come."

Again, look at Isaiah ix. 6, 7. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, (bless the Lord) upon the throne of David, and upon his Kingdom, to order it, and establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Amen. So be it.

Now, here is no mistake; here is the mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace, with the government on his shoulder, and he on the throne of David, and of the increase of his government and peace, there is to be no end. Bless the Lord, let it increase unto the bounds of the everlasting hills, and unto the ages of ages, world without end. Please read Isaiah lxv. and lxvi. chapters. Yes read the three last verses of the lix. chap. and the whole of the lx. chapter, and may God give you light and understanding, so that you can see a harmony in His word, and be reconciled to him in all things.

Daniel says, "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him;" &c. Now, do you believe that if all of Christ's subjects were immortal, they would be divided into peoples, nations, and languages? I could multiply any amount of scripture that looks to me like probation in the age to come. O, I do pray God that we, as a people, may not cast reproach and contempt on what another believes. I do not mean E. W, but I have heard so many hard speeches about the age to come doctrine, and those that believed it, that I have wondered how they could profess the Spirit of Christ, and talk as they did.

I once had some conversation with a preacher who spurns the doctrine of the age to come, though he professed to be an advent preacher. I asked him some questions about these little children, that were in the kingdom; and he made this reply—When Christ comes there will be those who will have sucking children, and weaned ones, they will be changed to immortality at His coming, but we do not expect they will be full grown as soon as they are changed. Then the minister left. I immediately wrote to him and asked him if these little ones sucked all through the 1000 years, for he believes that when Christ comes, he destroys the wicked, takes the righteous up to heaven, and they reign with Christ a thousand years, and are judging the wicked; then they come back to the earth.

Now look at it my friend, if this is as they believe, we shall have little immortals that draw the breast, lead the animals, and playing on the hole of the asp, &c. When I look at those things, I say, "O consistency, thou art a jewel." Now I would say, as our Divine Master said, Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they that testify of me; of Christ. May God grant us all his Holy Spirit, that it may open our understanding to understand the scriptures, and that we may believe the testimony of all God's holy prophets since the world began; for they all agree.

Your sister, hoping for life when the LIFE-GIVER comes to put down all rule, and all authority, and power, for he must reign till all enemies are put under his feet.

JERUSALEM AND ITS NEIGHBORHOOD.

Increased Fertility of the Land near Jerusalem.—At Trent Conference on the 17th August, an interesting meeting in connection with the subject of Israel was held in the boys's school-room.

Mr. Miner, an American gentleman, after reading and drawing attention to special portions of Ezek. xxxvi., stated that, about thirty years ago, Ibrahim Pasha laid out large sums upon the land around Jerusalem, with a view of favoring agriculture, and of improving the state of things then existing. The report in 1836—37, as it regards those attempts, is that they had proved a failure. No harvest was gathered in, in consequence of their being no latter rain. (See Joel ii. 21–23.) The "former (autumnal) rain" has always come moderately, but not the "latter (spring) rain."... It is a fact, that until the last twenty years the Jews could not return to the Holy Land without having to import food. Since about 1840, the latter rains have fallen regularly; and now, instead of having to import food, agriculturalists are able to export wheat, barley, oil, and wine; and this state of prosperity is growing each year, the population at the same time rapidly increasing.....From a recent interview he had had with Sir M. Montefiore, he was able to assert that the value of the land in and around Jerusalem is more than double what it was some time ago, and that it is expected in ten years, or even in five years, to double again in value. The speaker drew especial attention to verses 4, 6, 8, &c., of Ezek. xxxvi., as showing that, prior to the restoration, the land itself shall prosper. The improved condition of Israel as regards civil and religious privileges was also pointed out as worthy of attention and of deep interest.

Mr. Littlecot, who had been in the Holy Land, stated that until lately there had been but few trees there; that it was peopled mostly by strangers, but that the land was being prepared by those very strangers for the Jews. The spiritual blessings, too, were rather amongst those strangers than amongst the Jews. He spoke of the large crops now produced, and that last year, when he was visiting Jerusalem, vast numbers of oranges were grown for exportation, as well as other crops. As yet not one-tenth of the land was cultivated. If it were so, the Arabs would come and carry away the crops.

Pastor Petaval, among other remarks, alluded to a society just formed in this country for the purpose of supplying Jerusalem with water, adding, "let us see in these healthy and living waters the types and fore-runners of the effusion of the Holy Spirit for which we wait."—Abridged from The Revival.

The water supply and drainage of Jerusalem form the subject of a recent able work by John Irwine Chitty, Civil Engineer, D. C. L., &c., of which an interesting resume was read before the Syro-Egyptian Society last Third Month. In it the writer showed how, at a very moderate outlay, the city might be efficiently drained and supplied with water. The Jerusalem Water Relief Society has been formed to give effect to Dr. Chitty's recommendations. It consists of Jews and Christians without regard to sect, creed, or nationality. Among its patrons are Lord Shaftesbury and Sir R. Murchison, and "the Rev." John Mills is its honorary Secretary. We shall be truly glad to learn that the sum required to construct the most essential works, about £8500, has been raised. We extract the following from Dr. Chitty's paper before referred to:—

"The rainy season at Jerusalem commences about the middle of October and usually terminates about the middle of April, after which no rain falls, except an occasional shower during the month of May. Hydrometric registers, quoted in Beardmore's tables, show particulars of the rain-fall in the district during twelve years. The annual depth of rain is no less than 65 inches. In one of the years recorded it amounted to 104 inches, and on no occasion was it less than 29 1-5 inches. Dr. Barclay's observations confirm the statement."

"In the performance of these works, especially in the sinking of the main sewer, not far from the cloisters of the Temple wall, in the 'valley of slaughter,' where cities lie on cities, and ruins over ruins—fifty feet, sixty feet in depth—what relics of the Jewish monarchy, what interesting antiquities might not be discovered! Perhaps priceless manuscripts, containing a fuller account of our race....or of the Jews, that wondrous nation.....The execution of this work would, I might almost say, infallibly lead to the discovery of one of the most important relics of the original Temple which we can now expect to find—the piers and foundations of that magnificent bridge which Solomon built across the Tyropœon, 'his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord,' mentioned in 2d Chronicles, which, together with 'his house that he had built,' and other objects of splendor, caused such astonishment in the Queen of Sheba 'that there was no spirit in her.'.... For the discovery of the 'springing' of the arch of the eastern abutment of this bridge we are indebted to Dr. Robinson; but the abutment itself, which formed part of the Temple wall, is buried in the ground, beneath the detritus and ruins of many Jerusalems.... Part of the first arch still remains protruding from the Haram wall. It consists of three courses of immense stones, one stone being 24½ feet in length and another 30¼, and measuring from a photograph, each of them is about 6 feet in height. It may well be asked, why were not these arch stones, which projected in such a conspicuous manner, discovered long before Dr. Robinson's visit? The answer is simply this:—From a distance their real nature is not easily discernible, and, till lately, none but Moslems, true believers, were permitted to approach the wall of 'the noble sanctuary,' for that is the meaning of the appellation, el-Haram-esh-Sherif, save at one spot, where the Jews, upon payment of a tribute, are and have been for a number of years allowed to draw near and kiss the stones of their ancient temple and mourn over its fall; hence the name it bears, the Jews' Wailing Place. I have seen tears rolling down the poor creatures' eyes as they loudly and vehemently chanted their hymns, during the time shaking their bodies vehemently, (for what purpose I cannot tell), and then pressing their lips and bosoms to the hallowed great stones in the wall. It painfully called to memory the words of the Psalmist, 'Thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof;' and nothing more than a few stones and the very dust now remain to them.....The bridge (Gerupha) is often incidentally mentioned by Josephus. It was either upon this very abutment, or near it, that Titus, having captured the Temple, stood to hold a parley with the Jews in their last extremity; speaking to them across the Tyropœon—for they still retained possession of the 'Upper City' or modern Zion—and entreating of those that were left to spare him the necessity of committing further carnage, by laying down their arms and submitting to his standard. I must own that I was never in my life so greatly affected with compassion and awe as when wandering over the foundations of that Tyropœon bridge, amidst a jungle of gigantic cactus overtopping my head, and within a stone's throw of the Jew's Wailing Place."—The London Friend.

A CRITICISM.

In "Individual Plan, No. 5," we find the following words: "We admit that he (man) has a soul or spirit or mind, which constitutes his (man's) essential identity," (and we wish to separate the two sentences) "but we deny—now and forever—that THIS soul, or spirit, or mind is capable of a living existence apart from the body."

Now if I was a believer in the duality of man, I would say, amen to the above paragraph; and if I was a believer in the doctrine of an immortal principle in man, I would say, amen, my Br.; but as I do not believe in either, I file my objections against them both. I can find the same sentiment in Professor Bush, and have heard the same sentiment advocated by Professor Field, the Sweedenborgean. His remarks were, It only needs the identity to be kept up; we do not need the old body; take for instance the seven-year locust; it emerges from the ground a worm, it bursts open in the back, and the real locust emerges forth and leaves the old body behind; the identity was all that it needed.

"We admit that he has a soul or spirit or mind." Who is the he, that has a soul? Is the identity the he, without the body? or, is there another man inside of the body, constituting the he? or, is man made up of two halves? the body part, the animal returns to the dust and scattered to the four winds of heaven; but the identity part may be (reconstructed) again reproduced in a different organization; that is, Its earthly house may be exchanged for a heavenly one? "Its," who, or what is this its? Is it the man? "Oh, no," it is the "soul or mind or spirit," or something that inhabits a body, so say all immortal soul believers.

Does our Br.'s theory, compel him to adopt such a mode of interpretation? If so, I shall be compelled to leave off the word "God's," and write it, Individual Plan; for it certainly is not the plan taught by Jesus and the Apostles. A few passages will settle that point. "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush; when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac and Jacob." Jesus, indorsing Moses, does not say there is an identy of these men that will be reproduced in a different organization; but the dead are raised: and Paul says, Jesus Christ died, and was buried, and rose again according to the scriptures. God did not take an entity and construct a body, and place this entity in it, and call it Christ. No, when the women visited the tomb, they were told He is not here, he is risen. Who was Jesus? Was he an animal man? Paul says, he was made of a woman; HE was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of Holiness, by the resurrection of the dead. But says one, Jesus had not yet seen corruption, and therefore God could raise him from the dead. But Paul says, in Ephesians i. 19, 20, "And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us ward, who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead." Now says Jesus, handle me and see. Thomas, be not doubting but believe; and John says, it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John iii. 2. Now says Paul, after discussing the subject, "But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain; for if the dead rise not, then is Christ not risen. But now is Christ risen, (where from?) the DEAD, and become the first fruits of them that slept." 1 Cor. xv.

Again Paul says, "So also is the resurrection of the dead, IT is sown in corruption, IT (the same IT,) is raised in incorruption; IT is sown in dishonour, IT is raised in glory; IT is sown in weakness, IT is raised in power; IT is sown an animal body, IT is raised a spiritual body; there is an animal body and there is a spiritual body." But Paul says, the animal body becomes a spiritual body, by the power of God's mighty operation upon that same body, which he calls the IT. Now we apprehend it is no more difficult for God to raise the whole body, or man, than it is for him to take a small portion called the identity, and vitalize it, and make a man out of it; and if there is any part of man that does not come under the sentence, we would like to know what that part is? The indefinite part, called a soul, or spirit, or mind, is too indefinite; that is too much like common theology.

Again, our Br. makes an admission which is fatal to the whole truth we have been advocating for the last twenty years. After naming several texts, such as "to-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," "if received as evidence of survivance after death, would prove nothing concerning the natural man. If through the Spirit in them the righteous were carried directly to heaven at the expiration of their animal life, what would that avail in behalf of the unspiritual? Nothing at all." If such an admission is made, it denies the Bible doctrine that man dies, and denies the Bible doctrine that there is a resurrection of the dead.

In this same article, we find the following words:—"'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin.' 'Since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead.' No one will dispute the literality of the resurrection spoken of. But if the resurrection is literal, the death MUST be; and Paul alludes to the death which is the consequence of sin in our first parent."

Now in this paragraph, our Br. admits the whole argument. What was Adam? And how did he die? Moses said, he was made of dust; and not one word about his having an identity, called a soul or mind or spirit: but the whole man became a living soul; and as such, God recognized him, and dealt with him; and so Paul says in 1 Cor. xv., from which our Br. quotes: "Who, or what did God address? Not the body of Adam, but the soul or mind; he spoke to the spirit or understanding which is in man" He spoke to the man, and not to an undivided part of man; but to Adam, the living man, and God said to him, dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return. And Paul says, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and a host of worthies died not having received the promise. Now unless the same Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob come up in the resurrection, it will not fulfil the promise of God. I know the Br. will meet me here and say, the blood life was forfeited. I answer, the whole man was forfeited; and the question might be asked, Has man any other life but the blood life? If he has, then he has two lives, and is a compound, or dual being; but such a man is not the one addressed by the Lord, nor is such a man the one our Br. speaks of in the last sentence we copied, "But if the resurrection is literal the death must be;" does our Br. believe it, then the whole man dies, and the whole man comes up again. But if only an essential identity constitutes the man, then only an essential identity dies; for this is all that has a resurrection out of the man, all else is reproduced out of some other material, or exchanged for a heavenly one.

We are like the Apostle in a straight between two conflicting opinions, not knowing which our Br. believes; for we think the first position destroys the last; and the last the first; but we hope our Br. will make his position clear, as we cannot accept any plan as God's plan which contains such, as we think, unscriptural views.

Yours, hoping for the truth,
JACOB GRIM.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

My brother holds that no distinction can be made between mind and body, without surrendering the doctrine of man's natural perishability. For myself, I am compelled to make the distinction, and yet as I have stated in the passages quoted by my brother, I do not surrender my belief in the mortality of the whole man. My brother asks, "Who is the He that has a soul?" I answer as stated in my article—the man. The same man that has a hand, a foot, a heart, a brain, has a mind. Is there any thing very terrible in this? The difference between my brother and myself is in this: he is so fearful of fable that he will deny a truth; I am so fearful of fable that I will not deny a truth. Lest he should believe that man's mind is immortal, he will deny that man has any mind; whereas I can admit that man has a mind without holding that it is immortal.

My brother quotes Jesus—"Now that the dead are raised," &c., and remarks, "Jesus does not say there is an identity of these men that will be reproduced in a different organization." True; but does that prove that they will not be reproduced in a different organization? My brother quotes John—"It doth not yet appear what we shall be"—Does he believe this? Or does not his treatment of the whole subject indicate his confidence in his own knowledge of what we shall be? Three quarters of what my brother has said I believe just as strongly as he possibly can. Why then use so many words?

It is clear to my mind that some thing is left unchanged in the process which brings us from mortality to immortality. An entire change would not be the salvation of the same man. "Shall we know each other there?" How, if there is an entire change? Shall we be there? How, if our identity is destroyed by an absolute change of our whole being? What connection is there between the mortal man and the immortal man? "The Lord Jesus shall change our vile body like unto his glorious body." But is our mind changed? Is our character changed? My brother is so anxious to save the animal man that he will be compelled to deny any change whatever, whereas I can admit a change of our mode of existence while I believe the essential man is the same now and hereafter.

My brother appears to scout the idea that there is an essential difference between the condition of the righteous and the wicked in this life. He ignores the work of the Spirit altogether. Does the Spirit do nothing for us? Are we not now begotten from above? Is not the seed of an incorruptible nature implanted in us? Now I believe that it makes all the difference in the world to a man whether he has the Spirit or not. I believe that the Spirit does an essential work for us here, and that unless this work is done for us in this life, we shall perish like the beasts. The Spirit is the preserving element. What does it take hold of? Does it affect the flesh and the blood—then the flesh and the blood must be saved in the resurrection. But here I query. Is the blood essential to our personal identity? Then the blood must be reproduced in the resurrection? But here I query.

I have a great deal on my mind in relation to this matter which I cannot express. We have others to benefit as well as ourselves. If I can help any one to the plain truth by dropping a point that seems useless, I am willing to do so. It does appear useless to tell every inquirer—"You have not got any soul." How much better it is to admit a distinction between mind and body and keep to the real question. We deny man's immortality, but we confess that he may become immortal by accepting the Spirit. Man by nature has no preeminence above other animals; but if he will allow the Spirit of God to do its work, his condition will be changed. Although the righteous man apparently perishes in death, yet we have the assurance of Christ that he "shall never perish." He is not dead, but sleepeth, and when the time shall come he will awake from sleep. I am willing to receive light from any quarter. J. T. C.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 25, 1864.

"THE DISCUSSION" WITH PROF. MATTISON.—This work, published several years since, is out of print. We have not a copy left in paper covers, and only some half dozen bound ones. No more can be printed, as the stereotype plates were "annihilated" some time since. The Prof. has resurrected his part of that "Discussion;" thus demonstrating that the wicked dead can be raised; but he has not succeeded in imparting life to it. It is dead as ever, though raised and re-baptized by the Christian Advocate of this city. They will soon find that it is only a decayed carcass; full of rottenness, and "dead men's bones."

The Conference in Providence

Our readers will doubtless be glad to know that the Providence gathering was a success. It was not to be expected that we should have as large a company as that in Boston—nevertheless we had good congregations on the week evenings, and on Sunday. There is reason to believe that much good was done to the people in general, and those who are firm in the truth rejoiced exceedingly. Praise YAHVEH for his benefits.

Besides preaching, there were interesting Conference meetings. Invitations were given for a free expression of views on the part of dissenters, and several interesting passages occurred; particularly on Friday evening, when Acts xxiv. 15 was expounded: which occasioned some questions on the other side, and some remarks from several brethren in support of the discourse. The truth shone like the sun. J. T. C.

The Late Conference.

BR. STORRS:—Undoubtedly some of our Brn. will send for publication an account of the late Conference at Providence, yet I feel constrained to write a little in regard to it, having myself enjoyed the privilege of attending the same. It was to me indeed a feast of fat things, and for the past week I have been ruminating, and think I shall be able to go in the strength of what I received for some time, if I have no other means of subsistence.

I suppose the meeting was not as large as the one held in Boston, last October; but it was an excellent one, and I am satisfied much good will result from it. Although different opinions on some points were entertained by those present, yet harmony of feeling prevailed, making our social meetings precious and refreshing seasons; while the preaching was effective and accompanied with divine energy and power, causing the hearts of the believers to rejoice exceedingly. I think the honest inquirer after truth could not fail to have been enlightened, nor the weak in faith fail to be strengthened.

The glorious, God-honoring doctrine of Life in Christ alone, as presented by those who preached the Word, and by many others in the social meetings never shone with greater resplendency. Had I never felt satisfied previously that the Lord was in this move, I should have no doubts now. The work is progressing well, and the fact that since the Campmeeting at Wilbraham our preaching brethren have received more calls than they can possibly attend to, and the cry is still sounding, "Come over and help us," gives evidence that "a great door and effectual has been opened" to this truth; and though "there be many adversaries," no man can shut it.

Let the hearts of God's saints be encouraged, "The word that is gone forth out of his mouth shall not return unto him void, but it shall accomplish his pleasure and shall prosper in the thing whereunto he has sent it."

The Lord bless his truth, his cause and his people, and especially remember the dear church in Providence for all their labor of love toward his children, and, as the fruit of the Conference, add many to their number of such as shall be accounted worthy to receive Life eternal when the great LIFE-GIVER shall appear. LOUISA J. BEACH.

The Popes Bull.

The Pope, it seems, has let loose another "bull," to see if he can not "gore his neighbor's ox." Poor Pope, his bull has lost its horns, and like Sampson, when his hair was gone, his "Holiness" seems to have lost his eyes. Truly he is a "blind leader of the blind." The Paris Correspondent of The Methodist writes under date of Dec. 27, 1864, as follows:

"The great politico-religious event of the week is the Pope's encyclical letter, in which his Holiness fulminates dire presages of ill against all the isms of modern civilization. First and foremost there is Protestant-ism, and with this enormity are classed Republican-ism, social-ism, athe-ism, panthe-ism, and all other isms which fail to teach that the Church of Rome is the only true church, and that its head is the only true governor of the universe, temporally and spiritually.

"This letter is wonderfully calculated to widen the breach already commenced between the Catholic Church of France, which professes to be liberal, and his Holiness. All the political journals, even those most Catholic in their tendencies, are disposed to make an issue with Rome itself, on the theories thus daringly propounded. They say that the theory resulting from this emanation from the Holy See is simply this: 'The people are in the hands of the Princes, the Princes under the guidance of the Pope, the Pope, to an extent of which he alone is the judge, he being always infallible, may interfere in temporal affairs; the Princes can not, under any pretext, do so in religious matters; the Roman Catholic religion alone has the right to public worship; the Princes are obliged to protect it, and to repress the celebration of other forms of religion, not only in the name of public order, but because the church has the right to inflict corporal punishment on those who violate its laws, and the crime of heresy which has been effaced from modern codes, is to be maintained and punished as in the middle ages.'

"Naturally this infers a revival of the Inquisition in its palmiest days. It is the interest of the French church to teach the people that these ideas do not emanate from the Holy Father. I have conversed with several Catholics of a class without much instruction, but who are, without knowing it, imbued fully with the spirit of '93, who replied to my recounting these fierce anathemas against other religions, that it was not the Pope who said thus and so—it was the Cardinal Antonelli, who was a very wicked man (un mechant). It is thus that the French clergy compromise with that terrible phantom, the Revolution, which threatens them constantly with resuscitation."

Prof. Mattison on Immortality.

"The history of the creation of the first man, Genesis first and second chapters, shows conclusively, that he was created a compound being, consisting of a material body and an immaterial soul. 'And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.' Here we have the general fact asserted, that the Infinite Spirit created man in his own image. He must therefore have had a spiritual nature, unless the offspring of 'the Father of spirits' was simply a material being, and at the same time, 'in the image' of that God who is a spirit."

What a pity it is that men do not study the whole Scriptures! If the Professor had compared Paul with Moses, he might have saved himself from perpetrating a sad blunder. He thinks, from the Mosaic account, that man "must have had a spiritual nature" when he was created. Let us hear Paul on this very point: "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual but that which is animal; and afterward that which is spiritual." 1 Cor. xv. 45,46. Paul declares that the first Adam was not spiritual; but Prof. M. says that he was. Which shall we believe? It will not do to interpret the phrase "in his own image" so that Paul's express assertion will be contradicted. And here the distinction that we have made in our first and second articles on God's individual plan will be appreciated. God did intend to make man "spiritual;" but the work is accomplished in "the last Adam," not in the first. With this understanding, Moses and Paul agree. On page 27, Prof. M. says:

The second step in the process of creation, was the vivifying or animation of this man of dust. God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." This act was plainly the infusion or inspiration of a spiritual nature into the material body. It was not the imparting of a merely animal life—it was more. Dr. Adam Clarke, like most other Hebrew critics, renders the passage, "nishmath chaiyim, the breath of lives, i. e., animal and intellectual." Benson renders the phrase, "the soul of lives," and the author of the "Literal Translation from the Hebrew," renders the passage, "and Jehovah Elohim formed a very man of dust of the ground, and blew into his nostrils the living spirit, and man was for a living creature." Not only did animal life then begin, but also that higher life in which consisted, in a great measure, the image of his Maker. He was but a body before; but has now become "a living soul."

What a contrast between Moses and Prof. M.! The former says that God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life; but the latter says that God "infused a spiritual nature into the material body." Prof. M. admits that animal life was imparted, but in connection with this was the spiritual nature. This assertion is grounded on the plural term chayyim—lives. But this will prove too much. In the account of the flood it is said that "every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort.... went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein the breath of LIVES—chayyim." Gen. xii. 15. How will this suit you, Professor? Will you admit that all the animal world have "a spiritual nature?" But if the plural, "lives," proves it for man it proves it for brute. So you had better think well of our suggestion last week, and make all things animal the possessors of spiritual and immortal natures. Now if you will acquire the rudiments of Hebrew you will learn that the original word for "life" usually occurs in plural form, and hence no inference can be taken for more than one kind of life. For specimen texts in addition, see Gen. iii, 14, 17; vi. 17; vii. 22; xxv. 7.

After Adam received the breath of life he "became a living soul." Or, as Prof. M. states it "He was but a body before, but has now become 'a living SOUL.'" Is it not shameful that a man who has given attention to the subject for ten years, should not have learned a fact which has been again and again iterated? The term "living soul" is rendered from the Hebrew—nephesh chayyah. Now this exact phrase occurs twice in the first chapter of Genesis. "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life—nephesh chayyah." The marginal reading is "living soul." V. 21. "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature—nephesh chayyah—after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind." V. 24. The phrase occurs in Gen. ii. 19. "And out of the ground YAHVEH Elohim formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto the man to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature—nephesh chayyah—that was the name thereof." So that after God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, he became—just what every fish, and beast, and creeping thing was before his creation—a living soul.

The Professor quotes Dr. Adam Clarke. Did he ever read what Clarke says on the phrase nephesh chayyah? In his comment on Gen. i. 24, Clarke says that it is "a general term to express all creatures endued with animal life." Paul says, "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul." 1 Cor. xv. 45. John Wesley comments thus—"God gave him such life as other animals enjoy." And Prof. M. thinks something of John Wesley. Did the Professor ever read Wesley's Notes on the N. T.? Is it not true that the blind in our day have blind men for leaders? Is it wilful blindness in the Professor? His past actions appear to justify such a thought. J. T. C.

Elds. Durfee and Bishop's Discussion.

BR. STORRS:—Thinking it may not be uninteresting to the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE to hear something from our late discussion in Providence, I send you a very brief synopsis of it.

First, I will give you the principal points made by Elder Durfee. His sayings were as follows, viz.:

Christ came to save that which was lost. The world was lost; therefore he came to save the world. This salvation is unconditional, and is salvation from death. God, by a special act of grace and mercy, through Christ, redeems all men from physical death. The victory over death is gained by raising all men from the dead. When death is destroyed nobody is dead, they have all been raised from the dead, and their resurrection destroys death. There is no such thing as extinguishing man's life principle; it is eternal. Man is wholly mortal. Christ was raised by the same life princple he laid down. Christ as the first fruits was a sample of the resurrection of all his people. Christians will be raised incorruptible. Christians will be raised with the same life they lay down and have it eternally. There is no such thing as immortal life. Christ was raised incorruptible. It is no part of the divine economy to make men miserable. I have not, said God will raise the wicked dead and kill them over again, and Br. Bishop has no right to suppose I believe it. The wicked are to experience everlasting shame, and they can not suffer shame unless they are conscious. God will raise all the wicked and destroy them together. Christians in the resurrection state will live by breathing just as much as they do here. Christians will eat after they are resurrected, therefore they have blood in the resurrection state. The law got from Jesus Christ just what it demanded from us, and was wholly satisfied. The law demands our animal life. The race of Adam are not amenable to the law, after Christ becomes surety to the law for the race. Christ became surety to the law for the race as soon as Adam sinned. From Adam to the last of his race, Christ saves all from all the consequences of Adam's sin, unconditionally. The consequences of Adam's sin are physical death and moral corruption. Christ by dying removed the curse of death. The death of Christ sets the race up, morally, just where they stood before Adam sinned. A gift offered on conditions is not a free gift. It is no redemption to make the condition of a man better than it was before. Man did not loose eternal life, or immortality, for he never had either. Man became mortal by sinning. God imputes the righteousness of Christ to all the race of Adam without any conditions. The term resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv., means all the dead. Paul throughout the 8th chapter of Romans is talking of spiritual life and death only. The Christian has nothing but an animal life.

The positions the negative undertook to sustain were as follows:

1st. There is no future life promised to the race of Adam except through Christ.

2d. That life is on the condition of faith.

3d. The only resurrection to life taught in the word of God is a conditional resurrection.

4th. This resurrection is a promised blessing.

5th. This resurrection is to an incorruptible, or endless life.

6th. The scriptures teach, in the most positive language, that wicked dead men will never be revived into life. S. W. BISHOP.

Providence, R. I.

A Correction—An Addition.

On first page and third column of Herald, Jan. 11, "all nations" should read "the nations." The MS. in question retains panta, all; but omits ta thna, the nations.

It was far from our purpose to give such a favorable opportunity to use the exclamation point.

Happily we do not rest the argument on the omission cited above, as our brother, J. T. C., assumes. Its omission or retention does not effect the main argument nor yet the "collateral," because neither is predicated upon it; and what is more, we are bound to be guided by the general tenor or harmony of the scriptures; so, should we give it up, we loose nothing but it, be it worth little or much.

God, in his excellent wisdom, has so duplicated and reduplicated his word that his children are not dependent upon the particular reading of a few words to know what is truth. We say this with no purpose to underrate the importance of learning and criticism, nor yet the sanctity of Gods word; but to the praise of his name who has been chiefly dependent upon the poor and illiterate for the reception and dissemination of His truth. E. W.

Eatontown, N. J.

RESPONSIVE REMARKS.—We ask pardon of our brother, E. W., for having noticed what seems to have been an oversight; but perhaps we all need spurring up to carefulness in our statements, concerning the scriptures.

We scarcely understand what is meant by the charge of assumption in the above. It is clear that our brother attempted an explanation of Rev. xv. 4, which headed his article. And his entire argument hinged on the omission of the word "nations" from the text. As we showed that the word can not be justly omitted, it follows that his argument was a failure. Where then is the assumption? We expressly said that we did not wish to meddle with our brother's view of the Apocalypse; hence the "collateral argument" we did not notice. It had nothing to do with our purpose, which was simply to defend the received reading of the text, and to explode the exposition of E. W. He applied the text to "the saints," whereas the word says "the nations." We concluded thus: "With the retention of the word in question, our brother's argument [we referred to his argument on the text] falls to the ground, and as we have vindicated the integrity of the text as it stands, another exposition it necessary." Did we "assume" any thing?

To our brother's concluding paragraph we say Amen. J. T. C.

Has the Promise been Fulfilled?

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

In the Herald, Vol. ii. No. 9, occurs the following:

"That this [Abram's] inheritance rests solely upon promises is evident from the language. The first is contained in Gen. xii. 1—3, which is God's promise to make of him a great nation. .... This was fulfilled according to 2 Sam. vii. 23—'And what one nation in the world is like unto thy people, even Israel.'

"The next promise contained the boundary of the land, also describing the magnitude of Abram's seed, comparing it to the dust of the earth. ... The boundaries are, from the river of Egypt (Nile) unto the great river Euphrates. ... That this promise to Abraham was a conditional one is evident."

We have often noticed how loosely a logical mind can reason when an untenable theory is to be defended. The above extract suggests three points.

1. It is said that the promise made to Abram that he should be a great nation, has been fulfilled; and the language of David is quoted as a proof. The writer furnishes a weapon for his own defeat, in stating the boundaries of the land, which was to be inherited by the said nation. Did Israel in the time of David, or in any other time, occupy the territory bounded by the Nile and the Euphrates? Certainly not. How then has the promise been fulfilled?

2. We are told that the promise to Abraham was a conditional one; which we admit; but this only gives the first statement a still harder blow; for the conditions were not complied with by ancient Israel, and therefore the promise could not have been fulfilled at the time asserted.

3. The words of David in 2 Sam. vii. 23 should be taken with the context. God promised David that his house should be established in the kingship for ever, and that Israel should dwell forever under the said government. David refers to this promise, and evidently treats of the future condition of the nation under the promised seed of David. Any unbiased mind will perceive this at one reading of the chapter. Hence it is unjust to say that the promise to Abraham "was fulfilled according to 2 Sam. vii. 23."

We are surprised that a writer whose main endeavor is to show that the promises do not affect Israel in the flesh, is nevertheless willing to say that the fundamental promise was fulfilled under the law covenant. We call this a surrender of the whole ground, and a great deal more. Blinded as we are by the doctrine of the age to come, we still have sufficient light to maintain the future fulfilment of the promises, and also their dependence on certain conditions. Thus we hold all that is really valuable in the position of the writer criticized, without denying our own position. But he is so fearful of being led in a new direction that he will actually attempt the dubious task of drawing two contrary conclusions from one premise, and in one article.

Immortality Philosophically Considered.

According to the prevalent orthodox view, man is possessed of an immortal soul, which, when the body dies, immediately transports itself to a state of bliss or woe, according to the character of its mundane existence. Leaving the theological argument entirely out of the present view, I hold that the natural immortality of the soul is a philosophical impossibility.

Philosophy recognizes as one of its essential causes a desire or love in man of following up his knowledge into unity. In the phenomena of mind and matter we discover similar convergent causes, a hundred seemingly distinct modes assembling themselves under a single cause, and we are led by analogy to infer—we can't know—that all the modifications of being subsist in one First Cause. To that first, unoriginated cause we of necessity impute eternal immortal life. There are legitimate grounds also, which all allow, for conceding to this being, whom we call God, all moral perfections. Now, it is evident that God, being the first and only eternal being, must have conferred upon all such as subsequently became immortal, immortality from his own nature; not multiplying but only distributing his own substance; for God could neither enlarge nor diminish his own nature, else were he not perfect. Immortal man, then, if such a being exist, is an emanation of Deity incarnate.

Again, it will be conceded by all that God, if he be the perfect being we conceive him to be, must be consistent in all his parts, if such a word be admissible of Deity, must be throughout homogeneus in substance. No emanation of his eternal nature can be of a character diverse from any other; all must be harmonious, else is God a conglomerate, a chaos.

Now, supposing man (or his soul if you choose) to be by nature immortal, he, being an emanation of Deity, without which there could be no Deity, must of necessity be of a character strictly similar to any other emanation of Deity, namely, wholly pure. The inevitable conclusion, therefore, is that every human being possessed of an immortal soul (and orthodoxy says all have such) is, nay, must be, morally perfect. But the experience of every one affords him ample testimony to the contrary. It is the confession of inspiration that "there is none that doeth good, no, not one." What an awful spectacle is thus presented! a God part good and part bad. Such a Deity, being divided against himself, and at perpetual war in the very elements of his nature, could not exist. The mind recoils, puny and agast, from the conception of so godless a God. Verily, the dogma which would create man an immortal being, would, at the same time annihilate God! N. K. R.

From Leonard C. Thorne.

BR. STORRS:—In view of the great pouring out of choice gifts upon those who were favored to meet in confereuce at Providence, as also upon other and similar occasions, I cannot well refrain from expressing to our friends, scattered abroad, how I have felt to praise God for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men. Feelings which I have very often experienced since, by the "Grace of God," I was first led to see those sublime truths that are, in these last days, being unfolded to earnest, honest seekers after truth; they who are willing to cast aside their prejudices and pre-conceived opinions, and with minds untrameled, as nearly as possible, by the traditions of men, and go to the holy record in a spirit of meekness and willingness to sit at Jesus' feet and learn of him.

How the great plans and purposes of God are laid open to the comprehension of such searchers for truth. The more we study into and pray for a correct understanding of those plans and purposes the better we do understand them; and the better we understand them, the more they seem to us to expand and grow big with goodness and love. When we give ourselves up to a contemplation of this wonderful exhibition of loving-kindness and tender mercy, we are led to praise the great God of all, and also to glorify the "Lamb that was slain." He who, not only himself trod the "path of life," though it led through the dark valley of humiliation, sorrow, suffering, and death, but so clearly marked out that pathway that faith, in its strong arms, bears us on through trials and suffering and will finally, if we continue faithful and persevere to the end, land us beyond the reach of all enemies, for they will be destroyed by the blessed Son of God when he comes to take possession of his Kingdom and "reign upon the throne of his father David." Look upon man as he is. Consider what, by revelation, he is shown to be; of the earth, earthy; possessing nothing of an inherent character but that which is natural or animal, reaping every thing of that nature which it can give, and that is only corruption. He can say to corruption, thou art my father, and unto the worm thou art my mother; and then look upon God, in his boundless love, instituting a plan whereby, upon certain conditions, man may become the possessor of a new nature, a new life-principle that will, ere long, by the Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him, be spoken into everlasting life: a life shadowed not by a sorrow: a life, the glory and the happiness whereof must continue to increase as ages roll around. O what a good God we have. What matchless love does he display! If all could behold him in the glory which these truths shed around him, who would not love such a God? Who would not devote a life to his service? Who would not yield willing obedience to the promptings of that Spirit which he sends into our hearts? May we all hold fast unto the end and share at last in the glories that shall be revealed when he who is our life shall appear.

BUNKER HILL, ILL., Jan. 9, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—The enclosed greenback is for two new subscribers. The subject of the non-living of the wicked becomes more and more interesting as I examine it. Husband inclined to that view several years ago; but I was strongly opposed, and he finally, as he expressed it, "laid it on the shelf."

At Wilbraham, last summer, I went to the "Boston tent," to prayer meeting, not knowing that it was a proscribed spot. I loved the brethren and sisters that met there. I had been absent from them five years. I went up the hill, and to the ground with my heart full the whole man became a living soul; and as such, God recognized him, and dealt with him; and so Paul says in 1 Cor. xv., from which our Br. quotes: "Who, or what did God address? Not the body of Adam, but the soul or mind; he spoke to the spirit or understanding which is in man" He spoke to the man, and not to an undivided part of man; but to Adam, the living man, and God said to him, dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return. And Paul says, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and a host of worthies died not having received the promise. Now unless the same Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob come up in the resurrection, it will not fulfil the promise of God. I know the Br. will meet me here and say, the blood life was forfeited. I answer, the whole man was forfeited; and the question might be asked, Has man any other life but the blood life? If he has, then he has two lives, and is a compound, or dual being; but such a man is not the one addressed by the Lord, nor is such a man the one our Br. speaks of in the last sentence we copied, "But if the resurrection is literal the death must be;" does our Br. believe it, then the whole man dies, and the whole man comes up again. But if only an essential identity constitutes the man, then only an essential identity dies; for this is all that has a resurrection out of the man, all else is reproduced out of some other material, or exchanged for a heavenly one.

We are like the Apostle in a straight between two conflicting opinions, not knowing which our Br. believes; for we think the first position destroys the last; and the last the first; but we hope our Br. will make his position clear, as we cannot accept any plan as God's plan which contains such, as we think, unscriptural views.

Yours, hoping for the truth,
JACOB GRIM.

REMARKS ON THE FOREGOING.

My brother holds that no distinction can be made between mind and body, without surrendering the doctrine of man's natural perishability. For myself, I am compelled to make the distinction, and yet as I have stated in the passages quoted by my brother, I do not surrender my belief in the mortality of the whole man. My brother asks, "Who is the He that has a soul?" I answer as stated in my article—the man. The same man that has a hand, a foot, a heart, a brain, has a mind. Is there any thing very terrible in this? The difference between my brother and myself is in this: he is so fearful of fable that he will deny a truth; I am so fearful of fable that I will not deny a truth. Lest he should believe that man's mind is immortal, he will deny that man has any mind; whereas I can admit that man has a mind without holding that it is immortal.

My brother quotes Jesus—"Now that the dead are raised," &c., and remarks, "Jesus does not say there is an identity of these men that will be reproduced in a different organization." True; but does that prove that they will not be reproduced in a different organization? My brother quotes John—"It doth not yet appear what we shall be"—Does he believe this? Or does not his treatment of the whole subject indicate his confidence in his own knowledge of what we shall be? Three quarters of what my brother has said I believe just as strongly as he possibly can. Why then use so many words?

It is clear to my mind that some thing is left unchanged in the process which brings us from mortality to immortality. An entire change would not be the salvation of the same man. "Shall we know each other there?" How, if there is an entire change? Shall we be there? How, if our identity is destroyed by an absolute change of our whole being? What connection is there between the mortal man and the immortal man? "The Lord Jesus shall change our vile body like unto his glorious body." But is our mind changed? Is our character changed? My brother is so anxious to save the animal man that he will be compelled to deny any change whatever, whereas I can admit a change of our mode of existence while I believe the essential man is the same now and hereafter.

My brother appears to scout the idea that there is an essential difference between the condition of the righteous and the wicked in this life. He ignores the work of the Spirit altogether. Does the Spirit do nothing for us? Are we not now begotten from above? Is not the seed of an incorruptible nature implanted in us? Now I believe that it makes all the difference in the world to a man whether he has the Spirit or not. I believe that the Spirit does an essential work for us here, and that unless this work is done for us in this life, we shall perish like the beasts. The Spirit is the preserving element. What does it take hold of? Does it affect the flesh and the blood—then the flesh and the blood must be saved in the resurrection. But here I query. Is the blood essential to our personal identity? Then the blood must be reproduced in the resurrection? But here I query.

I have a great deal on my mind in relation to this matter which I cannot express. We have others to benefit as well as ourselves. If I can help any one to the plain truth by dropping a point that seems useless, I am willing to do so. It does appear useless to tell every inquirer—"You have not got any soul." How much better it is to admit a distinction between mind and body and keep to the real question. We deny man's immortality, but we confess that he may become immortal by accepting the Spirit. Man by nature has no preeminence above other animals; but if he will allow the Spirit of God to do its work, his condition will be changed. Although the righteous man apparently perishes in death, yet we have the assurance of Christ that he "shall never perish." He is not dead, but sleepeth, and when the time shall come he will awake from sleep. I am willing to receive light from any quarter. J. T. C.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 25, 1864.

"THE DISCUSSION" WITH PROF. MATTISON.—This work, published several years since, is out of print. We have not a copy left in paper covers, and only some half dozen bound ones. No more can be printed, as the stereotype plates were "annihilated" some time since. The Prof. has resurrected his part of that "Discussion;" thus demonstrating that the wicked dead can be raised; but he has not succeeded in imparting life to it. It is dead as ever, though raised and re-baptized by the Christian Advocate of this city. They will soon find that it is only a decayed carcass; full of rottenness, and "dead men's bones."

The Conference in Providence

Our readers will doubtless be glad to know that the Providence gathering was a success. It was not to be expected that we should have as large a company as that in Boston—nevertheless we had good congregations on the week evenings, and on Sunday. There is reason to believe that much good was done to the people in general, and those who are firm in the truth rejoiced exceedingly. Praise YAHVEH for his benefits.

Besides preaching, there were interesting Conference meetings. Invitations were given for a free expression of views on the part of dissenters, and several interesting passages occurred; particularly on Friday evening, when Acts xxiv. 15 was expounded: which occasioned some questions on the other side, and some remarks from several brethren in support of the discourse. The truth shone like the sun. J. T. C.

The Late Conference.

BR. STORRS:—Undoubtedly some of our Brn. will send for publication an account of the late Conference at Providence, yet I feel constrained to write a little in regard to it, having myself enjoyed the privilege of attending the same. It was to me indeed a feast of fat things, and for the past week I have been ruminating, and think I shall be able to go in the strength of what I received for some time, if I have no other means of subsistence.

I suppose the meeting was not as large as the one held in Boston, last October; but it was an excellent one, and I am satisfied much good will result from it. Although different opinions on some points were entertained by those present, yet harmony of feeling prevailed, making our social meetings precious and refreshing seasons; while the preaching was effective and accompanied with divine energy and power, causing the hearts of the believers to rejoice exceedingly. I think the honest inquirer after truth could not fail to have been enlightened, nor the weak in faith fail to be strengthened.

The glorious, God-honoring doctrine of Life in Christ alone, as presented by those who preached the Word, and by many others in the social meetings never shone with greater resplendency. Had I never felt satisfied previously that the Lord was in this move, I should have no doubts now. The work is progressing well, and the fact that since the Campmeeting at Wilbraham our preaching brethren have received more calls than they can possibly attend to, and the cry is still sounding, "Come over and help us," gives evidence that "a great door and effectual has been opened" to this truth; and though "there be many adversaries," no man can shut it.

Let the hearts of God's saints be encouraged, "The word that is gone forth out of his mouth shall not return unto him void, but it shall accomplish his pleasure and shall prosper in the thing whereunto he has sent it."

The Lord bless his truth, his cause and his people, and especially remember the dear church in Providence for all their labor of love toward his children, and, as the fruit of the Conference, add many to their number of such as shall be accounted worthy to receive Life eternal when the great LIFE-GIVER shall appear. LOUISA J. BEACH.

The Popes Bull.

The Pope, it seems, has let loose another "bull," to see if he can not "gore his neighbor's ox." Poor Pope, his bull has lost its horns, and like Sampson, when his hair was gone, his "Holiness" seems to have lost his eyes. Truly he is a "blind leader of the blind." The Paris Correspondent of The Methodist writes under date of Dec. 27, 1864, as follows:

"The great politico-religious event of the week is the Pope's encyclical letter, in which his Holiness fulminates dire presages of ill against all the isms of modern civilization. First and foremost there is Protestant-ism, and with this enormity are classed Republican-ism, social-ism, athe-ism, panthe-ism, and all other isms which fail to teach that the Church of Rome is the only true church, and that its head is the only true governor of the universe, temporally and spiritually.

"This letter is wonderfully calculated to widen the breach already commenced between the Catholic Church of France, which professes to be liberal, and his Holiness. All the political journals, even those most Catholic in their tendencies, are disposed to make an issue with Rome itself, on the theories thus daringly propounded. They say that the theory resulting from this emanation from the Holy See is simply this: 'The people are in the hands of the Princes, the Princes under the guidance of the Pope, the Pope, to an extent of which he alone is the judge, he being always infallible, may interfere in temporal affairs; the Princes can not, under any pretext, do so in religious matters; the Roman Catholic religion alone has the right to public worship; the Princes are obliged to protect it, and to repress the celebration of other forms of religion, not only in the name of public order, but because the church has the right to inflict corporal punishment on those who violate its laws, and the crime of heresy which has been effaced from modern codes, is to be maintained and punished as in the middle ages.'

"Naturally this infers a revival of the Inquisition in its palmiest days. It is the interest of the French church to teach the people that these ideas do not emanate from the Holy Father. I have conversed with several Catholics of a class without much instruction, but who are, without knowing it, imbued fully with the spirit of '93, who replied to my recounting these fierce anathemas against other religions, that it was not the Pope who said thus and so—it was the Cardinal Antonelli, who was a very wicked man (un mechant). It is thus that the French clergy compromise with that terrible phantom, the Revolution, which threatens them constantly with resuscitation."

Prof. Mattison on Immortality.

"The history of the creation of the first man, Genesis first and second chapters, shows conclusively, that he was created a compound being, consisting of a material body and an immaterial soul. 'And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.' Here we have the general fact asserted, that the Infinite Spirit created man in his own image. He must therefore have had a spiritual nature, unless the offspring of 'the Father of spirits' was simply a material being, and at the same time, 'in the image' of that God who is a spirit."

What a pity it is that men do not study the whole Scriptures! If the Professor had compared Paul with Moses, he might have saved himself from perpetrating a sad blunder. He thinks, from the Mosaic account, that man "must have had a spiritual nature" when he was created. Let us hear Paul on this very point: "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual but that which is animal; and afterward that which is spiritual." 1 Cor. xv. 45,46. Paul declares that the first Adam was not spiritual; but Prof. M. says that he was. Which shall we believe? It will not do to interpret the phrase "in his own image" so that Paul's express assertion will be contradicted. And here the distinction that we have made in our first and second articles on God's individual plan will be appreciated. God did intend to make man "spiritual;" but the work is accomplished in "the last Adam," not in the first. With this understanding, Moses and Paul agree. On page 27, Prof. M. says:

The second step in the process of creation, was the vivifying or animation of this man of dust. God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life." This act was plainly the infusion or inspiration of a spiritual nature into the material body. It was not the imparting of a merely animal life—it was more. Dr. Adam Clarke, like most other Hebrew critics, renders the passage, "nishmath chaiyim, the breath of lives, i. e., animal and intellectual." Benson renders the phrase, "the soul of lives," and the author of the "Literal Translation from the Hebrew," renders the passage, "and Jehovah Elohim formed a very man of dust of the ground, and blew into his nostrils the living spirit, and man was for a living creature." Not only did animal life then begin, but also that higher life in which consisted, in a great measure, the image of his Maker. He was but a body before; but has now become "a living soul."

What a contrast between Moses and Prof. M.! The former says that God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life; but the latter says that God "infused a spiritual nature into the material body." Prof. M. admits that animal life was imparted, but in connection with this was the spiritual nature. This assertion is grounded on the plural term chayyim—lives. But this will prove too much. In the account of the flood it is said that "every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort.... went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein the breath of LIVES—chayyim." Gen. xii. 15. How will this suit you, Professor? Will you admit that all the animal world have "a spiritual nature?" But if the plural, "lives," proves it for man it proves it for brute. So you had better think well of our suggestion last week, and make all things animal the possessors of spiritual and immortal natures. Now if you will acquire the rudiments of Hebrew you will learn that the original word for "life" usually occurs in plural form, and hence no inference can be taken for more than one kind of life. For specimen texts in addition, see Gen. iii, 14, 17; vi. 17; vii. 22; xxv. 7.

After Adam received the breath of life he "became a living soul." Or, as Prof. M. states it "He was but a body before, but has now become 'a living SOUL.'" Is it not shameful that a man who has given attention to the subject for ten years, should not have learned a fact which has been again and again iterated? The term "living soul" is rendered from the Hebrew—nephesh chayyah. Now this exact phrase occurs twice in the first chapter of Genesis. "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life—nephesh chayyah." The marginal reading is "living soul." V. 21. "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature—nephesh chayyah—after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind." V. 24. The phrase occurs in Gen. ii. 19. "And out of the ground YAHVEH Elohim formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto the man to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature—nephesh chayyah—that was the name thereof." So that after God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, he became—just what every fish, and beast, and creeping thing was before his creation—a living soul.

The Professor quotes Dr. Adam Clarke. Did he ever read what Clarke says on the phrase nephesh chayyah? In his comment on Gen. i. 24, Clarke says that it is "a general term to express all creatures endued with animal life." Paul says, "And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul." 1 Cor. xv. 45. John Wesley comments thus—"God gave him such life as other animals enjoy." And Prof. M. thinks something of John Wesley. Did the Professor ever read Wesley's Notes on the N. T.? Is it not true that the blind in our day have blind men for leaders? Is it wilful blindness in the Professor? His past actions appear to justify such a thought. J. T. C.

Elds. Durfee and Bishop's Discussion.

BR. STORRS:—Thinking it may not be uninteresting to the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE to hear something from our late discussion in Providence, I send you a very brief synopsis of it.

First, I will give you the principal points made by Elder Durfee. His sayings were as follows, viz.:

Christ came to save that which was lost. The world was lost; therefore he came to save the world. This salvation is unconditional, and is salvation from death. God, by a special act of grace and mercy, through Christ, redeems all men from physical death. The victory over death is gained by raising all men from the dead. When death is destroyed nobody is dead, they have all been raised from the dead, and their resurrection destroys death. There is no such thing as extinguishing man's life principle; it is eternal. Man is wholly mortal. Christ was raised by the same life principle he laid down. Christ as the first fruits was a sample of the resurrection of all his people. Christians will be raised incorruptible. Christians will be raised with the same life they lay down and have it eternally. There is no such thing as immortal life. Christ was raised incorruptible. It is no part of the divine economy to make men miserable. I have not, said God will raise the wicked dead and kill them over again, and Br. Bishop has no right to suppose I believe it. The wicked are to experience everlasting shame, and they can not suffer shame unless they are conscious. God will raise all the wicked and destroy them together. Christians in the resurrection state will live by breathing just as much as they do here. Christians will eat after they are resurrected, therefore they have blood in the resurrection state. The law got from Jesus Christ just what it demanded from us, and was wholly satisfied. The law demands our animal life. The race of Adam are not amenable to the law, after Christ becomes surety to the law for the race. Christ became surety to the law for the race as soon as Adam sinned. From Adam to the last of his race, Christ saves all from all the consequences of Adam's sin, unconditionally. The consequences of Adam's sin are physical death and moral corruption. Christ by dying removed the curse of death. The death of Christ sets the race up, morally, just where they stood before Adam sinned. A gift offered on conditions is not a free gift. It is no redemption to make the condition of a man better than it was before. Man did not loose eternal life, or immortality, for he never had either. Man became mortal by sinning. God imputes the righteousness of Christ to all the race of Adam without any conditions. The term resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv., means all the dead. Paul throughout the 8th chapter of Romans is talking of spiritual life and death only. The Christian has nothing but an animal life.

The positions the negative undertook to sustain were as follows:

1st. There is no future life promised to the race of Adam except through Christ.

2d. That life is on the condition of faith.

3d. The only resurrection to life taught in the word of God is a conditional resurrection.

4th. This resurrection is a promised blessing.

5th. This resurrection is to an incorruptible, or endless life.

6th. The scriptures teach, in the most positive language, that wicked dead men will never be revived into life. S. W. BISHOP.

Providence, R. I.

A Correction—An Addition.

On first page and third column of Herald, Jan. 11, "all nations" should read "the nations." The MS. in question retains panta, all; but omits ta thna, the nations.

It was far from our purpose to give such a favorable opportunity to use the exclamation point.

Happily we do not rest the argument on the omission cited above, as our brother, J. T. C., assumes. Its omission or retention does not effect the main argument nor yet the "collateral," because neither is predicated upon it; and what is more, we are bound to be guided by the general tenor or harmony of the scriptures; so, should we give it up, we loose nothing but it, be it worth little or much.

God, in his excellent wisdom, has so duplicated and reduplicated his word that his children are not dependent upon the particular reading of a few words to know what is truth. We say this with no purpose to underrate the importance of learning and criticism, nor yet the sanctity of Gods word; but to the praise of his name who has been chiefly dependent upon the poor and illiterate for the reception and dissemination of His truth. E. W.

Eatontown, N. J.

RESPONSIVE REMARKS.—We ask pardon of our brother, E. W., for having noticed what seems to have been an oversight; but perhaps we all need spurring up to carefulness in our statements, concerning the scriptures.

We scarcely understand what is meant by the charge of assumption in the above. It is clear that our brother attempted an explanation of Rev. xv. 4, which headed his article. And his entire argument hinged on the omission of the word "nations" from the text. As we showed that the word can not be justly omitted, it follows that his argument was a failure. Where then is the assumption? We expressly said that we did not wish to meddle with our brother's view of the Apocalypse; hence the "collateral argument" we did not notice. It had nothing to do with our purpose, which was simply to defend the received reading of the text, and to explode the exposition of E. W. He applied the text to "the saints," whereas the word says "the nations." We concluded thus: "With the retention of the word in question, our brother's argument [we referred to his argument on the text] falls to the ground, and as we have vindicated the integrity of the text as it stands, another exposition it necessary." Did we "assume" any thing?

To our brother's concluding paragraph we say Amen. J. T. C.

Has the Promise been Fulfilled?

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

In the Herald, Vol. ii. No. 9, occurs the following:

"That this [Abram's] inheritance rests solely upon promises is evident from the language. The first is contained in Gen. xii. 1—3, which is God's promise to make of him a great nation..... This was fulfilled according to 2 Sam. vii. 23—'And what one nation in the world is like unto thy people, even Israel.'

"The next promise contained the boundary of the land, also describing the magnitude of Abram's seed, comparing it to the dust of the earth.... The boundaries are, from the river of Egypt (Nile) unto the great river Euphrates.... That this promise to Abraham was a conditional one is evident."

We have often noticed how loosely a logical mind can reason when an untenable theory is to be defended. The above extract suggests three points.

1. It is said that the promise made to Abram that he should be a great nation, has been fulfilled; and the language of David is quoted as a proof. The writer furnishes a weapon for his own defeat, in stating the boundaries of the land, which was to be inherited by the said nation. Did Israel in the time of David, or in any other time, occupy the territory bounded by the Nile and the Euphrates? Certainly not. How then has the promise been fulfilled?

2. We are told that the promise to Abraham was a conditional one; which we admit; but this only gives the first statement a still harder blow; for the conditions were not complied with by ancient Israel, and therefore the promise could not have been fulfilled at the time asserted.

3. The words of David in 2 Sam. vii. 23 should be taken with the context. God promised David that his house should be established in the kingship for ever, and that Israel should dwell forever under the said government. David refers to this promise, and evidently treats of the future condition of the nation under the promised seed of David. Any unbiased mind will perceive this at one reading of the chapter. Hence it is unjust to say that the promise to Abraham "was fulfilled according to 2 Sam. vii. 23."

We are surprised that a writer whose main endeavor is to show that the promises do not affect Israel in the flesh, is nevertheless willing to say that the fundamental promise was fulfilled under the law covenant. We call this a surrender of the whole ground, and a great deal more. Blinded as we are by the doctrine of the age to come, we still have sufficient light to maintain the future fulfilment of the promises, and also their dependence on certain conditions. Thus we hold all that is really valuable in the position of the writer criticized, without denying our own position. But he is so fearful of being led in a new direction that he will actually attempt the dubious task of drawing two contrary conclusions from one premise, and in one article.

Immortality Philosophically Considered.

According to the prevalent orthodox view, man is possessed of an immortal soul, which, when the body dies, immediately transports itself to a state of bliss or woe, according to the character of its mundane existence. Leaving the theological argument entirely out of the present view, I hold that the natural immortality of the soul is a philosophical impossibility.

Philosophy recognizes as one of its essential causes a desire or love in man of following up his knowledge into unity. In the phenomena of mind and matter we discover similar convergent causes, a hundred seemingly distinct modes assembling themselves under a single cause, and we are led by analogy to infer—we can't know—that all the modifications of being subsist in one First Cause. To that first, unoriginated cause we of necessity impute eternal immortal life. There are legitimate grounds also, which all allow, for conceding to this being, whom we call God, all moral perfections. Now, it is evident that God, being the first and only eternal being, must have conferred upon all such as subsequently became immortal, immortality from his own nature; not multiplying but only distributing his own substance; for God could neither enlarge nor diminish his own nature, else were he not perfect. Immortal man, then, if such a being exist, is an emanation of Deity incarnate.

Again, it will be conceded by all that God, if he be the perfect being we conceive him to be, must be consistent in all his parts, if such a word be admissible of Deity, must be throughout homogeneus in substance. No emanation of his eternal nature can be of a character diverse from any other; all must be harmonious, else is God a conglomerate, a chaos.

Now, supposing man (or his soul if you choose) to be by nature immortal, he, being an emanation of Deity, without which there could be no Deity, must of necessity be of a character strictly similar to any other emanation of Deity, namely, wholly pure. The inevitable conclusion, therefore, is that every human being possessed of an immortal soul (and orthodoxy says all have such) is, nay, must be, morally perfect. But the experience of every one affords him ample testimony to the contrary. It is the confession of inspiration that "there is none that doeth good, no, not one." What an awful spectacle is thus presented! a God part good and part bad. Such a Deity, being divided against himself, and at perpetual war in the very elements of his nature, could not exist. The mind recoils, puny and agast, from the conception of so godless a God. Verily, the dogma which would create man an immortal being, would, at the same time annihilate God! N. K. R.

From Leonard C. Thorne.

BR. STORRS:—In view of the great pouring out of choice gifts upon those who were favored to meet in confereuce at Providence, as also upon other and similar occasions, I cannot well refrain from expressing to our friends, scattered abroad, how I have felt to praise God for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men. Feelings which I have very often experienced since, by the "Grace of God," I was first led to see those sublime truths that are, in these last days, being unfolded to earnest, honest seekers after truth; they who are willing to cast aside their prejudices and pre-conceived opinions, and with minds untrameled, as nearly as possible, by the traditions of men, and go to the holy record in a spirit of meekness and willingness to sit at Jesus' feet and learn of him.

How the great plans and purposes of God are laid open to the comprehension of such searchers for truth. The more we study into and pray for a correct understanding of those plans and purposes the better we do understand them; and the better we understand them, the more they seem to us to expand and grow big with goodness and love. When we give ourselves up to a contemplation of this wonderful exhibition of loving-kindness and tender mercy, we are led to praise the great God of all, and also to glorify the "Lamb that was slain." He who, not only himself trod the "path of life," though it led through the dark valley of humiliation, sorrow, suffering, and death, but so clearly marked out that pathway that faith, in its strong arms, bears us on through trials and suffering and will finally, if we continue faithful and persevere to the end, land us beyond the reach of all enemies, for they will be destroyed by the blessed Son of God when he comes to take possession of his Kingdom and "reign upon the throne of his father David." Look upon man as he is. Consider what, by revelation, he is shown to be; of the earth, earthy; possessing nothing of an inherent character but that which is natural or animal, reaping every thing of that nature which it can give, and that is only corruption. He can say to corruption, thou art my father, and unto the worm thou art my mother; and then look upon God, in his boundless love, instituting a plan whereby, upon certain conditions, man may become the possessor of a new nature, a new life-principle that will, ere long, by the Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him, be spoken into everlasting life: a life shadowed not by a sorrow: a life, the glory and the happiness whereof must continue to increase as ages roll around. O what a good God we have. What matchless love does he display! If all could behold him in the glory which these truths shed around him, who would not love such a God? Who would not devote a life to his service? Who would not yield willing obedience to the promptings of that Spirit which he sends into our hearts? May we all hold fast unto the end and share at last in the glories that shall be revealed when he who is our life shall appear.

BUNKER HILL, ILL., Jan. 9, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—The enclosed greenback is for two new subscribers. The subject of the non-living of the wicked becomes more and more interesting as I examine it. Husband inclined to that view several years ago; but I was strongly opposed, and he finally, as he expressed it, "laid it on the shelf."

At Wilbraham, last summer, I went to the "Boston tent," to prayer meeting, not knowing that it was a proscribed spot. I loved the brethren and sisters that met there. I had been absent from them five years. I went up the hill, and to the ground with my heart full of happiness and joy at meeting the dear ones again. I never thought of doing wrong; and child-like I went from tent to tent loving all alike. But soon I was made to feel that the 'mark' was set upon me; in common parlance, "I was thrown over the fence," my character assailed, talked to and talked about in the most unchristian and unkind manner. Words, motives, and actions all looked upon in a false light, and a wrong motive put to every thing. I was like one confounded; it seemed it could not be me at all. I suffered untold misery for weeks after my return, forgetting that it read "all things shall work together for good to them that love God." But at last I came to this conclusion—"God helping me I will know what the Bible teaches in regard to the destiny of the wicked." If my name is cast out as evil, I will let it go without a murmur, although it is hard to have it torn from you, when to the best of your ability you have endeavored to adorn the doctrine of Christ; but oftentimes the most bitter medicine effects the best cure.

Had I been treated as I certainly had a right to expect to be, and as I shall ever feel I was not, "with kindly affection," I probably never should have investigated the subject; at least, I dont know when I should, if ever; but I feel thankful to God that "Light has sprung up." There are, to be sure, some passages that seem to teach the resurrection of the wicked; but the mass of evidence is against it; and the more I look at it, the brighter the light grows. It makes the attributes of God glow with a beauty I never saw before; justice, mercy, kindness.

May God bless you, brother, is the daily prayer of your sister searching for truth.

most esteemed as perfect), I would not go to hear one of them preach any quicker than I would go to a Spiritualist circle.

Well, not being able to explain all passages clearly, I have been in a measure silent, trusting that God would make it clear in his own good time. In answer to prayer, the way was opened for my companion to go to Exeter camp-meeting, when the misty clouds were rolled away, and the sun shone clear and bright; the last vestige of doubt was removed from his mind. He returned, bringing the welcome Herald of Life, to proclaim the good news "No torment there we see," and it has gladdened us with its weekly visits, until we claim you as a friend.

God bless the Editor, and all the saints you instruct and comfort. May you have the God-giving Spirit, that when you are reviled, to revile not again, but to be the Herald of our soon coming King.

Your sister in the truth.

From Eld. C. N. Buzzell.

Br. Storrs:—As some of the brethren may want to know what has become of me, since the campmeeting at Exeter, Me., I would like to say a few words to them through the Herald.

I have not seen any one of like faith since I gave the parting hand to the dear ones there. I have been at home most of the time, working through the week, and trying, in my weakness, to preach the word on the Sabbath, as the way opened.

I can say, I rejoice in the truth of no life out of Christ; it looks more and more glorious. Why, the Bible is full of it. I would say to the brethren in regard to my health, it is good, and has been since God manifested his power in answer to prayer; glory to his name, I was healed.

Well, some of the brethren will not come to prayer meeting because I am a believer in no future life to the wicked dead. Some are studying to see if these things are so. One Br. says, he shall not fight it; it looks too much like truth for that, &c.

In November I received a visit from an advent preacher, who I thought was quite favorable to this question. We went to Jackson, N. H., a new field, and commenced a series of meetings; the Spirit of God was there; eight or ten started to serve the Lord; backsliders came in abundantly. They established prayer meetings. We stayed two weeks, holding meetings every night.

The Br. was not willing for me to preach No life out of Christ, fearing it would frighten them; but I obeyed God; preached on the atonement, which was well received. Yet the Br. preached distinctly that unless they turned to the Lord they couldn't get life. On a sister's reminding him of it after meeting, he said he meant eternal life. I wish Br. B. K. D. would come up here, and go to Jackson, teach the wages of sin, &c. He has many private friends in that region who would listen gladly to his teaching. There is a vast field there, where they never heard an advent sermon. O how they blessed God for sending us. There brethren go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in. God bless you all. Pray for me. I mean to strive for the Kingdom.

Since writing, a letter came from Jackson, telling the good news that twenty now met from house to house, holding prayer meetings, wishing to have some preaching, &c. They are not settled in regard to what the bible teaches, but studying to see if these things are so. Your Br. in Christ.

Dear Herald:—It is but a few months since I first made your acquaintance; and I wish you a happy new year. May you continue to be a comforter and instructor, until night shall usher in the glorious dawn of eternity.

I begin to see through the great plan of redemption, and it looks more and more glorious, as I see new rays of light shining forth; thanks to your teachings, the mountains have become mole hills; and the obstacles are being fast cleared away.

One year ago last summer, while on a visit to the eastern part of Me., it was my privilege, in company with a dearly loved Br. and Sr., to attend a conference of "non-resurrectionists," (so called) at Etna, and I never, shall forget the taste of that living water, that seemed springing up into everlasting life. I became deeply interested in their views. I heard them speak of being persecuted for holding those views, but it seemed as idle tales to me, never having experienced any thing of the kind.

But what was my surprise and grief, when I returned, for receiving coldness and rebuke, for simply quoting a few texts from the bible, and also being told that I was in danger, from reading the works of those holding to such infidelity. Why, said a sister (one I had al-

Br. Storrs:—I have been led to rejoice of late, and felt that all of like precious faith would rejoice with me, so I sit down this evening to pen a few lines to you and to them, to say that in the providence of God the little band in this place, who believe in life only through Christ, are really free, and, O, how much that word expresses. New Year's day was a memorable day with us: on that day we held our first meeting in our new place of worship. Br. O. Clapp of Boston, was with us, and never shall I forget the luxury of freedom that I felt on that day.

The exhortations after preaching, I believe were heartfelt, and tears of joy fell from many eyes. Yes, praise God, the truth can now be spoken in Lynn without shackles. The way it came about. The leaven of truth would work in spite of all opposition, till the Romans began to fear for their place and nation; so a council was held, and this great error was voted out; so of course as the error could not come, unless it was brought in by its advocates, (and this truth being a part of themselves) they all withdrew, hired a hall and have peace in our borders, for which we thank God, and mean to take courage. We ask the prayers of all God's children, that he will bless his people in this place, cause his truth to advance, and many be led to the great Life-giver, which is my prayer, for his name sake. Yours expecting life when Jesus comes.

Campton, Iowa, Jan. 1, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—The truth is gaining ground here slowly, as you will see by Br. Hillstream's letter; for he tells me that he has sent the names of three new subscribers. Last week we had a discussion in our District Lyceum on the following question: "Resolved, that there is sufficient in Nature and Revelation to prove the immortality of the soul." The discussion lasted two evenings. Three as disinterested men as could be found were appointed as judges. However, I think their belief was against the negative, but two out of the three decided that the affirmative had failed to sustain its position. The affirmative had two old and experienced debators. I had a Mr. Paxon on my side, who is a Protestant Methodist, but a believer in the Crisis doctrine. The debate was well attended, and I hope good will result from it.

When I commenced my school I found a great deal of prejudice against me on account of my faith in the doctrine of no life out of Christ. When I went into my school, I determined by the grace of God to draw the affec tions of my scholars by the cords of love; and I have succeeded so far, and prejudice is fleeing away. I have endeavored to preach once, and now we are having a prayer and conference meeting once in two weeks; and I think I can say safely that the result so far is those three new subscribers.

My prayer has been continually that God would raise up a company of believers in this place. But I do not want cold and formal believers; so I thought it best to endeavor to seek a closer union with Christ myself, and urge the rest of my brethren and sisters to do the same. Hence in all my endeavors to spread the truth I put genuine piety foremost. Brother and Sister Hillstream have their whole mind to the work. They were once well off in this world's goods, but now are poor; yet they say, they never enjoyed themselves so well in their lives. The subscribers he sent are also Swedes; but they are intelligent; still they need simple and plain pieces for their perusal, and I presume that is the case with many others.

I love the dear Herald of Life more every day. The pieces are so pure, ennobling and free from fanaticism which is the bane of Adventism. You have my mind exactly on the slavery question and our relation to the government under which we have enjoyed so many privileges.

Now about publishing what I write. I have never sent but one piece to the Herald for publication. The letters I have written I consider your property, to publish, select, and cull, or not. I had no personal interest in the matter. I am thankful that I have the virtue of not being easily offended.

I feel a great responsibility rests on me at the present time. I have got the good will of the children and parents where I am teaching, and now it rests upon me to retain that good will and make it tell for the cause of truth. O I hope you will pray for me, that I faint not in well doing.

I fear there will be another "time movement" among the Adventists here in the west; but I think those who believe in no life out of Christ will be saved from it; for the Herald of Life will put them on their guard. Once in a while I hear of a Nicodemus who embraces the truth but says little or nothing about it. Some three years ago I lent one of your Six Sermons to a Presiding Elder of the United Brethren church. When he had kept the book about one year he wrote to me that he wished to purchase the book, and I sold it to him; but I never learned how he liked it until lately, when I was told by my brother-in-law, a member of his church, that the Elder said he would not part with the book for any consideration.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

Br. Storrs:—I am almost prostrated with a cold. The truth is, there are more calls for preaching than I can attend to. I have been preaching on an average five evenings out of six and two or three times on the first day of the week, and do not have to do it to empty houses; on the contrary, in many cases, the houses will not hold the people. Last Sunday (the 8th) the school house would not hold near all that came to hear what the "old babbler" would say; and the Methodists proposed we should go into their Meeting-house in the evening, and it was filled to overflowing, from three to four hundred. The truth is, the entire community is moved: they come from five to six miles to hear the strange doctrine, and the more they hear the more they wish to hear. Now we inquire once more—Who will come and help? The people here are liberal, and it is a fine country. Much good might be done. Say, Who will come? But if it proves to be my lot still to labor alone, I think I am entitled to tracts free, if any one is, seeing I do not want a horse to ride. My Post Office is Otto, Fulton Co., Ill.

[We certainly think Br. Lewis is entitled to Tracts for gratuitous circulation, and we trust he will yet be more fully supplied than he has been; but we may as well say now, that our Tract and Army fund is too short, at present, to do much. Will our friends see what can be done to increase the circulation, in this direction, of Tracts and Papers? The Preacher who needs a horse is one farther west, in Iowa, beyond the reach of railroads. Only $15 have yet been received for that object. If any others design to help either object, let it be done speedily, for the winter is passing away, and this is the time to work.—Editor.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 19th, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—We were glad to see the "word from Scotland" in No. 13 of the Herald; glad to know there is a Br. James Grant in dear "Auld Scotia" who loves the precious truth of Christ our only Life-giver, and also glad that Br. James Boyd sends our precious Life heralding paper to "far awa" Scotland. We have long been away from Auld Scotia's hills and glens and dashing streams. Still we love the memory of them, and often think what a luxury it would be once more to visit its dear old shores. But this pleasure is denied us, yet we are made glad to see cheering words from it.

Br. G. is thankful for the paper, but says his D—— friends look upon its teachings as wild delusions, and pity him and all others who are so blind as to embrace such damnable heresies. We were once in the same condition; but can now say, whereas we were once blind, now we see. Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift. He has made known to us the paths of life, praise his holy name. We know we are pitied by our former friends, and given over by some of them as lost; but also know we have the approbation of our Father in heaven, because we are sure we have the truth. Then knowing we have the light of life let us hold it forth, impart its cheering rays to others, in a Christ-like spirit. We can afford it; for we were once in darkness, all of us; and if more light now shines upon our path, it is because we have studied the scriptures of truth for ourselves, and have not been led along by another's say so. We pity those who cant see into the root of the matter, that as we get this animal life from the first Adam, so we can get a spiritual, or resurrection life only from the second Adam, the Lord Jesus Christ.

How blessed to fully understand what Jesus meant when he said, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead yet shall he live. Also, I am the bread of life: and, it is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you are spirit, and are life.

Br. Grant says, his mind was pretty thoroughly settled several years ago, on these points, by reading the scriptures for himself. This is the only way to get grounded and settled, viz., to search the word of truth for ourselves, with a mind free from prejudice. But don't we need a teacher? Yes! Do we have a reliable one? Yea. Read 1 John ii. 27. But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: (Praise the Lord for this) but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as he hath taught you, ye shall abide in him.

Br. Grant desires an argument on Life only in Christ. We would say to him that we sent three books to John Robertson, Minister of the gospel, St. Ninians, Stirlingshire, Scotland, last fall. One of them was Br. Storrs' "Life only in Christ." If Br. G. can borrow these from J. R. he will have the argument fully.

Our prayer is, that the truth of the gospel may spread: that man may be led to understand that unless he eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood he has no life in him: that the resurrection from the dead is a promise, and entirely conditional: and unless man fulfil his part of the condition, God never will his.

Let us add to our faith, courage, knowledge, temperance, patience, godlikeness, brotherly kindness, and charity. So that we may have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Jacob V. Collamore, after a long silence, at last has sent us a few lines, with three new subscribers, and writes:—I am well and at home (West Greenville, Pa.). The last I wrote you was from Culpepper, Va. I have served three years and forty-one days in the army, and my time is out as a soldier. I have written but little for the past year, but I have done considerable talking. There are several believers in life only in Christ in this place; but few of them come out boldly for the truth. Some of them are joined to Church-creeds; so it is difficult for them to say anything for fear of being turned out of church. They would like to take the Herald; but then the brethren in the church would not like it, and so they sail under false colors. I think people are not as prejudiced as they were, in this part of the country. One believer in life only in Christ has lent one of your books—"Life only in Christ"—to a Minister of the Gospel. After he has read it carefully, he is to preach a few sermons for our benefit. As I am now living at home, I hope I shall be able to do more for you by another year.

[We are glad to hear from Br. Collamore, and hope he may be as useful and efficient out of the army as while in it. As to those friends of the truth of Life only in Christ, who suffer themselves to be bound by human creeds, and exhaust their means in sustaining the "Church-creeds," which, in heart, they do not believe, we pity them; and hope they will yet see there is "a more excellent way." We have not, and ought not to have funds to squander in sustaining the promulgation of doctrines we do not believe. Let us be consistent, and sustain what we believe with all our available means. If the price of remaining in any Church is the sacrifice of our honest convictions of truth, so that we must not utter them, better be out of such churches, as we value truth and the approbation of God more than that of men. Light may turn to darkness by remaining.—Editor.

Obituary.

Kingston, N. Y. Jan 23, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—Again we are obliged to record the death of one more of our little number—Sister Margaret Van Wagenen, wife of William Van Wagenen. She formerly lived in New Salem, but for some time has resided in Kingston. Although but two or three miles from our place of meeting, her health was so poor that she has not worshiped with us but a few times since she moved to Kingston. We severely felt the loss of her firm testimony in our little gatherings. She loved the truth, and was not ashamed to speak out boldly on the Life theme, nor did she lack the capacity to declare her sentiments. She now sleeps in Jesus and her sufferings are all over. She expired on the 18th inst., aged 45 years. She leaves a husband and two children to mourn her loss. The Lord grant to sanctify this affliction to their everlasting good, that they may meet her on the resurrection morning.

The funeral was attended by a large number of acquaintances and friends, and we spoke from Isa. xxvi., those beautiful verses that give the contrast between the righteous and the wicked.

Alex. J. Forbes.

We were much affected at this—to us—unexpected death. Our sister was indeed a firm believer in, and a most determined advocate of the truth as it is in Jesus. Her convictions were as clear as her faith was strong. We mourn for her, but not as those who have no hope. We praise God for the sweet communion we have often enjoyed while talking with her of Christ and his relation to them that are spiritual, and we look forward with confidence and hallowed anticipation to the "moment" when hades will relax its grasp, and our dear sister Margaret will greet us with the radiant smile of immortal glory. "Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory!" May God raise up on every side women who will follow the departed as she followed Christ.

War News.

The last port of the rebels is closed. Fort Fisher, which guarded the approach to Wilmington, has been taken by the combined military and naval effort of Admiral Porter and General Terry. Blockade running is ended for the present, and it does not seem possible for the Confederate power to continue much longer. Every blow yet to be struck by our government will, without exaggeration, "fall on crushed rebellion." What Davis and his coadjutors will do in the way of diplomacy we wait to see. J. T. C.

The Capture of Fort Fisher.

This Fort has been a safegaurd to blockade runners, by which rebel pirates have come and gone, and a vast amount of cotton has been carried out, and almost inexhaustable stores of war material have gone to the rebels by Wilmington, N. C.; but this stronghold has been taken by the Unionist forces in a Naval and Land attack under Commodore Porter and Gen. Terry. One of our New York brethren, who is an old Pilot and who has been long in the naval service of the United States, gives some account of the capture of the Fort in a letter to his brother-in-law in this city, which we are permitted to publish. It is as follows:

U. S. Steam Frigate Colorado, off Fortress Monroe, Va., Jan. 20, 1865.

"Brother Geehr:—Since I received your kind letter, such horrible scenes of bloodshed as I saw on the 16th day of this month, are what I hope and pray that I may never see again. Huge shot hissing over my head, before me and behind me, besides fragments of iron shell whistling over my head and under my feet, men, here and there, falling dead and wounded, and knowing not what moment my turn might be; but I put my trust and reliance in the Lord, and escaped unhurt; one thing however is very singular, Officers of other ships and this one remarked, repeatedly, that the rebels in Fort Fisher recognized me; and that they saw seven 168 pound solid shot pass over my head. This was while on the Colorado's bridge with my head and body high above the rail. The Commanding Officer suggested to me to change my position; did so, back aft to the taf-rail; but fragments of shell and shot came over my head there too. The first Lieutenant suggested for me to go up in the ship's fore-top. I did so; taking a spyglass with me. A fragment of a shell and a 168 pound solid shot came whizzing over my head there also.

"These things occurred on four different days, in four different actions; or what shore people call battles. The fore-top affair was the last battle on the 15th; it was observed that this shell and shot at our ship's fore-top was the last shell and shot fired at our ship; and indeed the whole fleet.

"The Fort was taken, without surrendering, by storm and force. Man after boy, boy after man came forward saying, contrary to their Officers' orders, 'I surrender,' 'I surrender'—'I too,' in haste one after another; until they all were taken, and made prisoners; not one of them had a chance of escape, the fire of (our) ships kept them back from escaping, while (our) soldiers stormed them at the point of the bayonet. I saw one of our poor sailors on his hands and knees trying to get up, but could not for his wounds, (this was about 10 minutes after the commencement of the assault,) two of his shipmates tried to help him, by carrying him away, when all three were shot dead by the Rebs. I was Pilot of the biggest ship in the fleet; and they gave me the credit of taking her the nearest in, say fifteen hundred yards from the fort. I think for myself the work is accomplished; the people of the United States can begin to cry 'Peace and safety.'

"They have sewed up several dead men; and strange to say, amputated legs and arms have been sewed up and buried with the same circumspecttion as dead men."

"That Horse" and its Rider.

We have solicited, unasked by him who needs the horse, for funds to enable a Preacher to travel where railroads are not, and stage fare is high. That preacher is Thos. W. Smith, of Alden, Hardin Co., Iowa. Some $17 is all we have yet received. We have just had a communication from Br. J. W. Maffit, Webster City, Iowa. He speaks as follows:

"Br. Smith left here this morning (Jan. 16) for his home. He preached eleven discourses while here. The audiences were not large, but gave the best attention to what was spoken. Br. Smith's qualifications as a preacher are good; not only that, but he tries to live it. I think there is no one better calculated for this country: his whole heart is in the work, and he is able to defend it. He ought to have a horse—a conveyance of his own. The settlements are a great ways apart and no railroads. Stage fare is very high. It is 30 miles from here to Alden, his home, and the Stage fare is $2,50 or $3. That would buy grain for a horse four weeks. I will pay ten dollars towards the horse."

We hope those who are able will help Br. Smith to this necessary aid to travel: he must have it. Forward the amount you are disposed to give direct to him, "Alden, Hardin Co., Iowa:" or, if you prefer it, send to us and we will see that he has it. The following has been received by us.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with nt egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousands more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

LINES TO MY SISTER.

BY MRS. MARIA MATTHEWS WEAVER.

Sister, Jesus hears thy groans,
Listens to thy midnight moans,
Marks the bitter tears you shed,
Languishing upon thy bed.

Jesus sends his Spirit forth,
Comforting his saints on earth;
And the Spirit brings to view
Glorious things reserved for you.

Far beyond the bounds of time
Faith discerns a healthful clime
Where the weary pilgrims go
To escape this world of woe.

There the eye no more shall weep,
Nor our friends in death e'er sleep,
There shall be no care nor pain,
For the Lord of Life shall reign.

They shall come from sea and shore,
Parted friends to part no more,
Songs of triumph they shall sing
In the presence of their King.

Over there, my sister dear,
You shall with the saved appear;
No more suffer hours of pain,
Never shed a tear again.

Courage! sister, we'll be there,
And a crown of glory wear:
See! the city is in view,
There is lasting rest for you,
Bid each lingering tear adieu.

FRENCH INFIDELITY: WHAT IS IT?

In the World's Crisis, Oct 11th, 1864, E. Burnham speaks to "those holding the non-wicked resurrection question" in these words:

"Friends, who teach this, I tell you, in all kindness, this warfare you are engaged in is a most unequal one. You will fail. God will triumph. This will die with all other monstrosities and abortions. You are making a most bold advance in the wake of exploded French infidelity. I have, with others, waited and waited long for an argument on this question. I have seen none. That which is called such, to me does not even deserve the name of a distant inference." He asks, "If it is the plain truth of God, why did not some, at some time in the past have or give a most distant hint of it."

We are led to ask, If he is one of those of whom it is said: "Which have eyes, and see not?" Infidels have seen it, and believed it; and by it, with its kindred truths, have been converted. We once heard the Elder, when he was speaking of the New Jerusalem, which came down from God out of heaven say, that some believed it to be a metaphorical city, but he believed it to be a literal city. He was a literalist; he believed it, as it read. So he believes, John v. 28, 29. So in his literalism, we propose to follow him and others in their proof texts, that the wicked dead will have a resurrection to life.

He has given only one proof: "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." Thus we are to understand, that all the wicked dead, that will have died from off the earth, while in the state of dust, shall literally hear his voice, and while in that state, come forth to a resurrection. The good come forth, literally dead, to life. And the evil, literally dead in dust, will hear and come forth to damnation. If we say they shall come forth to life, as the good shall do, we shall add words, and alter the teaching of Christ, which is not right or safe to do; and also, make him to contradict himself elsewhere; and so contradict the teaching of the Father, as we shall see.

Now, every man, unless we except the Elder, knows that a dead man cannot literally hear; which proves that Christ spoke metaphorically; as he gave a great part of his instructions in parables. The Elder thinks he has proved by this text that the wicked dead will have a resurrection to life. If he has, he has proved too much, for by it he has utterly destroyed his own choice theory by having a second death in the lake of fire, burning with brimstone; for they tell us, this is the first resurrection; and that the second will be a thousand years after this, as is found in Rev. xx., where it is written: "Blessed and holy is he that hath a part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Thus we see, by this literalism, that the wicked dead, while in their dust, by some means become holy; for they will have a part in this first resurrection; and the second death in the lake of fire and brimstone will have no power over them. Thus all the wicked dead will have a resurrection to life. By this we are made to see that "Universalism" is proved, they being witnesses. By this literalism, Christ is also made to prove the truth of Universalism. Luke xx. 35, 36: "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: Neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Now by puting this, and John v. 28, 29, together, and that resurrection is as literal as this is, then all the dead, both those who had done good, and those that had done evil, will have a resurrection to life; and will die no more; are equal to the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Thus Universalism is again proved, and there will be no wicked ones to raise at any other resurrection, to be cast into the lake of fire, to be tormented and die again.

We now turn to the next text given us to prove the resurrection of the wicked dead, 1 Cor. xv. 22, "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." This last sentence, even so in Christ shall all be made alive, we are told includes both the righteous and the wicked, and so it proves a resurrection of all the wicked dead. St. Paul tells us how they will be raised. That they will be raised in incorruption, and in glory, and in power, and with a spiritual body. "And the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Here again Universalism is proved by the literalists; and they have none left to cast into the lake of torment alive: no, nor even dead ones, that John saw. John must have made a mistake; or the Elders have.

We now return to the first resurrection in John v. This must be the first to precede the second, a thousand years, as in Rev. xx. The Elder tells us repeatedly, that "All that are in the graves—both the just and the unjust:" come forth alike, to life. Surely then, the wicked must die again, to be raised in the second resurrection for Satan to deceive. The Elder exclaims, "How wise we are in this age!" Will he in his wisdom tell us something about how the wicked ones raised in the first resurrection, came to their death in the intervening space between the first and the second resurrections? It seems that they must have all got silently engulphed together, for nothing is heard from them after their first resurrection, until they are raised at the second. So we must leave this in the dark, as we are passing in a dark, and crooked way, to find a literal lake of fire, burning with brimstone, in which to punish the wicked dead after they are raised to life.

The proof of a second resurrection is in Rev. xx. As we have passed the first, and the interval, we will commence at the 7th verse. "And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom are as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them." This great multitude, the number of whom are as the sand of the sea, we are told, are all the wicked dead raised. Now here is more than "hints" thrown out, and we are not so dull that we can not see in it more than "the name of a distant inference," as it is explained to us. We infer then, first, that there is no power but the power of God or Christ, that could bind the old serpent, the devil, which deceived mother Eve, and caused all the evil that has or will come upon the world; and so it will require the same power to loose him to go out to deceive all the nations of the wicked dead raised in the breadth of the earth; and so set him to work again to do more mischief. I also infer, that as none but Christ can raise the dead, he must raise them for this purpose. And as they are mortal, they will quickly die again, unless they are fed; and such a number which are as the sand of the sea, must be fed by a miracle—and none but Christ can so feed them—for Satan to finish up his work; for it will take a long time. And again, I infer, as they will not be changed, and have a glorified body given them as the saints will have, therefore, they must be raised with the same bodies that were carried to the graves: all the halt, lame, and blind: some with one leg, and some without any: so we think "the old devil" will have a hard job of it; after he had deceived them, and had prepared them to battle; to get them all up to compass the camp of the saints and the beloved city. Indeed, we do not see how he can, for there will be a great many such, unless he will have help from the higher powers; for there they must go to be devoured by literal fire from God out of heaven. So we see the Sodomites have two such burnings, when others have but one; why is this? We will not stop to make any more inferences here, which we might do, only to say, that if this be so, it will be one of the most astonishing events that ever did or will take place among mortals.

We now pass to the fourth and last literal resurrection of the wicked dead to life, as it is contended so to be; but we think it is only symbolic. Rev. xx. 12—15. "And I saw the dead, small and great stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it: and death and hell delivered up the dead that were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."

We ask, is it possible, if this is a literal resurrection of all the dead, that he who is "the resurrection and the life" should not be seen in the vision? Here is no resurrection to life. It was all the dead that John saw standing, both small and great; even infants which never stood alone alive. It is only such a resurrection as the sea and death and hell could give. They gave up the dead; can death impart life, or give the dead up to life? Thus death is made equal to Christ the LIFE-GIVER. "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." This is not spoken of men. Only of death and hell. The meaning then is, we think, symbolical death of literal death, and so of hell. "Death of death, and hell's destruction," said one poet; and "death itself shall die," said another. Can death and hell be cast in alive? "And there shall be no more death." Rev. xxi. 4. But our literal teachers will have it, that this is all literal. And all the wicked that John saw were cast into the lake of fire alive, and will be punished according to their works. Thus, if this be truth, then their torment in the lake of fire will be eternal. For Christ by his servant John says, "And there shall be no more death," after they are cast into the lake. So it is plain to be seen, that the wicked will obtain immortal life in torment in the lake, if they fail to obtain immortal life in Christ.

But I would ask the attention of every seeker after truth to this one point: that John did not say of them who were not written in the book of life, "This is the second death;" because it would be their third death. They were cast in dead, as John saw them; and they could die no more. Therefore the wicked dead have no resurrection to life. This is the very last account we have of the wicked, that they were cast into the symbolic lake of fire, burning with brimstone, dead. Who will dare to charge the Lord Jesus Christ, with bearing false testimony by his servant John, except those who teach that they were cast in alive?

I shall now bring to notice some portions of scripture which will positively and literally prove that the wicked dead will have no resurrection to life. But I shall have to be brief. In John iii. 36, it reads, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." They shall not see everlasting life, some tell us. But they have no right to pervert the text with this addition, to prove a future life in torment. The simple teaching is this, they shall not see future life, neither a short nor long one. 1 Thes. i. 7—9. Here Paul was speaking of some, "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." Here again is positive proof, that Christ will not raise those dead ones up by his power, and into his presence. So David, the prophet of God, after he had been speaking of some said, Psalm xlix. 19, 20,—"They shall never see light." Put this and that together, "They shall not see life," and can you have proof more positive that those wicked ones will not have a resurrection from the dead to see either life or light? "Man that is in honor and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish." Now when the beasts will have a resurrection from the dead to see both life and light, and shall be cast alive into a lake of torment, then will the wicked dead be raised in like manner, and be cast alive into a lake of torment; and not till then. They shall perish like beasts which have no resurrection.

Psalm xxxvii. 20, "But the wicked shall perish: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away." Now when smoke, which has been consumed, will have been made to return into smoke to consume away again, then will the wicked dead be raised to life to perish again; and again "into smoke shall they consume away;" and not till then. But it would not give them any place in the lake of torment, if it were possible.

The LORD our God is our next witness that the wicked dead will have no resurrection to life; spoken to us by his prophet Isaiah, when he says, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi. 14. The last proof we now offer is in Jer. li. 39. When the prophet was speaking of the "mighty men" of Babylon, he says, "In their heat I will make their feasts, and I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice, and sleep a perpetual sleep, and shall not wake, saith the LORD." Here we have positive proof that the resurrection in John v. 28, 29, was not literal; that those that had done evil will not literally hear the voice of the Son of God and come forth to life. For thus saith the LORD, they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and shall not wake. And the Son of God did not say, they that have done evil shall come forth to life; but "unto the resurrection of condemnation."

The Elder says, "It challenges the most simple, positive, and direct testimony of God." Does he want God to come down out of heaven, and tell him from his own mouth, that the wicked dead will not be raised to life? He has spoken to us "by his holy prophets," in "the most simple, positive, and direct testimony," that the wicked dead "shall not see life—that they shall not see light—that they shall perish, and consume; into smoke shall they consume away," which will not return into smoke again—"that they shall not live, shall not rise, that God has visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish—that they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and shall not wake saith the Lord." And yet the Elder says, "I have with others, waited and waited long for an argument on this question. I have seen none. That which is called such, to me does not even deserve the name of a distant inference." And he asks, "Why did not some one, at some time in the past, have or give a most distant hint of it?" He says also, "I can not see in it good sense, good philosophy, or one grain of scriptural truthfulness." He places it among the most foolish questions. He tells us also, "that this will die with all other monstrosities and abortions." Thus the Elder stands convicted, with others of whom he speaks, by his own testimony, and with thus "saith the Lord," that they have eyes but can not see, and that himself, with others, "are blind guides."

We now ask the Elder and others in whose behalf he speaks, with this testimony of God before them, how long they will continue to preach from place to place, at the expense of their deluded hearers, three distinct resurrections to life of the wicked dead? And thereby the poor Sodomites will have three destructions by fire, and the last one burning alive in a lake of fire.

This system of doctrine charges our God ("whose tender mercies are over all his works," and also our Saviour who wept over sinners in Jerusalem, and prayed for his enemies, on the cross; and who is the same yesterday and to-day and forever; and who taught his disciples to love their enemies, and to do good to them that hate them, that they might be the children of their Father in heaven, for he maketh the sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust; and who said, "be ye therefore perfect even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect,) with indulging the most malignant and vindictive hatred toward those that hated them, and had done evil; and also with waiting for the time to arrive when they will raise them up from their long sleep in dust, and judge them; who all alike, those thousands who had not sinned more than one day, together with those who had sinned several hundred years, will be cast into the literal lake of fire, burning with brimstone, to be punished according to their works.

Now every man in his senses knows that no living thing can endure this burning element for a moment. But they must be punished in the lake "according to their sins." Therefore, this theory charges the God of the Bible with keeping them alive in this tormenting element, with all their former sensitiveness, by his power, until his anger is pacified, and his wrath will cease. But as I have shown before, as there will be no more death after what John saw cast into the lake; and as they will keep on sinning with a hundred fold more hatred to God, than they had when they were cast into their torment, therefore his anger will not cease to burn, and their torment will be eternal.

To say, as some do, that the punishment is of the conscience is a most senseless shift, without helping the case. For some have but little conscience, and some have none; so the most wicked would have no punishment, unless God would give them one such as would torment them equal to the symbolic torment by which it is set forth. Will the beast and the false prophet have a conscience, or any torment when they will be cast in alive? Will death and hell have any? And all this vindictive vengeance will fall on the untold millions of the wicked raised for this purpose; when they could no more help their existence than they could prevent the sun shining, and without moral power to resist temptation and bad example; and yet, life was exceedingly desirable to them, and one of God's choicest blessings.

We ask now, which system of doctrine comes nearest in the wake of "French infidelity?" The French infidels grew up in the very midst of the "Mother of abominations," from whence the hell torment doctrine sprang. It was her abominations that led to the calling of Jesus Christ "a wretch." We ask again which system of doctrine comes nearest in the wake of French infidelity? Let a child only two years old answer—"The first I ever heard of God, was by my mother telling me, when two years old, that there was a God, and if I was bad he would burn me forever in such a fire as I saw on the hearth. My reply was, 'If God does so he is a bad man.' I grew up an infidel, and remained so until converted under those who preached destruction." "A pious minister lately told me this fact in his experience:" So says Elder Blain.

The world is sliding fast into infidelity, and into modern Spiritualism; and the hell-fire and brimstone torment doctrine, which gives such a character to God our Maker, drives them with greater speed. The Elder says, "Friends, who teach this, I tell you in all kindness, this warfare you are engaged in is a most unequal one. You will fail. God will triumph." We tell our friend, we will not exchange sides. That we shall not fail. That we have God on our side. "God will triumph." We have his word for it. For thus "Saith the LORD, They shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and shall not wake. They are dead, they shall not live; they shall not rise; they shall not see light;" no; "they shall not see life." Who will say except E. Burnham, that "This will die like all other monstrosities and abortions?" Will God fail? then we shall fail. Will God triumph? then we shall triumph; and He shall have the glory. We will stand up fearlessly in this warfare; and blackguardism, nor ridicule, nor high-sounding words will move us. We have been charged with "hobbying," and with riding a hobby; and we have been compared with silly beasts, to make us appear ridiculous, with language that would disgrace a politician of the lowest grade.* And we have been so published in the World's Crisis, for the benefit of its readers, where we can not be permitted to speak in self-defence, or what we believe to be the truth of God. Their readers must not be permitted to read it, lest they be converted. Romanism is not better guarded than their doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked dead, and their literal lake of fire torments are. Our teaching Elders are nor permitted to speak in their synagouges a word against such a doctrine. They are turned out of them; answering the prediction of our Saviour, "They shall put you out of the synagouges." We can not speak of what we have shown to be the truth of God in them, without being charged with riding a "hobby;" which no decent writer will use as his own choice word, in a religious discussion. If a line of separation must be drawn, we are glad they have drawn it. We shall now see who is on the Lord's side, and who is on the side of the "Mother of Abominations."

THANKSGIVING.

A few years since, while in the eastern part of Conn., I visited at the house of a relative, and there for the first time saw his son, an only child, at that time about sixteen years of age. He is deaf, dumb, and blind, and was so from his birth. I think you will say, "What a dreadful condition for one to be in;" and so it is. He has a kind father and mother who love him dearly, and all the more because of his affliction; yet he has never once looked upon their faces, or heard their voices. There are but very few persons in the country who are similarly afflicted, and some of them were not born thus.

Some of you may have heard of Julia Brace, who for many years has resided at the Asylum for the deaf and dumb, at Hartford, Ct., and of whom much has been written. She is now an old lady, and an interesting character; but the loss of her faculties was caused by a severe fit of sickness in her childhood.

I presume the case of our young friend is not generally known outside the circle of his friends and relatives, or the place where he resides, and an account or description of him may not be uninteresting. At the time I saw him he was large of his age; well formed; with a heavy beard, and had always been healthy. He seemed to have a pleasant disposition, and evinced considerable knowledge, and could his faculties only be cultivated and developed, I think he would be very bright and intelligent.

I said he was healthy, and yet the only food he has ever taken is simply milk, without any other kind of nourishment. If there happened to be a particle of sugar or crumb of bread get in it, he would at once spit it out of his mouth. The only way of conveying instruction of any kind to him is by the hand, and he very readily knows the touch of a stranger, and is fond of examining the dress and hair of persons; and particularly likes to know what they wear on their feet. He moves very easily and quickly about his rooms, and at once detects any change or disarrangement of the furniture. He amuses himself considerably by swinging, and seems to enjoy it very much, often laughing heartily; and as the day and night are both alike to him, he frequently gets up in the night and swings, unless it be after he has taken a bath when he rests quietly.

He many times in a day will throw up one of the windows in his room and put out his hand and is greatly pleased if he finds it storming. He is also pleased when washing day comes, and he knows when it comes, and will often tease his mother, in his way, and will not be satisfied until she puts the wash-boiler on the stove. It is a wonder to many how he thus judges of the time, and I can not tell, unless it be that his father is at home with him one day in the week and the next day his mother washes, thus associating the two events in his mind. He likes to be tidy, and is much troubled if he chances to find a rip or rent in his clothes.

Of course, he requires much care, and well it is for him that he has kind friends and is not left to the charity of strangers: that would be sad indeed. There are schools in the country where the deaf and dumb are taught to read and write, and talk with their fingers, and there are schools for the blind where they are learned to read by means of raised letters which they feel with the hand; but how can the mind of such an one as this young man be reached?

I wish you to really consider his case. Just sit down and close your eyes and imagine yourself unable to open them, or ever again look upon the faces of your friends, or see the joyous sunshine, the beautiful sky, or the bright flowers, or any pleasant scene, never be able to read or study, look at pictures which children all love so well, or any of the many things with which you are accustomed to amuse yourself; and then think, if you can, that you could never hear the pleasant tones of loved voices, sweet singing, or the music of birds and bees and murmuring brooks, or sighing winds, nor the voice of prayer, but feel that all was darkness and silence forever; and in addition never be able to convey your ideas or wishes by speech to any one; then tell me if the gift of sight, hearing, and speech, are not great blessings?

And do you ever think to thank the Lord for them; He who is the giver of every good gift? Can you ever again say that you have nothing to be thankful for, even though you are poor and do not live in a nice house, or wear fine clothes, or have many friends?

The wise man says, "Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun." Did you ever think of it? I trust you will many times after this. I wonder how many of you guessed what the great blessings were, of which I promised to remind you, in my last article? AUNT LOUISA.

VERY PROUD TO-NIGHT.

It was a cold night in winter. The wind blew and the snow was whirled furiously about, seeking to hide itself beneath cloaks and hoods, and in the very hair of those that were out. A distinguished lecturer was to speak, and notwithstanding the storm the villagers ventured forth to hear him. William Annesley, buttoned up to the chin in his thick overcoat, accompanied his mother. It was difficult to walk through the new-fallen snow, against the piercing wind, and William said to his mother:

"Couldn't you walk more easily if you took my arm?"

"Perhaps I could," his mother replied, as she put her arm through his, and drew up as close as possible to him. Together they breasted the storm, the mother, and the boy who had once been carried in her arms, but who had grown up so tall that she could now lean on his. They had not walked far before he said to her:

"I am very proud to-night."

"Proud that you can take care of me?" she said to him with a heart gushing with tenderness.

"This is the first time you have leaned upon me," said the happy boy.

There will be few hours in that child's life of more exalted pleasure than he enjoyed that evening, even if he should live to old age, and should, in his manhood, lovingly provide for her who watched over him in his helpless infancy. It was a noble pride that made his mother love him, if possible, more than ever, and made her pray for him with new earnestness, thankful for his devoted love and hopeful for his future. There is no more beautiful sight than affectionate, devoted, obedient, children. I am sure that He who commanded children to honor their father and mother, must look upon such with pleasure. May he bless dear William, and every other boy whose heart is filled with ambition to be a blessing and "a staff" to his mother.

THE LITTLE ONES OUR TEACHERS.

Little children, who are often taught of the Divine Spirit when we think not of it, may in turn teach us, if we will but heed their voice.

One twilight hour I was asking my little Charlie of his thoughts and feelings about Jesus. He told me, in his confiding, truthful way, many precious things, which made me rejoice; and "his mother kept all these sayings in her heart." At last he paused, and I saw a shadow on his brow, which led me to ask, "What is it that troubles you, my son?" He replied, "I have meant to tell you the truth, mamma, but I'm afraid I haven't; and if I haven't, God knows it. When I tell you how I feel another time, I will put in 'guess' or 'I think so,' because you know, mamma, I can't see through myself as God can!"

I bowed my head in gratitude for the child, in humiliation for myself; and these were my heart's desires: May as tender a regard for perfect truthfulness ever control my every word of tongue and pen. May as judicious a distrust of my own best efforts at self-knowledge ever abide with me. May as practical a realization of God's omniscience ever follow me.—Congregationalist.

DISCONTENT.

Herodotus tells us of a people in Africa, who live in the neighborhood of Mount Atlas, whose daily custom was to curse the sun, when he rose high in the heavens, because his excessive heat scorched and tormented them. We have always thought this a fine illustration of discontent, which overlooks blessings, and dwells upon evils. Did they forget that to the sun they cursed, they were indebted for light, for food, for the fertility of the country, for ten thousand blessings, without which their continued existence had been impossible? Did they think what their condition would have been had the sun they cursed left the ungrateful complainers for a month in darkness? His absence for but half that time would have made them pray for his return as their benefactor, as heartily even as they cursed him for their tormentor. —[Family Treasury.

A SENSIBLE MADMAN.—In the discussion upon lunacy and criminal responsibility in the Social Science Congress, Lord Brougham related an anecdote to show that it was a mistake to suppose that insane persons were not amenable to deterrent motives. Horne Tooke was sitting in a room by himself one day, when in rushed a lunatic, flourishing a large-bladed knife in his hand. The lunatic said: "You are Mr. Horne Tooke, are you not?" "Yes," was the reply. "Then," said the lunatic, "I will soon put an end to you." Horne Tooke answered: "If you do, you will suffer for it." "Oh!" said the madman, "I came out of Dr. Shipton's asylum t'other day, and they can't punish me." Horne Tooke rejoined, with great tact: "Then, I suppose, you don't know that a law was passed only t'other day saying that all lunatics should be hanged?" "No, I didn't know that," responded the madman, almost instantly throwing down the knife in a tremor, and slinking out of the room.

OUR PASSOVER—THE LORD'S SUPPER

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

The lengthening days will soon bring us to the anniversary of our Lord's death and the celebration of our Lord's Supper in commemoration of the one sufficient sacrifice. Most of our readers have already acquainted themselves with the argument in favor of the yearly feast. It is contained in the first volume of the Herald, Nos. 17 and 24. Something should be said in response to an objection which appeared in Vol. 1, No. 29. It runs thus:

> "I do not myself regard the Lord's Supper as a merely annual feast. 'Tradition,' I think, does not make it more certain that its frequent observance prevailed in the christian church in the period immediately following the days of the Apostles, than the New Testament does that the earliest christian churches observed it oftener than once a year."

If "tradition" and the custom of early churches are to be followed we shall be in a quandary indeed; for there was no pretence of a general agreement on the subject as far back as Justin, martyred A. D. 166. Says Neander: "The celebration of the Lord's supper, as appears from Justin Martyr, was held to constitute an essential part of divine worship on every Sunday.... In some churches, however, as for example that of North Africa, the daily partaking of the communion continued to be held necessary; since it was considered the daily bond of union between the Lord and the church, the daily means of promoting strength, life, and salvation to Christians. Accordingly Tertullian and Cyprian give a spiritual explanation of the petition for our daily bread, as looking for an uninterrupted sanctifying union with the body of Christ through the Lord's Supper.... In other countries, however, perhaps as early as this date, the church acted upon the principle that no one ought to partake of the holy supper without a previous especial preparation of the heart, and therefore only at stated seasons chosen according to each one's necessities. The learned Hippolytus, who lived in the first half of the third century, wrote even at this early date a treatise on the question, 'whether a man ought to communicate daily or only at stated seasons.'" Church History, Vol. 1, pp. 460,1.

From this it appears that a daily eating of the Lord's supper was a very common practice among the early churches and that the North Africans were especially tenacious in relation to it, as they "continued" it after it had been given up by most of the other churches. Tertullian might be expected to continue it, for he was like some in our day, who understand the phrase "breaking bread" in Acts ii. 46, to indicate the Lord's Supper. But more consistent than his modern followers, he hesitated not to accept the consequences of his theory, and therefore held that Acts xxvii. 35 refers to the same thing.

Now if we are to follow "tradition," we must eat the Lord's supper daily, or weekly. The fact is that both the daily and weekly form sprang from a misconception of our Lord's design. It was supposed, and many still believe, that the bread and wine carry a spiritual power of their own when once consecrated. The Romish church believe them to be changed "into the real material body and blood of Christ, though retaining the appearance and all other sensible attributes of bread and wine." Luther differed from this, but made little improvement. He only changed from tran-substantiation to con-substantiation. He denied that the bread and wine were changed the body and blood, but he affirmed that the body and blood were in the bread and wine. Zwingle approached much nearer the true idea, but still held the communication of spiritual effects by the natural process of eating and drinking; and so with the majority of Christians to-day. We believe it to be a false and superstitious notion. There is no spiritual good in the elements, neither did our Saviour teach such a thing. We have no more right to say that the bread and wine affect us than the Jews had to say that the lamb and bitter herbs affected them. The former are no more significant of Christ than the latter. But "tradition" would lead us to believe that our personal communion with God, and our spiritual health and strength, depend on eating the bread and wine. Away with such idolatry! Let no human superstition be a barrier to a free, personal, and continual communion and fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. The real communion is not yearly, nor quarterly, nor monthly, nor weekly, nor daily, it is incessant. It is fettered by no priestly manipulation of bread and wine, it asks no intervention but that of our great High Priest.

Jesus is able to save evermore, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for those who come unto God by him. In his name we come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need.

> "Thou, O Christ, art all I want,
> More than all in thee I find.
> * * * * * * *
> Plenteous grace in thee is found,
> Grace to cover all my sin;
> Let the healing streams abound,
> Make and keep me pure within.
> Thou of life the fountain art,
> Freely let me take of thee;
> Spring thou up within my heart,
> Rise to all eternity."

Besides "tradition," the objector has another plea—the practice of "the earliest Christian churches," as brought to view in "the New Testament." We should be very loath to trust to the earliest churches for our guidance, for their example was in many cases far from being perfect. Men often practiced incorrect things then, as they do now. We suppose that 1 Cor. xi 20–34 would be the main argument used in opposition to the yearly festival. We admit that the reading of the passage carries the impression of a more frequent celebration. But there is not the least evidence that the Apostle Paul warranted it. His object was to reprove the Corinthians for their disorderly procedure when they did come together to eat. Although the church at Corinth was one of "the earliest Christian churches," yet their conduct renders their example questionable, and we think it quite safe to disregard their opinions in this matter. Men who baptized living men for dead ones (1 Cor. xv. 29) might misconceive the true idea of the Lord's Supper; and men who were so carnal as to fill themselves with the food they had brought to the general gathering, leaving the poor to be "hungry," are hardly to be set up as expounders of Christ's memorial.

We do not disregard tradition and custom because they afford no countenance to our view of the subject. There is room for more than a suspicion that some of "the earliest churches" practiced the yearly feast. In the latter part of the second century a controversy arose, the details of which must be related. Among the Western churches a Friday was set apart to the memory of Christ's passion and a Sunday to that of his resurrection. These days still exist as Good Friday and Easter Sunday. But the Christians of Asia Minor took the fourteenth of the Hebrew month Nisan and observed the death of their Lord on the exact day of the moon. Hence instead of coming on the same day of the week every year, their day shifted. This difference of custom caused controversy between the two sections; which brought out some interesting facts.

Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, wrote the church of Rome and their bishop—Victor—in defence of the churches in Asia Minor. "We therefore, observe the genuine day: neither adding thereto nor taking therefrom. For in Asia great lights have fallen asleep, which shall rise again in the day of the Lord's appearing, in which he will come with glory from heaven, and will raise up all the saints; Philip, one of the twelve apostles, who sleeps in Hierapolis, and his two aged virgin daughters. His other daughter, also, who having lived under the influence of the Holy Ghost, now likewise rests in Ephesus. Moreover, John, who rested upon the bosom of our Lord; who also was a priest, and bore the sacerdotal plate, both a martyr and teacher. He is buried in Ephesus; also Polycarp of Smyrna, both bishop and martyr. Thraseas, also, bishop and martyr of Eumenia, who is buried at Smyrna. Why should I mention Sagaris, bishop and martyr, who rests at Laodicea. Moreover, the blessed Papirius; and Melito, the eunuch, whose walk and conversation was altogether under the influence of the Holy Spirit, who now rests at Sardis, awaiting the episcopate from heaven, when he shall rise from the dead. All these observed the fourteenth day of the passover according to the gospel, deviating in no respect, but following the rule of faith. Moreover, I, Polycrates, who am the least of all of you, according to the tradition of my relatives, some of whom I have followed. For there were seven of my relatives bishops, and I am the eighth; and my relatives always observed the day when the people threw away the leaven. I, therefore, brethren, am now sixty-five years in the Lord, who having conferred with the brethren throughout the world, and having studied the sacred Scriptures, am not at all alarmed at those things with which I am threatened, to intimidate me. For they who are greater than I, have said, 'We ought to obey God rather than men.'" Eusebius Book V. c. 24.

"Upon this," says Eusebius, "Victor, the bishop of the church of Rome, forthwith endeavored to cut off the churches of all Asia, together with the neighboring churches, as heterodox, from the common unity. And he publishes abroad by letters, and proclaims, that all the brethren there are wholly excommunicated. But this was not the opinion of all the bishops. They immediately exhorted him, on the contrary, to contemplate that course that was calculated to promote peace, unity, and love to one another." Ibid.

Among these bishops who studied harmony was Irenæus of Gaul, who referred Victor to the more reasonable treatment of the subject by his (Victor's) predecessors in the bishopric —"Anicetus and Pius, Hyginus with Telesphorus and Xystus"—who neither observed the Asian custom themselves, nor permitted their successors to observe it; and yet they held fellowship with the churches that did observe it. Irenæus, in the same connection, speaks of a journey of the venerable Polycarp to Rome, in the time of Anicetus, when the topic came up for discussion. But they did not dispute much on this head, "For," says Irenæus, neither could Anicetus persuade Polycarp not to observe it, because he had always observed it with John the disciple of our Lord, and the rest of the apostles, with whom he associated; and neither did Polycarp persuade Anicetus to observe it." Ibid.

Neander, in speaking of the dispute between Polycarp and Anicetus, drops a "conjecture" which brings out the crucial fact of the whole matter. He says: "Perhaps even then there was not as yet any yearly feast in the Roman church; perhaps the difference at that time had reference to this very point." Church History, Vol. i. p. 413. This, to us, is the clear truth. We do not "conjecture;" we are satisfied that as late as the visit of Polycarp to Rome, A. D. 162, Good Friday nor Easter Sunday had been thought of by the Roman church. The letter of Irenæus to Victor proves this. His remark concerning the position of the above-named predecessors of Victor is this: "And yet, though they themselves did not keep it, they were not the less in peace with those from churches where it was kept whenever they came to them; although to keep it then was so much the more in opposition to those who did not." The note on this passage in Bohn's edition of Eusebius reads thus: "The meaning of this passage, if it has any obscurity, is, that the act of observing and celebrating, was a more decided attitude of opposition, in the very face of the church that did not observe the festival at this time."

Thus, the Roman bishops from Xystus (or Sixtus) to Anicetus—from A. D. 118 to 162—opposed any yearly observance whatever, but the steady practice of Asia Minor gradually affected all the other churches until, in the time of Victor—who took the bishopric A. D. 190, twenty-eight years after Polycarp's visit to Rome—all the churches under Rome's influence observed—after their own fashion—the yearly festival. The churches of the present time owe Good Friday and Easter Sunday not to Rome, but to Asia Minor. And yet Victor, fit father of the Popes, had the supreme impudence to lay down the law to churches that had kept the feast when Rome scouted the very idea; and not only so, but to excommunicate the followers of "John, and the rest of the apostles." Rome combated the feast as long as she could, and when she did recognize it, wanted to teach her teachers how to celebrate it.

Having shown that the yearly festival came from the churches of Asia Minor, let us now consider why they kept it. This is well stated by Neander. Referring to the letter of Polycrates already given, he says,—"From the language of this document it would seem to follow that in the churches of Asia Minor the Christians who followed the traditions of St. John went on the supposition that the 14th day of the month Nisan must be regarded as the day of Christ's passion. Hence they believed that this day ought for ever to be set apart for the commemoration of Christ's passion especially since the paschal lamb, which was slain by the Jews on this day, was considered a foretype of the sacrifice of Christ." Church History, Vol. i. p. 412. Again he says: "The annual feast might be derived from the Apostle St. John, whose long residence in Minor Asia must have had a lasting influence on the state of the churches there. Now, supposing this, we need not long for its cause. It is probable that, as this apostle had, previously to his coming there, been accustomed to celebrate the Jewish annual festival, and as the feast of the passover as recalling the great facts of which he had been an eye-witness, must have had a peculiar significancy to his mind, he may have introduced its celebration when he took up his permanent residence among these churches. This hypothesis will serve to explain the observance in this region of the chronology of the Jewish passover." Ibid.

However the pure truth concerning the passover may have been obscured even in Asia Minor, yet there can be no question that they grounded the observance on the last supper of our Lord. We have seen how Polycrates speaks. "All these observed the fourteenth day of the passover ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL, deviating in no respect, but following the rule of faith." Now where does the gospel teach anything of the sort? No where, except in relation to the Lord's supper. Hence there is no way of evading the proposition that the Lord's supper is the Christian passover; and if John understood it so, all other celebrations could have been but offensive to him. If any one man above another might be supposed to understand this question, it is the one who leaned on the Lord's bosom on the momentous night.

Another remark of Polycrates is significant. "I, therefore, brethren, am now sixty-five years in the Lord, who having conferred with the brethren throughout the world, and having studied the whole of the sacred Scriptures, am not," &c. On what subject had he "conferred with the brethren?" The passover. Then the inference is that he had studied the whole of the sacred Scriptures concerning the same thing. And if so, he must have regarded the matter as some some of us look at it now, for the passover is indeed taught in the whole Scriptures—the Old and New Testaments. To us it is evident that the passover reaches from the Deliverance out of Egypt to the great Deliverance at the coming of Christ, and that one is a type of the other. As the institution stretches through two dispensations it has two correspondent forms. Until Christ, the lamb foreshadowed the death of the true lamb; since Christ, the bread and wine represent the sacrifice as accomplished: and by eating it at the proper time we commemorate the Lord's death until his advent. The Lord's supper is not essential to salvation; it carries no mysterious influence in its elements; it is simply a precious memorial. It never has its true significance in any other view. We do not observe the yearly feast to increase our love for Christ, no more than the American people observe the Fourth of July to increase their patriotism. They desire to show their appreciation of what has been done for them; so do we. They desire to stir up the remembrance of a great event; so do we. By their action they acknowledge their their fathers; by ours we acknowledge Christ. If their day tells of liberty, ours more. The anniversary of Christ's death speaks of emancipation and reconciliation, of love and tender remembrance, of loyalty and zeal. We keep the feast, not that we may be united to Christ, but because we are united; not that his Spirit may be in us, but because it is in us; not that we may have communion with him, but because we have it. Precious privilege! to "do this in remembrance" of him.

Dr. A. Grant, a missionary to the Nestorian Christians, records their observance of the yearly feast. "The Passover they observe as their principal festival. They call it Pascha, after the original name of that ordinance as observed by the Jews. But the mode of their observance is modified by their faith in Christ. Regarding him as the final passover, they substitute the emblems of his body and blood for the Paschal Lamb." This occurs in Dr. Grant's work in proof of the Israelitish origin of the Nestorians. They are found in just about the spot where the ten tribes were originally carried. We think it very probable that the 200,000 Nestorians are a part of lost Israel. When the great body of the people took their journey north and west, there was probably a remnant left in their new home, and the Nestorians are their descendants. Some of them claim a descent from Naphtali. Jacob said on his death-couch, "Naphtali is a hind let loose." Perhaps this has some reference to a disconnection from the main body of the tribes. At any rate, it is pleasant to know that these ancient Christians have held on to the right view of the Lord's Supper. Let us not be behind them in our perceptions of the true, the venerable, and the lovely!

LUTHER LEE ON THE DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

Having reviewed Mr. Lee's articles on the immortality of the soul, and the consciousness of the dead, I shall now proceed to the examination of the subject of future punishment.

In Mr. Lee's article (No. 16,) he sets out to prove, that "The wicked will not be annihilated, or cease to exist, at, nor subsequently to, the general resurrection." His first argument is "founded upon the immateriality of the soul, and its conscious existence between death and the resurrection."

Mr. Lee says—"If these two points have not been proved, we have no hope of sustaining the present proposition, upon the principle that nothing can be proved," &c. Of course the whole value of Mr. Lee's present argument, which in fact is only an inference drawn from false premises, depends upon, 1st, whether he has proved the immateriality of the soul; or, 2d, the consciousness of the dead. These points he claims to have proved; we deny it, however, and his inference goes along with that denial, for, to argue his inference, would be to go back and argue those points over again. This we are not disposed to do, and shall therefore proceed at once to file an objection to Mr. Lee's leading proposition.

He uses the term "annihilation" as expressive of the view which we advocate, in reference to the punishment of the wicked. We repudiate the term as unscriptural, and as not expressive of our ideas of punishment. Annihilate, ad and nihilum, signifies to reduce to nothing. This is not the sense in which we speak of the destruction of the wicked. To destroy—destruo—to unbuild—to ruin, to lay waste—to make desolate—is the word which we generally use to express the sentiment.

But, without making further remarks upon the proposition before us, let us proceed to Mr. Lee's arguments, and review them.

Mr. Lee (Article No. 17,) first inquires into "the penalty of the law," without defining what law he be means. This point, therefore, we must take for granted. He cannot mean the law under which Adam was placed, for this, according to his theory, would make "eternal torments" the penalty of Adam's sin; from which position, I apprehend, Mr. Lee himself would revolt. Neither can he mean the Law of Ten Commandments, given to Israel on Mount Sinai. I conclude, then, that he means the Gospel—the Law of Liberty; but, for the sake of his argument, he should have been more explicit. In the absence, however, of such explicitness, I shall meet the question in its most extended sense.

Mr. Lee says the punishment, or penalty, of the law must be one of the following things.

"First, annihilation without conscious suffering; or, 2d, it must be conscious suffering and annihilation combined, consist in both; or, 3d, it must be conscious suffering without annihilation." Mr. Lee adds—"It will not be denied that the penalty of the law must be found in one or the other of these propositions." Notwithsanding Mr. Lee's assertion, I deny that the penalty of God's law is expressed in either proposition.

Mr. Lee's mind must be barren of language and ideas, judging from his selection of terms. The Bible alone furnishes varied phraseology in reference to this point. It is strange he could not find a single scriptural term by which to express the penalty of the divine law.

I proceed to remark upon the penalty of the primitive law, under which Adam was placed.

The penalty of the original law was not moral death, for this is but a state of sin, and no punishment at all. Neither was it "eternal torments," for the language used to express the penalty excludes the idea. It follows, therefore, that it was death—physical, animal, or organic death; a death embracing a process which is expressed by the words—"dying thou shalt die." And "dust thou art, and into dust shalt thou return." This is the law of death, under which the whole human race is born. The operation of this law brings man to the dust, and leaves him there, with no possibility of escape, except conditionally. The penalty of the original law, therefore, was not "annihilation" with, or without "conscious suffering;" but simply death—the cessation of life—the extinction of consciousness.

Having made these brief remarks on the penalty of the original law, and its operation upon the race, I shall glance at the law of Ten Commandments, as given to Israel on Mount Sinai.

The blessings and penalties of the law of Moses, were national. If they refused to keep his laws, He said he would "appoint over" them "terror, consumption, and burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of the heart; and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it." Lev. xxvi. 16. God also threatened them with dispersion and captivity among the nations of the earth. (See the whole chapter.) All this was national punishment So far as personal punishment is concerned, Ezekiel and Paul both testify it was death. "The soul that sins, it shall die." "He that sinned under Moses' law, died without mercy."

We now come to the main question, viz: What is the penalty of the divine law, in relation to the future destiny of the wicked?

Mr. Lee maintains it is "eternal misery," or "torment;" and insists upon it, that destruction admits of no degrees. As it respects the doctrine of "degrees in punishment," so far as the final destiny of sinners is concerned, I apprehend it is a fallacy. "The greater damnation," pronounced upon the Scribes and Pharisees, in Matt. xxiii. 14, was literally accomplised at the destruction of Jerusalem, in which there was "weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth." And so, also, of the passage in Luke xii. 47, 48, it evidently refers to the Jews nationally, while it had a specific application to the Apostles, in reference to "the impending vengeance" upon Israel, which they were exhorted to escape; and, in default of proper preparation and watching, they would suffer loss, or be beaten with "stripes." The passage is alone applicable to the Jews. Rewards and punishments are always spoken of in reference to character—and character is expressed more than once by the terms "good and evil;" the one standing related to eternal life, and the other to death: for "the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Upon this point, however, I cannot enlarge, and will, therefore, pass on to the consideration of Mr. Lee's proofs.

Punishment is always national, social, or personal; but Mr. Lee makes no distinction at all. He quotes text after text and applies them to future punishment, without ever stopping to inquire whether the punishment be national or personal. And consequently, every text he quotes is misapplied. In Matt. xxv. 30—"and cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth"—the punishment is upon the Jewish nation, and is national and personal, because the term nation embraces under it persons who give character to the nation: and it has nothing to do with what is called future punishment.

He quotes Luke xiii. 28—"There shall be weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out." This text does not express the nature of the punishment threatened, nor its duration; and, therefore, it is out of place so far as the doctrine of "eternal torments" is concerned. That the characters spoken of will or have been the subjects of this "weeping and wailing" I have no doubt; but what has this to do in opposition to their final extinction? I may have occasion to notice this text again, and therefore for the present will leave it.

The next passage quoted by Mr. Lee is Luke xvi. 23—"And in hell he lifted up his eyes being in torments." This is undeniably national punishment, and is perfectly foreign to Mr. Lee's subject. See our previous remarks upon the Parable.

He also refers to Rom. ii. 8, 9. The punishment here is also national and personal; and it is inflicted on "on the Jew first," as in the destruction of their commonwealth; and then upon the "Gentiles." To this text we shall also return again, at another point of this review.

These national and personal punishments, in their nature, cannot be expressed by "annihilation," nor "eternal torments;" but the word destruction appears to be a very fit representation of the subject. The destruction implied in the text quoted, then, would be national, or political and ecclesiastical; and personal destruction—i. e., death. That the nationality of the Jews is destroyed, none will deny; and that the nationality of the Gentiles will also be destroyed, no intelligent Christian will dispute.

Mr. Lee has made a false issue, and hence in all his arguments he is "beating the air." An example of this we have in his remarks Matt. xxv. 46:—"And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." Here an "everlasting punishment" is threatened, but it is not defined except by contrast. Its duration is clearly defined, but its nature has to be inferred. The righteous are to have eternal life, and the opposite of eternal life is eternal death, or eternal punishment. We are not under the necessity, therefore, to seek for the idea of annihilation in the term everlasting, nor, indeed, in the term punishment; for the Bible is sufficiently explicit elsewhere in defining what this everlasting punishment is.

Mr. Lee argues as though death was no punishment at all; hence his criticism upon the word kolasin. In all civilized governments, death, not the pain of dying, is regarded as the greatest punishment which can be inflicted upon a transgressor. If pain was a radical idea of punishment, the end could be more certainly secured by torture, without death. Penalty, from pœna, is the radical idea in punishment; hence punio, to punish, or inflict a penalty. This penalty, or punishment, may be whipping, cropping, branding, imprisonment, hard labor, confiscation of goods, transportation, or death; the last being regarded as the greatest. This is the penalty of the divine law.

But, as we are now merely presenting general principles, we will proceed.

Mr. Lee writes thus—"To maintain that the curse of the law, or the proper punishment of sin, is both suffering and annihilation, is to suppose that all the righteous suffer the penalty of the law once, and the wicked endure it twice." Again, he remarks, "All the dead therefore have suffered the penalty of the law once, inasmuch as they have once died, which is a dissolution of their being, a loss of their existence." Once more, he remarks, that "this theory represents God in the attitude that government would be in, should it, having the power to do so, hang men, and then bring them to life for the sake of the privilege of hanging them again." I admit there is some force in this part of Mr. Lee's argument, but, at the same time, his own theory is more monstrous than the one he is opposing. For, for a man to die, and his "immortal soul" to be sent to "hell" and "tormented" till the resurrection; and then for the "soul" to be united to a body, and sent back again to "hell" to suffer "eternal torments," seems to be a strange penalty, and alike revolting to God and man.

In our next article, we shall first state a general principle, prove it; and then proceed to review Mr. Lee's essay No. 18. HOMO.

THE GOSPEL: WHAT IS IT?

BY ELDER J. PARRY.

There is in our day great conflict of opinion; many zealous advocates for new theories, more or less important to be understood, as the pillar and ground of the faith once delivered to the saints. In many cases a sort of spiritual knight-errantry that may well claim to be "the true church millitant," but yet may fail to constitute the church triumphant. Doubtless there are some vital truths that lay at the very foundation of the gospel, the knowledge and belief of which are absolutely necessary to our salvation.

OUR PASSOVER—THE LORD'S SUPPER

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

The lengthening days will soon bring us to the anniversary of our Lord's death and the celebration of our Lord's Supper in commemoration of the one sufficient sacrifice. Most of our readers have already acquainted themselves with the argument in favor of the yearly feast. It is contained in the first volume of the Herald, Nos. 17 and 24. Something should be said in response to an objection which appeared in Vol. 1, No. 29. It runs thus:

"I do not myself regard the Lord's Supper as a merely annual feast. 'Tradition,' I think, does not make it more certain that its frequent observance prevailed in the christian church in the period immediately following the days of the Apostles, than the New Testament does that the earliest christian churches observed it oftener than once a year."

If "tradition" and the custom of early churches are to be followed we shall be in a quandary indeed; for there was no pretence of a general agreement on the subject as far back as Justin, martyred A. D. 166. Says Neander: "The celebration of the Lord's supper, as appears from Justin Martyr, was held to constitute an essential part of divine worship on every Sunday....In some churches, however, as for example that of North Africa, the daily partaking of the communion continued to be held necessary; since it was considered the daily bond of union between the Lord and the church, the daily means of promoting strength, life, and salvation to Christians. Accordingly Tertullian and Cyprian give a spiritual explanation of the petition for our daily bread, as looking for an uninterrupted sanctifying union with the body of Christ through the Lord's Supper....In other countries, however, perhaps as early as this date, the church acted upon the principle that no one ought to partake of the holy supper without a previous especial preparation of the heart, and therefore only at stated seasons chosen according to each one's necessities. The learned Hippolytus, who lived in the first half of the third century, wrote even at this early date a treatise on the question, 'whether a man ought to communicate daily or only at stated seasons.'" Church History, Vol. 1, pp. 460,1.

From this it appears that a daily eating of the Lord's supper was a very common practice among the early churches and that the North Africans were especially tenacious in relation to it, as they "continued" it after it had been given up by most of the other churches. Tertullian might be expected to continue it, for he was like some in our day, who understand the phrase "breaking bread" in Acts ii. 46, to indicate the Lord's Supper. But more consistent than his modern followers, he hesitated not to accept the consequences of his theory, and therefore held that Acts xxvii. 35 refers to the same thing.

Now if we are to follow "tradition," we must eat the Lord's supper daily, or weekly. The fact is that both the daily and weekly form sprang from a misconception of our Lord's design. It was supposed, and many still believe, that the bread and wine carry a spiritual power of their own when once consecrated. The Romish church believe them to be changed "into the real material body and blood of Christ, though retaining the appearance and all other sensible attributes of bread and wine." Luther differed from this, but made little improvement. He only changed from tran-substantiation to con-substantiation. He denied that the bread and wine were changed the body and blood, but he affirmed that the body and blood were in the bread and wine. Zwingle approached much nearer the true idea, but still held the communication of spiritual effects by the natural process of eating and drinking; and so with the majority of Christians to-day. We believe it to be a false and superstitious notion. There is no spiritual good in the elements, neither did our Saviour teach such a thing. We have no more right to say that the bread and wine affect us than the Jews had to say that the lamb and bitter herbs affected them. The former are no more significant of Christ than the latter. But "tradition" would lead us to believe that our personal communion with God, and our spiritual health and strength, depend on eating the bread and wine. Away with such idolatry! Let no human superstition be a barrier to a free, personal, and continual communion and fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. The real communion is not yearly, nor quarterly, nor monthly, nor weekly, nor daily, it is incessant. It is fettered by no priestly manipulation of bread and wine, it asks no intervention but that of our great High Priest.

Jesus is able to save evermore, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for those who come unto God by him. In his name we come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need.

"Thou, O Christ, art all I want,
More than all in thee I find.
* * * * * * *
Plenteous grace in thee is found,
Grace to cover all my sin;
Let the healing streams abound,
Make and keep me pure within.
Thou of life the fountain art,
Freely let me take of thee;
Spring thou up within my heart,
Rise to all eternity."

Besides "tradition," the objector has another plea—the practice of "the earliest Christian churches," as brought to view in "the New Testament." We should be very loath to trust to the earliest churches for our guidance, for their example was in many cases far from being perfect. Men often practiced incorrect things then, as they do now. We suppose that 1 Cor. xi 20–34 would be the main argument used in opposition to the yearly festival. We admit that the reading of the passage carries the impression of a more frequent celebration. But there is not the least evidence that the Apostle Paul warranted it. His object was to reprove the Corinthians for their disorderly procedure when they did come together to eat. Although the church at Corinth was one of "the earliest Christian churches," yet their conduct renders their example questionable, and we think it quite safe to disregard their opinions in this matter. Men who baptized living men for dead ones (1 Cor. xv. 29) might misconceive the true idea of the Lord's Supper; and men who were so carnal as to fill themselves with the food they had brought to the general gathering, leaving the poor to be "hungry," are hardly to be set up as expounders of Christ's memorial.

We do not disregard tradition and custom because they afford no countenance to our view of the subject. There is room for more than a suspicion that some of "the earliest churches" practiced the yearly feast. In the latter part of the second century a controversy arose, the details of which must be related. Among the Western churches a Friday was set apart to the memory of Christ's passion and a Sunday to that of his resurrection. These days still exist as Good Friday and Easter Sunday. But the Christians of Asia Minor took the fourteenth of the Hebrew month Nisan and observed the death of their Lord on the exact day of the moon. Hence instead of coming on the same day of the week every year, their day shifted. This difference of custom caused controversy between the two sections; which brought out some interesting facts.

Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, wrote the church of Rome and their bishop—Victor—in defence of the churches in Asia Minor. "We therefore, observe the genuine day: neither adding thereto nor taking therefrom. For in Asia great lights have fallen asleep, which shall rise again in the day of the Lord's appearing, in which he will come with glory from heaven, and will raise up all the saints; Philip, one of the twelve apostles, who sleeps in Hierapolis, and his two aged virgin daughters. His other daughter, also, who having lived under the influence of the Holy Ghost, now likewise rests in Ephesus. Moreover, John, who rested upon the bosom of our Lord; who also was a priest, and bore the sacerdotal plate, both a martyr and teacher. He is buried in Ephesus; also Polycarp of Smyrna, both bishop and martyr. Thraseas, also, bishop and martyr of Eumenia, who is buried at Smyrna. Why should I mention Sagaris, bishop and martyr, who rests at Laodicea. Moreover, the blessed Papirius; and Melito, the eunuch, whose walk and conversation was altogether under the influence of the Holy Spirit, who now rests at Sardis, awaiting the episcopate from heaven, when he shall rise from the dead. All these observed the fourteenth day of the passover according to the gospel, deviating in no respect, but following the rule of faith. Moreover, I, Polycrates, who am the least of all of you, according to the tradition of my relatives, some of whom I have followed. For there were seven of my relatives bishops, and I am the eighth; and my relatives always observed the day when the people threw away the leaven. I, therefore, brethren, am now sixty-five years in the Lord, who having conferred with the brethren throughout the world, and having studied the sacred Scriptures, am not at all alarmed at those things with which I am threatened, to intimidate me. For they who are greater than I, have said, 'We ought to obey God rather than men.'" Eusebius Book V. c. 24.

"Upon this," says Eusebius, "Victor, the bishop of the church of Rome, forthwith endeavored to cut off the churches of all Asia, together with the neighboring churches, as heterodox, from the common unity. And he publishes abroad by letters, and proclaims, that all the brethren there are wholly excommunicated. But this was not the opinion of all the bishops. They immediately exhorted him, on the contrary, to contemplate that course that was calculated to promote peace, unity, and love to one another." Ibid.

Among these bishops who studied harmony was Irenæus of Gaul, who referred Victor to the more reasonable treatment of the subject by his (Victor's) predecessors in the bishopric—"Anicetus and Pius, Hyginus with Telesphorus and Xystus"—who neither observed the Asian custom themselves, nor permitted their successors to observe it; and yet they held fellowship with the churches that did observe it. Irenæus, in the same connection, speaks of a journey of the venerable Polycarp to Rome, in the time of Anicetus, when the topic came up for discussion. But they did not dispute much on this head, "For," says Irenæus, neither could Anicetus persuade Polycarp not to observe it, because he had always observed it with John the disciple of our Lord, and the rest of the apostles, with whom he associated; and neither did Polycarp persuade Anicetus to observe it." Ibid.

Neander, in speaking of the dispute between Polycarp and Anicetus, drops a "conjecture" which brings out the crucial fact of the whole matter. He says: "Perhaps even then there was not as yet any yearly feast in the Roman church; perhaps the difference at that time had reference to this very point." Church History, Vol. i. p. 413. This, to us, is the clear truth. We do not "conjecture;" we are satisfied that as late as the visit of Polycarp to Rome, A. D. 162, Good Friday nor Easter Sunday had been thought of by the Roman church. The letter of Irenæus to Victor proves this. His remark concerning the position of the above-named predecessors of Victor is this: "And yet, though they themselves did not keep it, they were not the less in peace with those from churches where it was kept whenever they came to them; although to keep it then was so much the more in opposition to those who did not." The note on this passage in Bohn's edition of Eusebius reads thus: "The meaning of this passage, if it has any obscurity, is, that the act of observing and celebrating, was a more decided attitude of opposition, in the very face of the church that did not observe the festival at this time."

Thus, the Roman bishops from Xystus (or Sixtus) to Anicetus—from A. D. 118 to 162—opposed any yearly observance whatever, but the steady practice of Asia Minor gradually affected all the other churches until, in the time of Victor—who took the bishopric A. D. 190, twenty-eight years after Polycarp's visit to Rome—all the churches under Rome's influence observed—after their own fashion—the yearly festival. The churches of the present time owe Good Friday and Easter Sunday not to Rome, but to Asia Minor. And yet Victor, fit father of the Popes, had the supreme impudence to lay down the law to churches that had kept the feast when Rome scouted the very idea; and not only so, but to excommunicate the followers of "John, and the rest of the apostles." Rome combated the feast as long as she could, and when she did recognize it, wanted to teach her teachers how to celebrate it.

Having shown that the yearly festival came from the churches of Asia Minor, let us now consider why they kept it. This is well stated by Neander. Referring to the letter of Polycrates already given, he says,—"From the language of this document it would seem to follow that in the churches of Asia Minor the Christians who followed the traditions of St. John went on the supposition that the 14th day of the month Nisan must be regarded as the day of Christ's passion. Hence they believed that this day ought for ever to be set apart for the commemoration of Christ's passion especially since the paschal lamb, which was slain by the Jews on this day, was considered a foretype of the sacrifice of Christ." Church History, Vol. i. p. 412. Again he says: "The annual feast might be derived from the Apostle St. John, whose long residence in Minor Asia must have had a lasting influence on the state of the churches there. Now, supposing this, we need not long for its cause. It is probable that, as this apostle had, previously to his coming there, been accustomed to celebrate the Jewish annual festival, and as the feast of the passover as recalling the great facts of which he had been an eye-witness, must have had a peculiar significancy to his mind, he may have introduced its celebration when he took up his permanent residence among these churches. This hypothesis will serve to explain the observance in this region of the chronology of the Jewish passover." Ibid.

However the pure truth concerning the passover may have been obscured even in Asia Minor, yet there can be no question that they grounded the observance on the last supper of our Lord. We have seen how Polycrates speaks. "All these observed the fourteenth day of the passover ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL, deviating in no respect, but following the rule of faith." Now where does the gospel teach anything of the sort? No where, except in relation to the Lord's supper. Hence there is no way of evading the proposition that the Lord's supper is the Christian passover; and if John understood it so, all other celebrations could have been but offensive to him. If any one man above another might be supposed to understand this question, it is the one who leaned on the Lord's bosom on the momentous night.

Another remark of Polycrates is significant. "I, therefore, brethren, am now sixty-five years in the Lord, who having conferred with the brethren throughout the world, and having studied the whole of the sacred Scriptures, am not," &c. On what subject had he "conferred with the brethren?" The passover. Then the inference is that he had studied the whole of the sacred Scriptures concerning the same thing. And if so, he must have regarded the matter as some some of us look at it now, for the passover is indeed taught in the whole Scriptures—the Old and New Testaments. To us it is evident that the passover reaches from the Deliverance out of Egypt to the great Deliverance at the coming of Christ, and that one is a type of the other. As the institution stretches through two dispensations it has two correspondent forms. Until Christ, the lamb foreshadowed the death of the true lamb; since Christ, the bread and wine represent the sacrifice as accomplished: and by eating it at the proper time we commemorate the Lord's death until his advent. The Lord's supper is not essential to salvation; it carries no mysterious influence in its elements; it is simply a precious memorial. It never has its true significance in any other view. We do not observe the yearly feast to increase our love for Christ, no more than the American people observe the Fourth of July to increase their patriotism. They desire to show their appreciation of what has been done for them; so do we. They desire to stir up the remembrance of a great event; so do we. By their action they acknowledge their their fathers; by ours we acknowledge Christ. If their day tells of liberty, ours more. The anniversary of Christ's death speaks of emancipation and reconciliation, of love and tender remembrance, of loyalty and zeal. We keep the feast, not that we may be united to Christ, but because we are united; not that his Spirit may be in us, but because it is in us; not that we may have communion with him, but because we have it. Precious privilege! to "do this in remembrance" of him.

Dr. A. Grant, a missionary to the Nestorian Christians, records their observance of the yearly feast. "The Passover they observe as their principal festival. They call it Pascha, after the original name of that ordinance as observed by the Jews. But the mode of their observance is modified by their faith in Christ. Regarding him as the final passover, they substitute the emblems of his body and blood for the Paschal Lamb." This occurs in Dr. Grant's work in proof of the Israelitish origin of the Nestorians. They are found in just about the spot where the ten tribes were originally carried. We think it very probable that the 200,000 Nestorians are a part of lost Israel. When the great body of the people took their journey north and west, there was probably a remnant left in their new home, and the Nestorians are their descendants. Some of them claim a descent from Naphtali. Jacob said on his death-couch, "Naphtali is a hind let loose." Perhaps this has some reference to a disconnection from the main body of the tribes. At any rate, it is pleasant to know that these ancient Christians have held on to the right view of the Lord's Supper. Let us not be behind them in our perceptions of the true, the venerable, and the lovely!

LUTHER LEE ON THE DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

Having reviewed Mr. Lee's articles on the immortality of the soul, and the consciousness of the dead, I shall now proceed to the examination of the subject of future punishment.

In Mr. Lee's article (No. 16,) he sets out to prove, that "The wicked will not be annihilated, or cease to exist, at, nor subsequently to, the general resurrection." His first argument is "founded upon the immateriality of the soul, and its conscious existence between death and the resurrection."

Mr. Lee says—"If these two points have not been proved, we have no hope of sustaining the present proposition, upon the principle that nothing can be proved," &c. Of course the whole value of Mr. Lee's present argument, which in fact is only an inference drawn from false premises, depends upon, 1st, whether he has proved the immateriality of the soul; or, 2d, the consciousness of the dead. These points he claims to have proved; we deny it, however, and his inference goes along with that denial, for, to argue his inference, would be to go back and argue those points over again. This we are not disposed to do, and shall therefore proceed at once to file an objection to Mr. Lee's leading proposition.

He uses the term "annihilation" as expressive of the view which we advocate, in reference to the punishment of the wicked. We repudiate the term as unscriptural, and as not expressive of our idea of punishment. Annihilate, ad and nihilum, signifies to reduce to nothing. This is not the sense in which we speak of the destruction of the wicked. To destroy—destruo—to unbuild—to ruin, to lay waste—to make desolate—is the word which we generally use to express the sentiment.

But, without making further remarks upon the proposition before us, let us proceed to Mr. Lee's arguments, and review them.

Mr. Lee (Article No. 17,) first inquires into "the penalty of the law," without defining what law he be means. This point, therefore, we must take for granted. He cannot mean the law under which Adam was placed, for this, according to his theory, would make "eternal torments" the penalty of Adam's sin; from which position, I apprehend, Mr. Lee himself would revolt. Neither can he mean the Law of Ten Commandments, given to Israel on Mount Sinai. I conclude, then, that he means the Gospel—the Law of Liberty; but, for the sake of his argument, he should have been more explicit. In the absence, however, of such explicitness, I shall meet the question in its most extended sense.

Mr. Lee says the punishment, or penalty, of the law must be one of the following things.

"First, annihilation without conscious suffering; or, 2d, it must be conscious suffering and annihilation combined, consist in both; or, 3d, it must be conscious suffering without annihilation." Mr. Lee adds—"It will not be denied that the penalty of the law must be found in one or the other of these propositions." Notwithsanding Mr. Lee's assertion, I deny that the penalty of God's law is expressed in either proposition.

Mr. Lee's mind must be barren of language and ideas, judging from his selection of terms. The Bible alone furnishes varied phraseology in reference to this point. It is strange he could not find a single scriptural term by which to express the penalty of the divine law.

I proceed to remark upon the penalty of the primitive law, under which Adam was placed.

The penalty of the original law was not moral death, for this is but a state of sin, and no punishment at all. Neither was it "eternal torments," for the language used to express the penalty excludes the idea. It follows, therefore, that it was death—physical, animal, or organic death; a death embracing a process which is expressed by the words—"dying thou shalt die." And "dust thou art, and into dust shalt thou return." This is the law of death, under which the whole human race is born. The operation of this law brings man to the dust, and leaves him there, with no possibility of escape, except conditionally. The penalty of the original law, therefore, was not "annihilation" with, or without "conscious suffering;" but simply death—the cessation of life—the extinction of consciousness.

Having made these brief remarks on the penalty of the original law, and its operation upon the race, I shall glance at the law of Ten Commandments, as given to Israel on Mount Sinai.

The blessings and penalties of the law of Moses, were national. If they refused to keep his laws, He said he would "appoint over" them "terror, consumption, and burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of the heart; and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it." Lev. xxvi. 16. God also threatened them with dispersion and captivity among the nations of the earth. (See the whole chapter.) All this was national punishment So far as personal punishment is concerned, Ezekiel and Paul both testify it was death. "The soul that sins, it shall die." "He that sinned under Moses' law, died without mercy."

We now come to the main question, viz: What is the penalty of the divine law, in relation to the future destiny of the wicked?

Mr. Lee maintains it is "eternal misery," or "torment;" and insists upon it, that destruction admits of no degrees. As it respects the doctrine of "degrees in punishment," so far as the final destiny of sinners is concerned, I apprehend it is a fallacy. "The greater damnation," pronounced upon the Scribes and Pharisees, in Matt. xxiii. 14, was literally accomplised at the destruction of Jerusalem, in which there was "weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth." And so, also, of the passage in Luke xii. 47, 48, it evidently refers to the Jews nationally, while it had a specific application to the Apostles, in reference to "the impending vengeance" upon Israel, which they were exhorted to escape; and, in default of proper preparation and watching, they would suffer loss, or be beaten with "stripes." The passage is alone applicable to the Jews. Rewards and punishments are always spoken of in reference to character—and character is expressed more than once by the terms "good and evil;" the one standing related to eternal life, and the other to death: for "the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Upon this point, however, I cannot enlarge, and will, therefore, pass on to the consideration of Mr. Lee's proofs.

Punishment is always national, social, or personal; but Mr. Lee makes no distinction at all. He quotes text after text and applies them to future punishment, without ever stopping to inquire whether the punishment be national or personal. And consequently, every text he quotes is misapplied. In Matt. xxv. 30—"and cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth"—the punishment is upon the Jewish nation, and is national and personal, because the term nation embraces under it persons who give character to the nation; and it has nothing to do with what is called future punishment.

He quotes Luke xiii. 28—"There shall be weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out." This text does not express the nature of the punishment threatened, nor its duration; and, therefore, it is out of place so far as the doctrine of "eternal torments" is concerned. That the characters spoken of will or have been the subjects of this "weeping and wailing" I have no doubt; but what has this to do in opposition to their final extinction? I may have occasion to notice this text again, and therefore for the present will leave it.

The next passage quoted by Mr. Lee is Luke xvi. 23—"And in hell he lifted up his eyes being in torments." This is undeniably national punishment, and is perfectly foreign to Mr. Lee's subject. See our previous remarks upon the Parable.

He also refers to Rom. ii. 8, 9. The punishment here is also national and personal; and it is inflicted on "on the Jew first," as in the destruction of their commonwealth; and then upon the "Gentiles." To this text we shall also return again, at another point of this review.

These national and personal punishments, in their nature, cannot be expressed by "annihilation," nor "eternal torments;" but the word destruction appears to be a very fit representation of the subject. The destruction implied in the text quoted, then, would be national, or political and ecclesiastical; and personal destruction—i. e., death. That the nationality of the Jews is destroyed, none will deny; and that the nationality of the Gentiles will also be destroyed, no intelligent Christian will dispute.

Mr. Lee has made a false issue, and hence in all his arguments he is "beating the air." An example of this we have in his remarks Matt. xxv. 46:—"And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." Here an "everlasting punishment" is threatened, but it is not defined except by contrast. Its duration is clearly defined, but its nature has to be inferred. The righteous are to have eternal life, and the opposite of eternal life is eternal death, or eternal punishment. We are not under the necessity, therefore, to seek for the idea of annihilation in the term everlasting, nor, indeed, in the term punishment; for the Bible is sufficiently explicit elsewhere in defining what this everlasting punishment is.

Mr. Lee argues as though death was no punishment at all; hence his criticism upon the word kolasin. In all civilized governments, death, not the pain of dying, is regarded as the greatest punishment which can be inflicted upon a transgressor. If pain was a radical idea of punishment, the end could be more certainly secured by torture, without death. Penalty, from pœna, is the radical idea in punishment; hence punio, to punish, or inflict a penalty. This penalty, or punishment, may be whipping, cropping, branding, imprisonment, hard labor, confiscation of goods, transportation, or death; the last being regarded as the greatest. This is the penalty of the divine law.

But, as we are now merely presenting general principles, we will proceed.

Mr. Lee writes thus—"To maintain that the curse of the law, or the proper punishment of sin, is both suffering and annihilation, is to suppose that all the righteous suffer the penalty of the law once, and the wicked endure it twice." Again, he remarks, "All the dead therefore have suffered the penalty of the law once, inasmuch as they have once died, which is a dissolution of their being, a loss of their existence." Once more, he remarks, that "this theory represents God in the attitude that government would be in, should it, having the power to do so, hang men, and then bring them to life for the sake of the privilege of hanging them again." I admit there is some force in this part of Mr. Lee's argument, but, at the same time, his own theory is more monstrous than the one he is opposing. For, for a man to die, and his "immortal soul" to be sent to "hell" and "tormented" till the resurrection; and then for the "soul" to be united to a body, and sent back again to "hell" to suffer "eternal torments," seems to be a strange penalty, and alike revolting to God and man.

In our next article, we shall first state a general principle, prove it; and then proceed to review Mr. Lee's essay No. 18. HOMO.

THE GOSPEL: WHAT IS IT?

BY ELDER J. PARRY.

There is in our day great conflict of opinion; many zealous advocates for new theories, more or less important to be understood, as the pillar and ground of the faith once delivered to the saints. In many cases a sort of spiritual knight-errantry that may well claim to be "the true church millitant," but yet may fail to constitute the church triumphant. Doubtless there are some vital truths that lay at the very foundation of the gospel, the knowledge and belief of which are absolutely necessary to our salvation.

To be able to discover what these truths are, and to give them that prominence and attention they require, ought to be the anxious effort of every seeker after a future life in the kingdom of God; not only for himself but for the good of others. It is to be feared that too many advocates for some peculiar views, especially clear to them, for the toil and suffering endured on their account, may after all, place an undue estimate on these less important matters, to the exclusion of those of paramount importance.

I have no desire to neglect or slight any link in the golden chain of revealed truth that binds us to the throne of God; all I wish is, if possible, to discover what is the gospel of the kingdom, the belief of which can insure my salvation. Other things may be of value, and deserve to be treasured up in the heart for our growth in grace and comfort of hope; but this, like the sun in the firmament, is absolutely essential to life everlasting.

This then is the all-important question, What is the gospel? The good news of the kingdom of God. Surely a matter of such importance ought to be clearly revealed in the word of God, so that all may understand the way of salvation. There is but one gospel. Paul declares, He who preaches any other gospel than that ye have received, let him be accursed. This gospel was proclaimed to Abraham, the epitomy of it was, in thee and in thy seed shall all nations be blessed. It was preached to David that of the fruit of his loins God would raise up Jesus to sit on his throne and reign over the house of Jacob for ever.

The great theme of all the Prophets, from David to Malachi, was the future reign of Messiah, the Prince of the house of David, over the twelve tribes of Israel, and the submission of all nations to his sway, till the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas. In this hope all the patriarchs died, not having received the promises, but seeking for them at the resurrection of the just.

Christ and his apostles preached the same gospel, ever appealing to the Psalms and the Prophets to prove the truth of his mission as the promised Son of David. He promised his apostles that in the future kingdom they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Jewish believers could have no difficulty in receiving this gospel, it was what the faithful of the twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hoped to come; and after Christ's resurrection this gospel hope was uppermost in their thoughts. "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"

Much as this gospel is perverted, spiritualised, and rejected in these last days of apostacy, there are, and ever have been, a few who have embraced this blessed hope, and whose daily prayer is, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. This kingdom constitutes, 1st. The King, Jesus, the Christ of God. 2d. The teritory; Palestine as the center, and the dominion extending over the whole earth. 3d. The government under Christ, the supreme King of kings, constituting the immortal resurrected and changed saints. 4th. The subjects of the government; the restosed and converted twelve tribes of Israel, and the left of the nations at the advent of Christ, who submit to his rule and will multiply and increase till they fill the whole earth. The belief of this gospel of the kingdom, and being baptized in the faith of it, and living in hope and obedience to Christ as our Prophet, Priest and King, will insure us an inheritance in the kingdom of God.

Is this the one faith in which we were baptized into Christ for the remission of our sins?

The Conference at Providence, R. I.

BR. STORRS:—It was interesting to meet with the dear friends in Christ, who have long been in sympathy on some of the great and glorious views of theology which are essentially distinguishing features of the faith of the people of God, in these days of the approach of the kingdom of the Redeemer, and who have come, it may be, to a more earnest "fellow feeling" from the reception of the important, harmonising doctrine of "No life out of Christ." To meet old and tried friends—new and ardent ones—to hear again the evidences in support of the foundation of the believer's hope—to witness the determination on the part of all the brethren, whether in the ministry or not, to labor for the advancement of the truth upon immortality as it is revealed in the gospel—was gratifying and solemnly encouraging to those who may perhaps be regarded as pioneers in the work.

I heard some excellent preaching, and enjoyed some precious conference meetings. Up to the time I left, the meeting was interesting; and, I feel assured, must have been profitable. This letter will be taken as a testimony, merely, and not as a report.

Another important step has been taken in establishing the order of labor and position, which will characterize our efforts in spreading the truth over the land. And blessed be God, all the efforts that have been turned against the cause have proved powerless missiles, fallen at our feet.

Having preached in Providence two Sabbaths, just before the Conference, and feeling that there would be abundant help for the Sabbath, I made an appointment at New Bedford, Head of the River; where, by the way, there was a good hearing, and where we find some firm friends of the cause of life, as it is in the gift of the LIFE-GIVER. How a Methodist Feels.

A Methodist writes us under date of Jan. 23:—I am a "Local Preacher" of the Methodist Church; but I can not say I am satisfied with the creed of the church. Our preachers profess to believe that the greater part of mankind will go to hell; and yet on funeral occasions, if the deceased has been a good neighbor, or has contributed to the support of preaching, or the building of churches, &c., they will form a raft of such materials sufficiently strong to flood him off to heaven.... It seems reasonable that the wicked should perish—that is, cease to exist—but it does not seem reasonable that they should be raised from the dead for the mere purpose of being destroyed. The Almighty is a reasonable Being, and all his purposes are formed in wisdom. Human and Divine reason may not be so often at variance as many suppose. The idea that nine-tenths of the human race must endure the torments of hell forever, has always been shocking and repulsive to human reason; but they have been taught that human reason must be discarded. It seems unreasonable that the wicked, after having apparently perished by dissolution in the dust, should be brought to life, summoned to the judgment to receive sentence, and be forthwith burnt up. Though there are some passages of scripture that seem to indicate they will be raised....I am extremely anxious to find something to rest upon in view of death, having lived almost sixty years. I am a stranger to you; but I have seen you and heard you speak on several occasions; particularly at the "Bible Convention" in Hartford (in 1858). I recollect you as an anti-slavery man, when the Methodist Church was in the habit of bowing the knee to the arch-fiend, slavery. Now, when the monster is dying, they are ready to stab him.

I have for many years rejected the sentiment that the inhabitants of this earth are going off to some distant region, at death, to people some one of the planets or fixed stars. I suppose the heavenly bodies have inhabitants of their own, and do not depend on this little earth to furnish them with a race of intelligent beings: and as to going "beyond the bounds of time and space," that would be going nowhere. Some have the idea that the atmosphere is full of departed spirits—that they are interested in the affairs of this world, and watch over their friends. But no one, I think, would wish to exchange the present scenes of this world for the scenes of a region so airy.

I used to read the Crisis when in Mass., and found many good things in it. I have read also some papers published at the west. I understand that you publish a paper, and I would like to examine it to see what your sentiments are with regard to some of these things.

Yours in the bonds of Christian fellowship.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We have sent this brother "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST," and will send the Herald of Life, regularly, if he will accept it. Truth on life in Christ alone commends itself to every unprejudiced mind, when fairly presented. The greatest obstacle, next to the bigotry of a previous education, to the spread of this view, is the misrepresentation of opposers, whose interests are likely to be interfered with by its spread. Yet, in spite of all such opposition, the truth of no life from the dead except by a union with Christ, is rapidly advancing. Our Br. has referred to our anti-slavery career in the Methodist E. Church, when the opposition was of a similar character, and as violent from that Church, as that we have since received from the would-be-advent church on the life theme. But we have lived to see the Methodist Church occupy the ground they so severely censured us for occupying thirty years ago; and, indeed, they seem to have gone even beyond our position at that early period. So, we have not the slightest doubt, the true advent church will yet take the ground of no life out of Christ as strongly as we have ever held it, and perhaps advance beyond. It will be no more marvelous than the advance of the Methodist Church. We may not live to the day of the final triumph of the life-views; but that day will come, and YAHVEH will have the glory. We praise Him in the blessed hope. The views of Prof. Parks, of the Andover Theological Institution, published several years since, express our mind exactly on theological ideas.

Speaking of the moral sentiments of mankind, he says:

"These universal feelings provide us with a test for our faith. Whenever we find, my brethren, that the words which we proclaim do not strike a responsive chord in the hearts of the choice men and women who look to us for consolation; when they do not strike the depths of our own souls, reach down to hidden wants, and awake our best sensibilities; or when they make an abiding impression that the Divine government is harsh, pitiless, insincere, oppressive, devoid of sympathy with our most refined sentiments, reckless of even the most delicate emotion of the tenderest nature, then we may infer that we have left out of our theology some element which we should have inserted, or brought into it some element which we should have discarded. Somewhere it must be wrong."

My Recent Tour.

On Monday, Dec. 19th, I left home on a preaching tour, intending to be absent four weeks. At Springfield I dined with Br. Ladd, and afterward made a long call at Br. Curry's. Found Br. C. just finishing his unanswerable argument on the Forty-ninth Psalm, which appeared the following week in the columns which so constantly attest his untiring industry. Staid that night in Hartford, Ct., with Br. H. H. Dickinson and family. Spent a portion of the evening at a religious meeting conducted by the Baptist "revivalist," Rev. Mr. Earle. I came away with the distinct impression that the Bible plan of salvation is terribly shorn of its power and glory in all preaching that denies or ignores the doctrine of the sleep of the saints and the utter extinction of sinners. How my heart yearned for the priviledge of standing up at the close of Mr. E.'s discourse, and telling the people what was "written" on these subjects in the oracles of truth. Mr. E., in describing the entrance of sinners into "Hell," at death, represented that the Devil would say to them, "Art thou become like unto us?" Had the preacher comprehended the sense of these quoted words, as employed in Isa. xivth, he could not innocently have employed them as properly describing a state of torment or consciousness beyond the present life. And I may add, in passing, that the scene in SHOEL which is described in the chapter just named, should for ever silence the assumption that the account of the Rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvith) can have no rational interpretation unless it is regarded as teaching that dead sinners are alive and tormented in HADES. But I must not dwell on the point. Before leaving H., the next day, I called on Brn. Olmsted and Bissell, both of whom have long been firm believers in the view of Life only in Christ. There are other brethren of like precious faith in the city and vicinity, but I had not time to see them.

From Hartford I went to Winsted, Ct., where I had an appointment to preach four evenings. Had never been there before, though I was acquainted with a number of the friends. Brn. Joseph B. Eggleston and Walter Stickney met me at the cars, and at the house of the former I presently felt myself quite at home. These two brethren are the leading representatives in W. of the doctrine of Life only in Christ, and esteem it a privilege to do what they can to spread the doctrine in that region. Our meetings, owing to the cold weather and other causes, were not as largely attended as it was hoped they would be. But they were good meetings, notwithstanding. The Life view was presented on each evening, and it is certain that the good seed was not sown in vain. On the first evening the congregational minister of the place was in to hear, and was afterwards reported to me as having expressed himself considerably interested in the discourse. I called on the gentleman, at his house, and had an interesting interview of between two and three hours. Our conversation was of the most unreserved character, and my heterodoxy was no barrier to my being treated with the greatest courtesy and kindness. The remembrance of such opportunities for a free interchange of thought, with such men as I found this gentleman to be, is always pleasing. On the third evening two Methodist preachers were at our meeting, and heard as strong an argument as the preacher could make in defence of man's mortality and the non-revival of those who die in their sins. One of them was the resident Pastor, with whom, the next day, I enjoyed a long and pleasant interview at his house. I may also mention here that I formed a pleasant acquaintance with Dr. Steele, of Winsted, a firm and intelligent believer in the Life view. He communicated sundry interesting facts connected with the exposure of some of the most marvelous pretensions of modern spiritualism. The Dr. believes that the most remarkable of its phenomena are capable of being solved without resort to the idea that supernatural agencies are concerned in producing them. Sister C. C. Belden, of New Boston, Mass., came to Winsted to attend our meetings. The result was that she embraced the doctrine of Life for the righteous alone, and subscribed for the Herald of Life.

I did not remain very long at Winsted, but this account must leave me there or it will be too late for the mail. More anon. R. W.

The time of the Passover.

"Is the first new moon after the spring-equinox the beginning of the year? Can we get any thing like positive testimony to establish the fact?"
W. H. W.

The ancients began their year with the spring-equinox. The signs of the Zodiac measured the year. Hence, Worcester's first definition of "year" is—"A system or cycle of several months, usually twelve months, or the interval of time in which the sun moves through the twelve signs of the ecliptic." The sun enters the first sign—Aries, or the Ram—about the 21st of March, when the days and nights are equal.

The first Hebrew month is Abib or Nisan. Josephus says: "In the month of Xanthicus, which is by us called Nisan, and is the beginning of our year, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries....we celebrate the passover."—Antiquities, Book iii., Chap. 10, Sec. 5.

"The identification of the Jewish months with our own cannot be effected with precision on account of the variations that must inevitably exist between the lunar and the solar month, each of the former ranging over portions of two of the latter. It must, therefore, be understood that the following remarks apply to the general identity on an average of years. As the Jews still retain the names Nisan, &c., it may appear at first sight needless to do more than refer the reader to a modern almanac, and this would have been the case if it were not evident that the modern Nisan does not correspond to the ancient one. At present Nisan answers to March, but in early times it coincided with April; for the barley harvest—the first fruits of which were to be presented on the 15th day of that month (Lev. xxiii. 10)—does not take place even in the warm district about Jericho until the middle of April, and in the upland districts not before the end of that month [Robinson's Researches, i. 551, iii. 102, 145]. To the same effect Josephus [Ant. ii. 14, §6] synchronizes Nisan with the Egyptian Pharmuth, which commenced on the 27th of March [Wilkinson, l. c.], and with the Macedonian Xanthicus, which answers generally to the early part of April, though considerable variation occurs in the local calendars as to its place [comp. Ideler, i. 435, 448]. He further informs us [iii. 10 §5] that the passover took place when the sun was in Aries, which it does not enter until near the end of March. Assuming from these data that Abib or Nisan answers to April, then Zif or Iyar would correspond with May, Sivan with June, Tammuz with July, Ab with August, Elul with September, Ethanim or Tisri with October, Bul or Marchesvan with November, Chisleu with December, Tebeth with January, Sebat with February, and Adar with March."—Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. Art. Month.

The conclusion may be stated in the words of Prof. Strong:—"The month Nisan corresponds to parts of our March and April, and its fifteenth day was always that which included the first full moon after the vernal equinox, which occurs a few days past the middle of March."—Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, App. I. 8. The moon fulls this year April 10, in the evening at 11.19. The Hebrew day begins at evening; hence the fifteenth of Nisan begins at sunset on the 10th and ends at sunset on the 11th. And hence the fourteenth of Nisan ends at sunset on the 10th. The paschal lamb was slain on the 14th, "between the two evenings" [Ex. xii. 6], between 3 P. M. and Sunset. At this time our Lord was slain. Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark xv. 34. Luke xxiii. 24. The passover-feast was held the same night [Ex. xii. 8], the beginning of the 15th of Nisan, which answers this year to Monday evening, April 10.

We trust that we have been explicit enough in giving the data, so that all can satisfy themselves. In looking over our article on "The Christian Passover," Vol. i. No. 24, we find a blunder. In the last paragraph but one we said: "Find the time of the second full moon after the vernal equinox." Instead of "second" read "first." J. T. C.

Does it Harmonize?

In the closing article of the series headed "Brief of title to the Inheritance" the following passage is cited: "Their nobles shall be of themselves, and their governor shall proceed from the midst of them." Jer. xxx. 21. The writer then remarks—"This is not in harmony with the doctrine that out of the Gentiles is to be taken a people to be rulers, and Israel in the flesh are only to be servants in the land."

Before answering this, we would say that many of the positions in the articles referred to are correct, especially in relation to the conditions attached to the promises. In setting forth "God's National Plan" we particularly stated that those who inherit the land as subjects will be in Christ. But they are none the less Abraham's natural seed. The God who has predicted the restoration of Israel in the flesh has also predicted that the conditions will be complied with. It is a great mistake to suppose that our position is based on "the promises made under the law." We have plainly set forth the promises made before the law, and the subsequent provisions apart from the law covenant. Deut. xxix. 1, 12–15; xxx. 1–6. But we do claim that ALL the prophecies will be fulfilled in their time. There are no conditional prophecies. The very expression is absurd.

It is said that "a kingly dynasty has been established" to get clear of the difficulties of the age to come doctrine. We must say that this is a very cool thrust at the rights of David and his house. We wonder if the angel Gabriel supposed that his announcement to Mary of the heirship of David's throne was "to harmonize difficulties!" And we wonder if those who overcome are to sit with Jesus on his throne "to harmonize difficulties!" We now return to the first point.

We are glad that our friend has at last taken some pity on "Israel in the flesh." He cannot bear that they should "only be servants in the land." He thinks that it is better to annihilate them. For our part, we think that it would be more merciful to let them have their birthright even at the risk of having Gentile rulers. The text quoted harmonizes with our views exactly. Israel is to have a "governor" and "nobles." Out of Bethlehem shall come a governor to rule Israel and his name is Jesus. But where are the "nobles?" On the throne with Jesus. The governor and nobles are to be Abraham's natural seed. This shows the value of our position with reference to the ten tribes. Allow them to be found in the Teutonic race, and the great majority of the Gentile kings will be indeed Israelites. But there will be many real Gentiles on the throne as there will be many real Gentiles who will go into the land with Israel.

Question to Charles C. Tuck.

In the "Herald" of Dec. 28, Br. Tuck writes upon "The Great Tribulation" of Matt. xxiv. To our mind his conclusion is just, as far as relates to verse 21 of said chap.; for we never could see that this verse was applicable to Papacy, but only to the sorrow incident to the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. But in verse 29, it reads, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. The question now comes up, What tribulation is intended in this verse? Is it not the same Gentile tribulation that was to continue on Jerusalem or the Jewish people "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"? Luke xxi. 24, and which commenced with the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus?

If this be the same tribulation, the question next comes up, which we ask Br. T. or any other, What was the epoch of the ending of the tribulation? for "immediately, (speedily—Emphatic Diaglott) after" it "shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light," &c.; or, as Luke has it, "there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars," xxi. 25; forerunners of the day of our Lord and Master. Yours desiring to know the whole truth, E. W.

Prof. Mattison on Immortality.

In his ninth chapter, the Professor attempts to prove the natural immortality of man by denying that immortality is through faith. He says:

"It is admitted that the everlasting life promised the righteous, and the 'death' with which the finally impenitent are threatened, are conditional. 'He that believeth in the Son of God shall not perish, but have everlasting life.' Christ is indeed our life,'—the living bread that came down from heaven, of which if we eat we shall live forever. And so on the other hand, 'the wages of sin is death;' and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.

"But the question is, what do 'life' and 'death' mean, when used to denote the results of faith in Christ on the one hand, and of unbelief on the other? The whole controversy turns upon the settlement of this question. If 'everlasting life' means continued existence merely, and 'death' means annihilation, the question is settled. Immortality is not a destiny but a privilege, to be secured by faith. But if the terms 'life' and 'death' as thus employed, are used metaphorically, to indicate salvation, or deliverance from spiritual death on the one hand, and 'damnation,' or the 'second death' on the other, then the hypothesis of a conditional immortality finds no support from the doctrine of conditional life and death."

Stripped of verbiage, the question stands thus: Are the terms "life" and "death," in the texts cited by Prof. M., to be construed literally, or metaphorically? As it is admitted that "the whole controversy turns upon the settlement of this question," we are glad to devote time and space to its consideration. And first: the law of interpretation requires us take words in their most obvious sense, unless we can show cause for another construction. Above all other books, the Bible requires this rule, as it treats of the most momentous themes. If any one, therefore, will give a metaphorical meaning to a word, on him lies the burden of proof. The Professor appears to appreciate this principle. He says:

The considerations are five, and we reproduce them in order.

I. In metaphorical language we call one object or quality or event by the name of another, on account of the resemblance between the two. Thus Christ is a "rock" a "vine," a "lamb," &c. And as the elements of language are derived from things terrestial and visible, all ideas in regard to the spiritual and unseen world must needs be conveyed to us in terms first employed in reference to things temporal and material. Hence it is that heaven itself is described as a "city" and "country," and even the soul of man can find no more etherial word with which to clothe itself, than that which represents the intangible and invisible atmosphere.

And so in regard to the terms "life" and "death," when used to indicate rewards and punishments. As life is the most precious boon known to mortals here, it is employed in the Scriptures to represent the inestimable blessings which God has in reserve for the righteous; and as death is regarded as the most dreaded of all earthly calamities to the body, it is employed to represent the great calamity to the soul in a coming life—its banishment from God's presence forever.

It will be readily perceived that the first "consideration" does not touch the point. The Professor gives a metaphorical interpretation, but does not give any reason for doing so. "That the terms referred to are used metaphorically is" not "obvious" thus far. Try again, Professor!

II. If the term "life," when employed as above stated, means simple existence, and "death" non-existence, then the Scriptures should never employ any terms or phrases, when speaking of the results of faith or unbelief in this life, other than such as convey this meaning, and may be substituted by the term immortal on the one hand and annihilation on the other. But such is not the fact. "He that believeth not, shall be damned," said Christ. Now who will affirm that the damnation here spoken of is not the final reward of unbelief, or that it does not distinctly import a malediction resting upon a still living soul? Will it do to render the sentence, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be immortal, and he that believeth not, shall be annihilated?" Every one can see, by this experiment, that the words "saved" and "damned" are not used in the sense of made immortal and annihilated; and consequently that such do not constitute the reward and penalty of unbelief, or of a life of sin.

The Professor does not give the exact literal meaning of "life." "Simple existence" will not do. "Living existence" would be better. A rock exists but does not live. "Whatever is, exists." Worcester. Life is "the state of living or of being alive." Worcester. In like manner, "non-existence" is not the definition of "death." A horse may be dead, and yet exist. We say a "dead horse," by which we mean a horse which has ceased to have a living existence; but a long time may elapse ere we can properly say that the horse no longer exists. "Death" is the "extinction of life." Worcester.

The Professor asserts that if the terms "life" and "death" in the texts quoted, have their literal meaning, "then the Scriptures should never employ any terms or phrases, when speaking of the results of faith or unbelief in this life, other than such as convey this meaning." But no reason is given for the assertion. As it stands it is not correct. We can show this by taking the word "damnation" as quoted by the Professor. He wishes to force us to substitute "annihilation," or—to keep to the point—"death" for "damnation." To show the absurdity of this argument, let us substitute the Professor's interpretation of "death" for "damnation." "Will it do to render the sentence, 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be delivered from spiritual death, and he that believeth not, shall be punished with everlasting misery?'" The Professor would say that he acepts this. But does the word "damnation" have any such such meaning? We answer, nay. Let us have the definition. The verb "damn" in Worcester has the following deffinition: "1. To condemn; to judge to be guilty. 2. To sentence to punishment. 3. (Theol.) To doom to eternal punishment; to sentence to the torments of hell. 4. To censure or condemn, by hooting, hissing, or by any other tokens of disapprobation." Here we have the clearest distinction made between "damnation" and the penalty proper. In the third, or "theological" definition, the damnation is one thing, and the punishment is another. "To doom to punishment" is not synonymous with "To punish." "To sentence to the torments of hell" is not equivalent with "To suffer the torments of hell." So, on the other hand, taking our view of the consequence of sin, we make a clear distinction between "damnation" and annihilation." "To damn" is "to condemn" not "to punish." He that is "condemned" will be annihilated in consequence of the damnation. The fact is, our Professor is miscalled. He has not yet acquired the definition of the simplest words. He cannot distinguish between condemnation and punishment, between the sentence and its execution.

Now if he had said that "the Scriptures should never employ any terms or phrases other than such" as suit with our understanding of "life" and "death," we should agree. But to demand that every expression should "convey" the same exact sense is ridiculous.

The sinner must be damned or condemned before the penalty is executed; how, then, can the damnation be the exact equivalent of the penalty, so that the words may be interchanged, as the Professor would have it? "Damnation" is "the result of unbelief" and so is the penalty proper.

The Professor asks,—"Who will affirm that the damnation here spoken of is not the final reward of unbelief?" We "will affirm" it; and when he sees that damnation and punishment convey a different meaning one from the other, he will be glad to "affirm" the same thing. The text reads: "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned." Mark xvi. 16. In harmony with the literal sense of "life" and "death," the meaning is that the believer shall be saved from death, from destruction, from annihilation, but that the unbeliever shall be condemned to death, to destruction, to annihilation. Salvation from death implies a consequent immortality, while damnation to death implies a consequent extinction.

The second "consideration" of the Professor is thus disposed of. The principle he announces is incorrect, and the text he quotes fails to assist him. That "life" and "death" "are used metaphorically is" no more "obvious from" consideration No. 2 than from No. 1. Try again!

III. If the final "death" of the sinner were annihilation, then every description of that death should indicate not only freedom from all suffering for ever, but the termination of all existence. It would be as misleading to employ terms and figures and parables conveying an idea of suffering beyond the day of judgment, as it would to speak of our suffering ages before we had existence. But what are the facts? When the righteous enter "life eternal" the wicked "go away into everlasting punishment." Can that mean annihilation? And if so, how is it "everlasting?" How is it, if the wicked go out of being, that "their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched?" How is it that we hear the voice of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth from souls that have been stricken out of existence?

We admit the justice of the Professor's two propositions. "But what are the facts?" Has he produced anything out of harmony with the propositions? He refers to the phrase "everlasting punishment," and asks if that is "annihilation." Let Paul answer: "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction." 2 Thess. i. 9. "Can that mean annihilation?" Let us appeal again to Worcester. "Annihilation, state of being annihilated; destruction." "And if so," says the Professor, "how is it 'everlasting?'" We answer thus: If a man dies and never lives again, is it not everlasting death, everlasting destruction, everlasting annihilation? And if this death comes as a penalty or punishment is it not "everlasting punishment?" Prof. M. quotes Luther Lee with approval. Perhaps he will allow Mr. Lee to explain this point. "Now should you resort to annihilation in your last fit of desperation, to avoid the conclusion in favor of endless misery, you would thereby defeat your own theory, and award me the argument on the question, as annihilation would be endless punishment." "The term in the question is 'punishment,' not misery; and annihilation, when contrasted with endless happiness, would be endless punishment, though not endless misery. Luther Lee to A. C. Thomas, Letter No. 39.

"How is it, if the wicked go out of being, that 'their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched?'" If the Professor had given heed to past expositions of this phrase, we should not have to repeat a thing so easily harmonized with the doctrine that "the wicked go out of being." Where, we ask, are the wicked, when their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched? The record says in "hell"—literally gehenna.. This word is a corruption of Ge Hinnom—Ge means valley and Hinnom is a man's name. Hence the word translated "hell" in connection with the phraseology referred to, signifies VALLEY OF HINNOM. This valley is first spoken of in the book of Joshua xv. 8. "And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem: and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants [Rephaim] northward." See also Josh. xvii. 16. Now, Professor, take your map of Jerusalem, and look on the south side, and there you will see this valley of Hinnom—Ge Hinnom—Gehenna. Perhaps your fancied hell is like your fancied heaven.

"Beyond the bounds of time and space."

As a preacher once said, "Somewhere outside of God's creation." But the real hell or gehenna is on the south side of Jerusalem.

To be able to discover what these truths are, and to give them that prominence and attention they require, ought to be the anxious effort of every seeker after a future life in the kingdom of God; not only for himself but for the good of others. It is to be feared that too many advocates for some peculiar views, especially clear to them, for the toil and suffering endured on their account, may after all, place an undue estimate on these less important matters, to the exclusion of those of paramount importance.

I have no desire to neglect or slight any link in the golden chain of revealed truth that binds us to the throne of God; all I wish is, if possible, to discover what is the gospel of the kingdom, the belief of which can insure my salvation. Other things may be of value, and deserve to be treasured up in the heart for our growth in grace and comfort of hope; but this, like the sun in the firmament, is absolutely essential to life everlasting.

This then is the all-important question, What is the gospel? The good news of the kingdom of God. Surely a matter of such importance ought to be clearly revealed in the word of God, so that all may understand the way of salvation. There is but one gospel. Paul declares, He who preaches any other gospel than that ye have received, let him be accursed. This gospel was proclaimed to Abraham, the epitomy of it was, in thee and in thy seed shall all nations be blessed. It was preached to David that of the fruit of his loins God would raise up Jesus to sit on his throne and reign over the house of Jacob for ever.

The great theme of all the Prophets, from David to Malachi, was the future reign of Messiah, the Prince of the house of David, over the twelve tribes of Israel, and the submission of all nations to his sway, till the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas. In this hope all the patriarchs died, not having received the promises, but seeking for them at the resurrection of the just.

Christ and his apostles preached the same gospel, ever appealing to the Psalms and the Prophets to prove the truth of his mission as the promised Son of David. He promised his apostles that in the future kingdom they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Jewish believers could have no difficulty in receiving this gospel, it was what the faithful of the twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hoped to come; and after Christ's resurrection this gospel hope was uppermost in their thoughts. "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"

Much as this gospel is perverted, spiritualised, and rejected in these last days of apostacy, there are, and ever have been, a few who have embraced this blessed hope, and whose daily prayer is, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. This kingdom constitutes, 1st. The King, Jesus, the Christ of God. 2d. The teritory; Palestine as the center, and the dominion extending over the whole earth. 3d. The government under Christ, the supreme King of kings, constituting the immortal resurrected and changed saints. 4th. The subjects of the government; the restosed and converted twelve tribes of Israel, and the left of the nations at the advent of Christ, who submit to his rule and will multiply and increase till they fill the whole earth. The belief of this gospel of the kingdom, and being baptized in the faith of it, and living in hope and obedience to Christ as our Prophet, Priest and King, will insure us an inheritance in the kingdom of God.

Is this the one faith in which we were baptized into Christ for the remission of our sins?

The Conference at Providence, R. I.

BR. STORRS:—It was interesting to meet with the dear friends in Christ, who have long been in sympathy on some of the great and glorious views of theology which are essentially distinguishing features of the faith of the people of God, in these days of the approach of the kingdom of the Redeemer, and who have come, it may be, to a more earnest "fellow feeling" from the reception of the important, harmonising doctrine of "No life out of Christ." To meet old and tried friends —new and ardent ones—to hear again the evidences in support of the foundation of the believer's hope—to witness the determination on the part of all the brethren, whether in the ministry or not, to labor for the advancement of the truth upon immortality as it is revealed in the gospel—was gratifying and solemnly encouraging to those who may perhaps be regarded as pioneers in the work.

I heard some excellent preaching, and enjoyed some precious conference meetings. Up to the time I left, the meeting was interesting; and, I feel assured, must have been profitable. This letter will be taken as a testimony, merely, and not as a report.

Another important step has been taken in establishing the order of labor and position, which will characterize our efforts in spreading the truth over the land. And blessed be God, all the efforts that have been turned against the cause have proved powerless missiles, fallen at our feet.

Having preached in Providence two Sabbaths, just before the Conference, and feeling that there would be abundant help for the Sabbath, I made an appointment at New Bedford, Head of the River; where, by the way, there was a good hearing, and where we find some firm friends of the cause of life, as it is in the gift of the LIFE-GIVER. How a Methodist Feels.

A Methodist writes us under date of Jan. 23:—I am a "Local Preacher" of the Methodist Church; but I can not say I am satisfied with the creed of the church. Our preachers profess to believe that the greater part of mankind will go to hell; and yet on funeral occasions, if the deceased has been a good neighbor, or has contributed to the support of preaching, or the building of churches, &c., they will form a raft of such materials sufficiently strong to flood him off to heaven.... It seems reasonable that the wicked should perish—that is, cease to exist—but it does not seem reasonable that they should be raised from the dead for the mere purpose of being destroyed. The Almighty is a reasonable Being, and all his purposes are formed in wisdom. Human and Divine reason may not be so often at variance as many suppose. The idea that nine-tenths of the human race must endure the torments of hell forever, has always been shocking and repulsive to human reason; but they have been taught that human reason must be discarded. It seems unreasonable that the wicked, after having apparently perished by dissolution in the dust, should be brought to life, summoned to the judgment to receive sentence, and be forthwith burnt up. Though there are some passages of scripture that seem to indicate they will be raised....I am extremely anxious to find something to rest upon in view of death, having lived almost sixty years. I am a stranger to you; but I have seen you and heard you speak on several occasions; particularly at the "Bible Convention" in Hartford (in 1858). I recollect you as an anti-slavery man, when the Methodist Church was in the habit of bowing the knee to the arch-fiend, slavery. Now, when the monster is dying, they are ready to stab him.

I have for many years rejected the sentiment that the inhabitants of this earth are going off to some distant region, at death, to people some one of the planets or fixed stars. I suppose the heavenly bodies have inhabitants of their own, and do not depend on this little earth to furnish them with a race of intelligent beings: and as to going "beyond the bounds of time and space," that would be going nowhere. Some have the idea that the atmosphere is full of departed spirits—that they are interested in the affairs of this world, and watch over their friends. But no one, I think, would wish to exchange the present scenes of this world for the scenes of a region so airy.

I used to read the Crisis when in Mass., and found many good things in it. I have read also some papers published at the west. I understand that you publish a paper, and I would like to examine it to see what your sentiments are with regard to some of these things.

Yours in the bonds of Christian fellowship.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We have sent this brother "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST," and will send the Herald of Life, regularly, if he will accept it. Truth on life in Christ alone commends itself to every unprejudiced mind, when fairly presented. The greatest obstacle, next to the bigotry of a previous education, to the spread of this view, is the misrepresentation of opposers, whose interests are likely to be interfered with by its spread. Yet, in spite of all such opposition, the truth of no life from the dead except by a union with Christ, is rapidly advancing. Our Br. has referred to our anti-slavery career in the Methodist E. Church, when the opposition was of a similar character, and as violent from that Church, as that we have since received from the would-be-advent church on the life theme. But we have lived to see the Methodist Church occupy the ground they so severely censured us for occupying thirty years ago; and, indeed, they seem to have gone even beyond our position at that early period. So, we have not the slightest doubt, the true advent church will yet take the ground of no life out of Christ as strongly as we have ever held it, and perhaps advance beyond. It will be no more marvelous than the advance of the Methodist Church. We may not live to the day of the final triumph of the life-views; but that day will come, and YAHVEH will have the glory. We praise Him in the blessed hope. The views of Prof. Parks, of the Andover Theological Institution, published several years since, express our mind exactly on theological ideas.

Speaking of the moral sentiments of mankind, he says:

"These universal feelings provide us with a test for our faith. Whenever we find, my brethren, that the words which we proclaim do not strike a responsive chord in the hearts of the choice men and women who look to us for consolation; when they do not strike the depths of our own souls, reach down to hidden wants, and awake our best sensibilities; or when they make an abiding impression that the Divine government is harsh, pitiless, insincere, oppressive, devoid of sympathy with our most refined sentiments, reckless of even the most delicate emotion of the tenderest nature, then we may infer that we have left out of our theology some element which we should have inserted, or brought into it some element which we should have discarded. Somewhere it must be wrong."

My Recent Tour.

On Monday, Dec. 19th, I left home on a preaching tour, intending to be absent four weeks. At Springfield I dined with Br. Ladd, and afterward made a long call at Br. Curry's. Found Br. C. just finishing his unanswerable argument on the Forty-ninth Psalm, which appeared the following week in the columns which so constantly attest his untiring industry. Staid that night in Hartford, Ct., with Br. H. H. Dickinson and family. Spent a portion of the evening at a religious meeting conducted by the Baptist "revivalist," Rev. Mr. Earle. I came away with the distinct impression that the Bible plan of salvation is terribly shorn of its power and glory in all preaching that denies or ignores the doctrine of the sleep of the saints and the utter extinction of sinners. How my heart yearned for the priviledge of standing up at the close of Mr. E.'s discourse, and telling the people what was "written" on these subjects in the oracles of truth. Mr. E., in describing the entrance of sinners into "Hell," at death, represented that the Devil would say to them, "Art thou become like unto us?" Had the preacher comprehended the sense of these quoted words, as employed in Isa. xivth, he could not innocently have employed them as properly describing a state of torment or consciousness beyond the present life. And I may add, in passing, that the scene in SHOEL which is described in the chapter just named, should for ever silence the assumption that the account of the Rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvith) can have no rational interpretation unless it is regarded as teaching that dead sinners are alive and tormented in HADES. But I must not dwell on the point. Before leaving H., the next day, I called on Brn. Olmsted and Bissell, both of whom have long been firm believers in the view of Life only in Christ. There are other brethren of like precious faith in the city and vicinity, but I had not time to see them.

From Hartford I went to Winsted, Ct., where I had an appointment to preach four evenings. Had never been there before, though I was acquainted with a number of the friends. Brn. Joseph B. Eggleston and Walter Stickney met me at the cars, and at the house of the former I presently felt myself quite at home. These two brethren are the leading representatives in W. of the doctrine of Life only in Christ, and esteem it a privilege to do what they can to spread the doctrine in that region. Our meetings, owing to the cold weather and other causes, were not as largely attended as it was hoped they would be. But they were good meetings, notwithstanding. The Life view was presented on each evening, and it is certain that the good seed was not sown in vain. On the first evening the congregational minister of the place was in to hear, and was afterwards reported to me as having expressed himself considerably interested in the discourse. I called on the gentleman, at his house, and had an interesting interview of between two and three hours. Our conversation was of the most unreserved character, and my heterodoxy was no barrier to my being treated with the greatest courtesy and kindness. The remembrance of such opportunities for a free interchange of thought, with such men as I found this gentleman to be, is always pleasing. On the third evening two Methodist preachers were at our meeting, and heard as strong an argument as the preacher could make in defence of man's mortality and the non-revival of those who die in their sins. One of them was the resident Pastor, with whom, the next day, I enjoyed a long and pleasant interview at his house. I may also mention here that I formed a pleasant acquaintance with Dr. Steele, of Winsted, a firm and intelligent believer in the Life view. He communicated sundry interesting facts connected with the exposure of some of the most marvelous pretensions of modern spiritualism. The Dr. believes that the most remarkable of its phenomena are capable of being solved without resort to the idea that supernatural agencies are concerned in producing them. Sister C. C. Belden, of New Boston, Mass., came to Winsted to attend our meetings. The result was that she embraced the doctrine of Life for the righteous alone, and subscribed for the Herald of Life.

I did not remain very long at Winsted, but this account must leave me there or it will be too late for the mail. More anon. R. W.

The time of the Passover.

"Is the first new moon after the spring-equinox the beginning of the year? Can we get any thing like positive testimony to establish the fact?"

W. H. W.

The ancients began their year with the spring-equinox. The signs of the Zodiac measured the year. Hence, Worcester's first definition of "year" is—"A system or cycle of several months, usually twelve months, or the interval of time in which the sun moves through the twelve signs of the ecliptic." The sun enters the first sign—Aries, or the Ram —about the 21st of March, when the days and nights are equal.

The first Hebrew month is Abib or Nisan. Jesephus says: "In the month of Xanthicus, which is by us called Nisan, and is the beginning of our year, on the fourteenth day of the lunar month, when the sun is in Aries....we celebrate the passover."—Antiquities, Book iii., Chap. 10, Sec. 5.

"The identification of the Jewish months with our own cannot be effected with precision on account of the variations that must inevitably exist between the lunar and the solar month, each of the former ranging over portions of two of the latter. It must, therefore, be understood that the following remarks apply to the general identity on an average of years. As the Jews still retain the names Nisan, &c., it may appear at first sight needless to do more than refer the reader to a modern almanac, and this would have been the case if it were not evident that the modern Nisan does not correspond to the ancient one. At present Nisan answers to March, but in early times it coincided with April; for the barley harvest—the first fruits of which were to be presented on the 15th day of that month (Lev. xxiii. 10)—does not take place even in the warm district about Jericho until the middle of April, and in the upland districts not before the end of that month [Robinson's Researches, i. 551, iii. 102, 145]. To the same effect Josephus [Ant. ii. 14, §6] synchronizes Nisan with the Egyptian Pharmuth, which commenced on the 27th of March [Wilkinson, l. c.], and with the Macedonian Xanthicus, which answers generally to the early part of April, though considerable variation occurs in the local calendars as to its place [comp. Ideler, i. 435, 448]. He further informs us [iii. 10 §5] that the passover took place when the sun was in Aries, which it does not enter until near the end of March. Assuming from these data that Abib or Nisan answers to April, then Zif or Iyar would correspond with May, Sivan with June, Tammuz with July, Ab with August, Elul with September, Ethanim or Tisri with October, Bul or Marchesvan with November, Chisleu with December, Tebeth with January, Sebat with February, and Adar with March."—Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. Art. Month.

The conclusion may be stated in the words of Prof. Strong:—"The month Nisan corresponds to parts of our March and April, and its fifteenth day was always that which included the first full moon after the vernal equinox, which occurs a few days past the middle of March."—Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, App. I. 8. The moon fulls this year April 10, in the evening at 11.19. The Hebrew day begins at evening; hence the fifteenth of Nisan begins at sunset on the 10th and ends at sunset on the 11th. And hence the fourteenth of Nisan ends at sunset on the 10th. The paschal lamb was slain on the 14th, "between the two evenings" [Ex. xii. 6], between 3 P. M. and Sunset. At this time our Lord was slain. Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark xv. 34. Luke xxiii. 24. The passover-feast was held the same night [Ex. xii. 8], the beginning of the 15th of Nisan, which answers this year to Monday evening, April 10.

We trust that we have been explicit enough in giving the data, so that all can satisfy themselves. In looking over our article on "The Christian Passover," Vol. i. No. 24, we find a blunder. In the last paragraph but one we said: "Find the time of the second full moon after the vernal equinox." Instead of "second" read "first." J. T. C.

Does it Harmonize?

In the closing article of the series headed "Brief of title to the Inheritance" the following passage is cited: "Their nobles shall be of themselves, and their governor shall proceed from the midst of them." Jer. xxx. 21. The writer then remarks—"This is not in harmony with the doctrine that out of the Gentiles is to be taken a people to be rulers, and Israel in the flesh are only to be servants in the land."

Before answering this, we would say that many of the positions in the articles referred to are correct, especially in relation to the conditions attached to the promises. In setting forth "God's National Plan" we particularly stated that those who inherit the land as subjects will be in Christ. But they are none the less Abraham's natural seed. The God who has predicted the restoration of Israel in the flesh has also predicted that the conditions will be complied with. It is a great mistake to suppose that our position is based on "the promises made under the law." We have plainly set forth the promises made before the law, and the subsequent provisions apart from the law covenant. Deut. xxix. 1, 12–15; xxx. 1–6. But we do claim that ALL the prophecies will be fulfilled in their time. There are no conditional prophecies. The very expression is absurd.

It is said that "a kingly dynasty has been established" to get clear of the difficulties of the age to come doctrine. We must say that this is a very cool thrust at the rights of David and his house. We wonder if the angel Gabriel supposed that his announcement to Mary of the heirship of David's throne was "to harmonize difficulties!" And we wonder if those who overcome are to sit with Jesus on his throne "to harmonize difficulties!" We now return to the first point.

We are glad that our friend has at last taken some pity on "Israel in the flesh." He cannot bear that they should "only be servants in the land." He thinks that it is better to annihilate them. For our part, we think that it would be more merciful to let them have their birthright even at the risk of having Gentile rulers. The text quoted harmonizes with our views exactly. Israel is to have a "governor" and "nobles." Out of Bethlehem shall come a governor to rule Israel and his name is Jesus. But where are the "nobles?" On the throne with Jesus. The governor and nobles are to be Abraham's natural seed. This shows the value of our position with reference to the ten tribes. Allow them to be found in the Teutonic race, and the great majority of the Gentile kings will be indeed Israelites. But there will be many real Gentiles on the throne as there will be many real Gentiles who will go into the land with Israel.

Question to Charles C. Tuck.

In the "Herald" of Dec. 28, Br. Tuck writes upon "The Great Tribulation" of Matt. xxiv. To our mind his conclusion is just, as far as relates to verse 21 of said chap.; for we never could see that this verse was applicable to Papacy, but only to the sorrow incident to the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. But in verse 29, it reads, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c. The question now comes up, What tribulation is intended in this verse? Is it not the same Gentile tribulation that was to continue on Jerusalem or the Jewish people "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"? Luke xxi. 24, and which commenced with the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus?

If this be the same tribulation, the question next comes up, which we ask Br. T. or any other, What was the epoch of the ending of the tribulation? for "immediately, (speedily—Emphatic Diaglott) after" it "shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light," &c.; or, as Luke has it, "there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars," xxi. 25; forerunners of the day of our Lord and Master. Yours desiring to know the whole truth, E. W.

Prof. Mattison on Immortality.

In his ninth chapter, the Professor attempts to prove the natural immortality of man by denying that immortality is through faith. He says:

"It is admitted that the everlasting life promised the righteous, and the 'death' with which the finally impenitent are threatened, are conditional. 'He that believeth in the Son of God shall not perish, but have everlasting life.' Christ is indeed our life,' —the living bread that came down from heaven, of which if we eat we shall live forever. And so on the other hand, 'the wages of sin is death;' and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.

"But the question is, what do 'life' and 'death' mean, when used to denote the results of faith in Christ on the one hand, and of unbelief on the other? The whole controversy turns upon the settlement of this question. If 'everlasting life' means continued existence merely, and 'death' means annihilation, the question is settled. Immortality is not a destiny but a privilege, to be secured by faith. But if the terms 'life' and 'death' as thus employed, are used metaphorically, to indicate salvation, or deliverance from spiritual death on the one hand, and 'damnation,' or the 'second death' on the other, then the hypothesis of a conditional immortality finds no support from the doctrine of conditional life and death."

Stripped of verbiage, the question stands thus: Are the terms "life" and "death," in the texts cited by Prof. M., to be construed literally, or metaphorically? As it is admitted that "the whole controversy turns upon the settlement of this question," we are glad to devote time and space to its consideration. And first: the law of interpretation requires us take words in their most obvious sense, unless we can show cause for another construction. Above all other books, the Bible requires this rule, as it treats of the most momentous themes. If any one, therefore, will give a metaphorical meaning to a word, on him lies the burden of proof. The Professor appears to appreciate this principle. He says:

The considerations are five, and we reproduce them in order.

I. In metaphorical language we call one object or quality or event by the name of another, on account of the resemblance between the two. Thus Christ is a "rock" a "vine," a "lamb," &c. And as the elements of language are derived from things terrestial and visible, all ideas in regard to the spiritual and unseen world must needs be conveyed to us in terms first employed in reference to things temporal and material. Hence it is that heaven itself is described as a "city" and "country," and even the soul of man can find no more etherial word with which to clothe itself, than that which represents the intangible and invisible atmosphere.

And so in regard to the terms "life" and "death," when used to indicate rewards and punishments. As life is the most precious boon known to mortals here, it is employed in the Scriptures to represent the inestimable blessings which God has in reserve for the righteous; and as death is regarded as the most dreaded of all earthly calamities to the body, it is employed to represent the great calamity to the soul in a coming life—its banishment from God's presence forever.

It will be readily perceived that the first "consideration" does not touch the point. The Professor gives a metaphorical interpretation, but does not give any reason for doing so. "That the terms referred to are used metaphorically is" not "obvious" thus far. Try again, Professor!

II. If the term "life," when employed as above stated, means simple existence, and "death" non-existence, then the Scriptures should never employ any terms or phrases, when speaking of the results of faith or unbelief in this life, other than such as convey this meaning, and may be substituted by the term immortal on the one hand and annihilation on the other. But such is not the fact. "He that believeth not, shall be damned," said Christ. Now who will affirm that the damnation here spoken of is not the final reward of unbelief, or that it does not distinctly import a malediction resting upon a still living soul? Will it do to render the sentence, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be immortal, and he that believeth not, shall be annihilated?" Every one can see, by this experiment, that the words "saved" and "damned" are not used in the sense of made immortal and annihilated; and consequently that such do not constitute the reward and penalty of unbelief, or of a life of sin.

The Professor does not give the exact literal meaning of "life." "Simple existence" will not do. "Living existence" would be better. A rock exists but does not live. "Whatever is, exists." Worcester. Life is "the state of living or of being alive." Worcester. In like manner, "non-existence" is not the definition of "death." A horse may be dead, and yet exist. We say a "dead horse," by which we mean a horse which has ceased to have a living existence; but a long time may elapse ere we can properly say that the horse no longer exists. "Death" is the "extinction of life." Worcester.

The Professor asserts that if the terms "life" and "death" in the texts quoted, have their literal meaning, "then the Scriptures should never employ any terms or phrases, when speaking of the results of faith or unbelief in this life, other than such as convey this meaning." But no reason is given for the assertion. As it stands it is not correct. We can show this by taking the word "damnation" as quoted by the Professor. He wishes to force us to substitute "annihilation," or—to keep to the point—"death" for "damnation." To show the absurdity of this argument, let us substitute the Professor's interpretation of "death" for "damnation." "Will it do to render the sentence, 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be delivered from spiritual death, and he that believeth not, shall be punished with everlasting misery?'" The Professor would say that he acepts this. But does the word "damnation" have any such such meaning? We answer, nay. Let us have the definition. The verb "damn" in Worcester has the following deffinition: "1. To condemn; to judge to be guilty. 2. To sentence to punishment. 3. (Theol.) To doom to eternal punishment; to sentence to the torments of hell. 4. To censure or condemn, by hooting, hissing, or by any other tokens of disapprobation." Here we have the clearest distinction made between "damnation" and the penalty proper. In the third, or "theological" definition, the damnation is one thing, and the punishment is another. "To doom to punishment" is not synonymous with "To punish." "To sentence to the torments of hell" is not equivalent with "To suffer the torments of hell." So, on the other hand, taking our view of the consequence of sin, we make a clear distinction between "damnation" and annihilation." "To damn" is "to condemn" not "to punish." He that is "condemned" will be annihilated in consequence of the damnation. The fact is, our Professor is miscalled. He has not yet acquired the definition of the simplest words. He cannot distinguish between condemnation and punishment, between the sentence and its execution.

Now if he had said that "the Scriptures should never employ any terms or phrases other than such" as suit with our understanding of "life" and "death," we should agree. But to demand that every expression should "convey" the same exact sense is ridiculous.

The sinner must be damned or condemned before the penalty is executed; how, then, can the damnation be the exact equivalent of the penalty, so that the words may be interchanged, as the Professor would have it? "Damnation" is "the result of unbelief" and so is the penalty proper.

The Professor asks,—"Who will affirm that the damnation here spoken of is not the final reward of unbelief?" We "will affirm" it; and when he sees that damnation and punishment convey a different meaning one from the other, he will be glad to "affirm" the same thing. The text reads: "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned." Mark xvi. 16. In harmony with the literal sense of "life" and "death," the meaning is that the believer shall be saved from death, from destruction, from annihilation, but that the unbeliever shall be condemned to death, to destruction, to annihilation. Salvation from death implies a consequent immortality, while damnation to death implies a consequent extinction.

The second "consideration" of the Professor is thus disposed of. The principle he announces is incorrect, and the text he quotes fails to assist him. That "life" and "death" "are used metaphorically is" no more "obvious from" consideration No. 2 than from No. 1. Try again!

III. If the final "death" of the sinner were annihilation, then every description of that death should indicate not only freedom from all suffering for ever, but the termination of all existence. It would be as misleading to employ terms and figures and parables conveying an idea of suffering beyond the day of judgment, as it would to speak of our suffering ages before we had existence. But what are the facts? When the righteous enter "life eternal" the wicked "go away into everlasting punishment." Can that mean annihilation? And if so, how is it "everlasting?" How is it, if the wicked go out of being, that "their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched?" How is it that we hear the voice of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth from souls that have been stricken out of existence?

We admit the justice of the Professor's two propositions. "But what are the facts?" Has he produced anything out of harmony with the propositions? He refers to the phrase "everlasting punishment," and asks if that is "annihilation." Let Paul answer: "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction." 2 Thess. i. 9. "Can that mean annihilation?" Let us appeal again to Worcester. "Annihilation, state of being annihilated; destruction." "And if so," says the Professor, "how is it 'everlasting?'" We answer thus: If a man dies and never lives again, is it not everlasting death, everlasting destruction, everlasting annihilation? And if this death comes as a penalty or punishment is it not "everlasting punishment?" Prof. M. quotes Luther Lee with approval. Perhaps he will allow Mr. Lee to explain this point. "Now should you resort to annihilation in your last fit of desperation, to avoid the conclusion in favor of endless misery, you would thereby defeat your own theory, and award me the argument on the question, as annihilation would be endless punishment." "The term in the question is 'punishment,' not misery; and annihilation, when contrasted with endless happiness, would be endless punishment, though not endless misery. Luther Lee to A. C. Thomas, Letter No. 39.

"How is it, if the wicked go out of being, that 'their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched?'" If the Professor had given heed to past expositions of this phrase, we should not have to repeat a thing so easily harmonized with the doctrine that "the wicked go out of being." Where, we ask, are the wicked, when their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched? The record says in "hell"— literally gehenna. This word is a corruption of Ge Hinnom—Ge means valley and Hinnom is a man's name. Hence the word translated "hell" in connection with the phraseology referred to, signifies VALLEY OF HINNOM. This valley is first spoken of in the book of Joshua xv. 8. "And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem: and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants [Rephaim] northward." See also Josh. xvii. 16. Now, Professor, take your map of Jerusalem, and look on the south side, and there you will see this valley of Hinnom—Ge Hinnom—Gehenna. Perhaps your fancied hell is like your fancied heaven.

"Beyond the bounds of time and space."

As a preacher once said, "Somewhere outside of God's creation." But the real hell or gehenna is on the south side of Jerusalem.

When Judah went into idolatry they erected "the high places of Tophet" in the valley of Hinnom, where "they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, and shed innocent blood, the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan. Ps. cvi. 37, 38. "For the children of Judah have done evil in my sight, saith YAHVEH....they have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire." Jer. vii. 30, 31. When the good Josiah came to the throne, "he defiled Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech." 2 Kings xxiii. 10.

By the building of Tophet, the valley came to be called, and this name was used interchangeably with—valley of Hinnom. Jer. xix. 6. "After the return from the captivity, the Jews resumed the ancient name for the whole valley, viz., the valley of Hinnom, called in our Lord's time by the Greek name Ge Hinnom, by corruption gehenna; and in order to perpetuate the disgrace of idolatry, they made it the common receptacle of the filth &c. of the city, in which fires were continually kept burning, to consume the carcases of animals, executed criminals, &c., the unconsumed portions of which, as well as the offscouring in general, became the nidus of insects, whose larvæ, or 'worms' revelled in the corruption." Kitto's Cycl. Bib. Lit. Article Tophet.

Here we have the origin of the phrase "their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." The worms in the valley lived on the nutriment given them, and as it was continually supplied, they died not. And the fire in the valley, instead of being quenched, consumed that which fed it. The phrase could not be a symbol of the tortures of living beings, for everything put in the valley was dead before it was put there. Hence, Isaiah, in speaking of the fate of such as are destroyed at the second Advent, says that the living "shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched." Isa. lxvi. 24. Thus, the phrase, instead of importing the torment of living beings, is an effective symbol of UTTER DESTRUCTION. Even Richard Watson, the Methodist theologian, says: "As the worm itself dies not, but destroys that it feeds upon, and as a fire unquenched consumes that upon which it kindles, so when temporal judgments are expressed by this phrase, the utter destruction of persons, cities, and nations appears to be intended." Mr. Watson holds that in relation to destructible material, the phrase teaches destruction. As we claim that man is a destructible or perishable being, our Professor will have to allow that the harmony is unbroken by his question. The Professor's last query under the third head is, "How is it that we hear the voice of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth from souls that have been stricken out of existence?" Prof. M. assumes that when this wailing is heard the ungodly have already experienced the penalty, but the assumption is unnecessary. The expressions agree with our belief. When Christ comes, ungodly living souls will weep and wail as they see the arm of destruction bared; but when the blow comes it will crush them into nothingness.

The Professor's third "consideration" is as futile as the first two. "That the terms 'life' and 'death' in the texts referred to, are used metaphorically, is" not "obvious" as yet. Try again, O wise Professor!

IV. If it had been the design of Christ and his apostles to teach that the penalty of sin is annihilation, while continued being was the reward of piety, a doctrine of so much importance would not have been confined to the terms life and death, (which have never been understood to imply simple existence and non-existence, except by the Deist and the unenlightened heathen) but would have been expressed in other words, as the true sense of these terms now is.

The righteous are to "inherit the kingdom"—to "sit down in the kingdom of God"—to walk with Christ in white, etc., all the elements of salvation and results of saving faith in Christ; but by no terms or figures is the idea ever conveyed that their salvation consists either wholly or in part in deliverance from annihilation. They praise God that their robes have been washed, and made white in the blood of the Lamb; that is, that they have been fitted for a blissful eternity; but never for release from utter extinction. No such danger ever threatened them, and they praise God and the Lamb for no such deliverance.

And aside from the terms "die" and "death," neither of which imply annihilation, there is not a warning or admonition in all the Bible that enforces faith in Christ by the threat of annihilation. The appeal is always to the more terrible and consequently more potent consideration of endless banishment from God, and from the glory of his power.

We demur to the first paragraph above. We deny that the "terms 'life' and 'death' have never been understood to imply simple existence and non-existence, except by the Deist and the unenlightened heathen;" and our denial is as valid as the Professor's affirmation, for he gives no proof. But the Professor has laid a trap for himself. He admits that "the unenlightened heathen understood the terms to imply simply existence and non-existence." Hence the use of these terms by "Christ and his apostles" among the unenlightened heathen would "teach the penalty of sin is annihilation, while continued being is the reward of piety." Now, we know that the Gospel was exactly adapted to the Gentiles, and the great apostle Paul was especially blessed in proclaiming the truth to these very "unenlightened heathen." It was to the Romans—Gentiles—that he said, "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." According to the Professor's admission this language would be literally taken. And the gospel of John, from whence the Professor selected his texts at the outset, was "written at Ephesus, among the "unenlightened heathen." And the great majority of those who have since had the Gospel were in a heathenish and unenlightened condition. So that the literality of "life" and "death" is vindicated, instead of nullified, by the Professor's statement.

The second paragraph exceeds the first in the magnitude of its assumption. "By no terms or figures" says the Professor, "is the idea ever conveyed that their salvation consists either wholly or in part in deliverance from annihilation." Now, this is the exact question under dispute. We claim that the terms "life" and "death" convey the very thing which the Professor denies. He has set out to show that these expressions are to be taken in a metaphorical sense. He has reached his fourth "consideration" and has not yet produced an iota of evidence in proof. And now he begs the whole question, by assuming as a fact what he has offered to prove. We accommodate ourselves to this queer kind of reasoning by repeating the texts. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii. 14–16. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: but he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." V. 36. "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi. 23. Now, Professor, here are your texts. Where is the evidence that they are "metaphorical?" We might quote many more just like them; but until you dispose of these, any more would encumber the field of dispute. These texts, Professor, in the absence of counter-testimony, prove to a demonstration that the "salvation of the righteous consists in deliverance from annihilation.'"

The Professor, in further speaking of the saints, says that "they praise God that their robes have been washed, and made white in the blood of the Lamb; but never for release from utter extinction. No such danger ever threatened them, and they praise God and the Lamb for no such deliverance." Let us turn to the record and see. "When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But THANKS BE TO GOD, who giveth us the VICTORY through our Lord Jesus Christ." 1 Cor. xv. 54–57. Does not this look something like praising God for "deliverance" from "utter extinction?" And if the Professor will read the next verse he will see that this very deliverance is the reward for their work in the Lord.

The third paragraph opens with a repetition of the usual assumption. "Neither 'die' nor 'death' implies annihilation." How singular that the Professor cannot perceive that that is the point to be proved! Aside from these terms, says the Professor, "there is not a warning or admonition in all the Bible that enforces faith in Christ by the threat of annihilation." The following expressions of Paul will serve as ensamples of the teachings of "all the Bible," and as proofs of the Professor's ignorance of Scripture. "Vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." Rom. ix. 22. "The preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness." 1 Cor. i. 18. "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." iii. 17. "He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi. 8. "Enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is destruction." Phil. iii. 19. "And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish." 2 Thess. ii. 10.

"The appeal," says the Professor, "is always to the more terrible and consequently more potent consideration of endless banishment from God, and from the glory of his power." The Professor's language suggests a solitary text, although he multiplies it indefinitely by the adverb "always." "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." 2 Thess. i. 7–9. So, the Professor's "endless banishment" is Paul's "everlasting destruction." Yes, the ungodly are banished, because they are extinguished.

Consideration No. IV, like its predecessor, fails to make "obvious" the "metaphorical" construction of "life" and "death." Try again!

V. Those who insist that the term "death" as applied to the sinner in a future state, implies annihilation, ought to be able to show that such is its meaning when applied to man in this world; that is, that when a wicked man, at least, dies in this world he ceases to exist. But instead of this Mr. Hudson admits that his soul lives on for ages, though in the language of earth he is dead. If, then, the term does not imply non-existence in its original application, by what stretch of interpretation is it made to signify extinction of being in another life?

The very thing which the Professor thinks ought to be insisted upon by those who take the "death" of the sinner in its literal import, we, the supporters of the Herald of Life, DO teach. We admit the absurdity of Mr. Hudson's teachings in relation to this point. We also admit that all who hold that the penalty is literal death, and yet advocate the resurrection of wicked men are as absurd, illogical, and indefensible as the Professor himself—and more so. But is it not strange that the Professor should make the untenableness of another theory a proof of his own. Suppose that all "annihilationists" believed in the revival of the wicked, would that help the Professor? Are other men's blunders his proofs. The question is, Are the terms "life" and "death" to be metaphorically interpreted? Prof. M. has agreed that "the whole controversy turns upon the settlement of this question." He accepts the burden of proof. He brings his five propositions that the terms are metaphorically used. And here they are.

My doctrine stands only on the metaphorical interpretation of the terms "life" and "death."

These terms are metaphorically employed to mean such and such things.

Therefore "life" and "death" have a metaphorical construction.

My doctrine stands on the metaphorical use, &c.

Damnation means Penalty.

Therefore "life" and "death" are metaphors.

3.

My doctrine stands on the metaphorical use &c.

But I can't understand how certain texts are harmonized with the literal use.

Therefore "life" and "death" are metaphors.

My doctrine stands on the metaphorical use, &c.

But "life" and "death" have a metaphorical use.

Therefore "life" and "death" are metaphors.

My doctrine stands on the metaphorical use, &c.

But Mr. Hudson is not consistent.

Therefore "life" and "death" are metaphors.

Has anything been proved? Yes; and we state it thus:

Prof. M. admits that if "life" and "death" have their literal meaning in John iii. 16, 36, and Rom. vi. 23, then the question is settled that men are not immortal by nature, but that immortality is a privilege, to be secured by faith.

But Prof. M. has failed to show that terms spoken of are not to be literally understood.

Therefore, as far as the arguments of Prof. is concerned, the question is settled that Immortality is the gift of God, through faith in Jesus Christ our Lord.

More Wrong Impressions.

We regret to find it necessary to speak again on the subject of "wrong impressions;" but we presume all will be pleased to have the rough made smooth, as far as practicable; and the crooked made straight.

In Br. Wendell's "remarks" on our article in the HERALD of Nov. 2, when speaking of the "Circular Letter," he says:

"That document, to my apprehension, means nothing at all, if it does not mean to put the foot of the A. C. Association upon the neck of every preacher who rejects the reliving of the wicked dead. (Its publication to the world is quite consistently followed by the refusal of the Crisis to publish any longer the appointments of such preachers.) What has the Editor of the Crisis to say to this business?"

"The Editor of the Crisis" would simply say that he thinks Br. W. has "a wrong impression" about this matter. He understood the "Circular Letter" was introduced for the sole purpose of producing a kind and tolerant feeling in all minds relative to points of difference, and to promote a general and harmonious action, on points of agreement, at our great annual gatherings at Wilbraham, and elsewhere as far as practicable.

Again, "the Editor of the Crisis" would say that Br. Wendell has "a wrong impression" relative to "the refusal of the Crisis to publish any longer the appointments of such preachers" as believe in the non-resurrection of the wicked.

Again, "the Editor of the Crisis" would say that Br. W. is under "a wrong impression" when he intimates that he is now "indorsing a policy that a few years ago he would have spurned."

Br. W. wishes "the Editor of the Crisis" to inform him "whether it was not a piece of downright impertinence for the Association to legislate a creed for others?" Most certainly, if it did any such thing. But on this point, "the Editor" thinks that Br. W. has another very "wrong impression," as every such act was utterly repudiated by the Association, and "the Editor of the Crisis."

Lastly, Br. W. inquires if the Association was "within the sphere of its legitimate work," when it "concerned itself with the matter of appointing a campmeeting committee?"

We think our brother is laboring under an another "wrong impression" on this point. The Association did not appoint any campmeeting committee. It has been the practice for the preachers to appoint the campmeeting committee; but it was thought to be more democratic for the campmeeting, as a whole, to appoint the committee. Although the Association was composed not only of preachers, but many delegates from various churches, and hence better qualified to choose "a campmeeting committee," than the preachers alone, yet all it did was simply to nominate a committee to be chosen or rejected by the entire encampment. MILES GRANT.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

When the foregoing was received from Br. Grant, in Nov. last, the EDITOR of the Herald of Life was of the opinion that no useful end would be served by its publication. As, however, Br. G. thinks it ought to be inserted even at this late day, it is now permitted to appear. I shall dismiss the matter with a few brief remarks.

The merits of the "Circular Letter" I have no wish to discuss. What I meant by calling it a "creed," in my former response to Br. G., will be sufficiently apparent to any who noticed its enumeration of doctrines which must be held by those whom the Advent Christian Association would countenance at camp-meetings and by the churches at large. Br. G.'s explicit disclaimer satisfies me that it did not in his mind bear the character of a creed.

Br. G.'s interpretation of the "Circular Letter," as being not hostile to those holding the non-living of the wicked, I believe to be entirely sincere; and it is creditable to his head that he can not conscientously reject the view which was taken of the matter by myself and many others. Considering the intelligent authorship of the document in question, I hazard nothing in saying that the writer of it, if it was his "sole purpose" to produce "a kind and tolerant feeling in all minds," was remarkably infelicitous in his choice of phraseology.

Regarding the apppointment of the campmeeting committee at Wilbraham, Br. G.'s statement shows I was quite correct in saying that the A. C. A. "concerned itself" with the matter. My opinion that it should not in any way have done this remains unchanged. "Simply to nominate" happened to be a work which the Life and Advent Union preachers had as good a right to take part in as those of the A. C. A.; but this right they could not exercise in a body of which they were not members. This obvious fact is enough to sustain the charge against the Association implied in my former response to Br. Grant.

What I said about the non-publication of our appointments in the Crisis, ought some time ago to have been supplememted by another statement of a more favorable character. In the absence of Br. G., last fall, my own appointment had been suppressed by the Business Agent of the Crisis, and I was informed that this was to be the standing arrangement for the future. All this was without the knowledge or approval of the Editor of the Crisis, who, on his return home, made haste to restore the former order of things. It was due to Br. Grant that I should long ago have acquainted our readers with these facts. I have personally apologized to him for the delay; I at no time intended to wholly neglect the matter. RUFUS WENDELL.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

MASON CO., ILL, JAN., 1865.

BR. STORRS:—We are still battling for truth on either side the river; now in Mason Co., and then in good old Fulton Co. We have plenty of work and best of pay (not "Greenbacks," although we get enough of them) in conversion of souls (persons). Glory to God, the good work is progressing. Not a few have repented of their sins and are rejoicing in the blessed hope. Some cold-hearted backsliders, that had not been to meeting to hear preaching in six or eight years, have returned unto the Lord, and are serving Him with all their house: and all this from preaching the whole truth of the Bible; no resurrection to the wicked dead; no excitement; but the sober second thought. We have proved, to a demonstration, that being born of water and of the Spirit, is, first, the natural birth; and second, the resurrection birth, John iii. 5; and 1 John v. 6; showing, also, unless we are sealed with the Holy Spirit of God there will be no such thing as a resurrection birth from the dead. See Eph. iv. 30, and i. 13. See also 2 Corth. i. 22; and that the one baptism is that of the Spirit, and not of water; consequently the sealing Spirit. See 1 Corth. xii. 13. Glory to God, if we can feel satisfied they are in Christ by the sealing of the Spirit, we care but little about water. All is going right here. We are able to meet our enemies, although they squirm hard. Pray for the old one armed preacher. If you send any thing, direct to Otto, Fulton Co., Ills.

ELD. THOS. W. SMITH writes from Otisville, Wright Co., Iowa, Jan. 17, 1865:—I have cheering news for you. On my return from Story and Hamilton Cos., I found several of our most intelligent Brethren and Sisters rejoicing in the consolation of the doctrine of Life only in Christ. They say "The scheme of redemption looks plainer; the Bible more harmonious; God's character unsullied." A vacuum has been filled that nothing else could fill. One of these brethren is an Elder and a Preacher. The other Elder has been a believer, for years, in no future life for the wicked. Over half of the Church now reject a future life torment for the wicked; indeed, nearly all, as I can number 21 out of 23. The truth has taken deep root in every place where I have labored; it is truly progressing. I feel confident that the gospel of the kingdom is complete with the re-living of the wicked left out. I enjoyed much freedom in preaching on my tour, and great peace of mind. It is best, however, not to say much of our efforts, as some thereby forget to ascribe the glory to God. As ever, yours, in hope of life.

[In a previous private letter Br. Smith said, "I have as much as I can do, the calls for labor are so numerous. I wish we had some help." If we cannot send laborers into the western region, let us give Br. Smith some relief by giving him the means for traveling. Let us raise the fund for a horse to $100 at once. Three brethren in this section have given $5 each, and we presume they feel as if they had "lent it to the Lord," and have taken Him for paymaster. Are there not 17 more that are willing to take the same amount each? Will they be any poorer for it? We think not. Those who sow sparingly will also reap sparingly. We profess to love the truth of "No life out of Christ," and have been praying the LORD to raise up laborers, and some have risen up almost unlooked for, and just where they were needed. Shall we not add works to our faith, and thus demonstrate that our prayers were sincere, and thereby strengthen our faith? The West must be cultivated as well as the East. There are a plenty there, as well as here, who would be glad to cripple our efforts on the life-theme. Let such as are willing to work, who are already in the west, be sustained and helped onward. "The end of all things is at hand"—let us "work while it is day; for the night cometh in which no man can work."]

Obituary.

BR. SILAS WINCHESTER, of Salem, Mass., died at the rebel hospital at Florence, S. C., Oct. 19, 1864, aged 27 years.

In Nov., 1861, Br. W enlisted for three years as a private in the Mass. 23d Reg., and was made a Corporal in his company about a year later. He re-enlisted in Dec., 1863, and visited home on a furlough in January, 1864, remaining a little over a month. On the 16th of May last he was taken prisoner by the rebels at Drury's Bluff and taken to Libby prison, whence, two days afterwards, he wrote his wife informing her of his capture. From Libby prison to Belle Isle, thence to Andersonville, thence to Charleston, and lastly to Florence—tells the story of his movements as a prisoner. From information received, it cannot be doubted that our brother endured his full share of the fearful hardships so common in the fate of those Union soldiers who fall into rebel hands as prisoners. When exposure and starvation had done their work for five months, a chronic-diarrhea attack of only two days sufficed to carry him to the grave.

Besides many friends, Br. W. has left an affectionate wife and child to mourn his loss. Not until in December did Sr. W. receive tidings of her sad bereavement; and it was quite late in the month before such confirmation of the event was received as rendered it unquestionable. Our sister sorrows not without hope. It is the testimony of one who served with Br. W. in the ranks, that his fidelity to his Christian principles commanded the respect of all who knew him.* Though I have had some correspondence with our brother, it was not my privilege to know him personally. Those who know the exercises of his mind say that he entered his country's service from a conviction of duty. It was his firm faith that the war would result in the complete overthrow of the accursed institution of slavery. He delighted to correspond with his Christian friends, and often in his letters gave utterance to his hope that he might be spared to return home when peace should be restored. On the 8th of last June he wrote his wife a letter from Andersonville prison, which only came to hand a few days ago, being more than seven months in reaching its destination. May the hope of the Gospel abundantly sustain our brother's sorrowing companion. R. W.

* At the last prayer meeting Br. W. attended while home on furlough a year ago he spoke with emotion of the possibility that he might die while in the military service, and of his trust that, in any event, whether living or dying, he would be the Lord's.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in pa per covers only. Postage 6 cents.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not; he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, is intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousands more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

THE WORLD TO COME.

BY T. P. LEWIS.

(TUNE—"Jamie's on the stormy sea.)

"Sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—Isa. xxxv. 10.

World of worlds where no more sorrow
Dims the prospect of to-morrow;
World where none can trouble borrow—
World so free from noise and strife,
World where sickness enters never,
Where no pangs the heart can sever,
World where all shall live forever,
World where blooms eternal life.

In that world there's no more dying,
No repining, no more sighing,
No more anguish, no more crying,
All of these have passed away.
Those who here have sadly parted,
Sighed farewell while tears have started,
Round the world all broken hearted,
Hail the dawn of that glad day.

No more clouds obscure the vision—
No more scoffers make derision—
Fields of light and pure elysian—
Paradise breaks to our view.
Hearts that once by anguish riven,
To desponding thoughts were given,
Tune aloud their harps in heaven,
To glad notes for ever new.

World to come! O world of pleasure!
Where the holy lay their treasure—
World where none their joy can measure—
Long the pilgrim's joyous theme.
Where the ransomed throng are seated,
Round the throne with hopes completed,
I, with those I oft have greeted,
Fain would share thy joys supreme.

DEATH OF CHRIST AND ITS RESULTS.

In what respect and to what extent did the death and resurrection of Christ affect the human family?

That there are two phases or results growing out of the atonement is, we think, evident from many passages of Scripture. For instance, the apostle remarks, "For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."

There are two things suggested in this passage, a reconciliation and a salvation. The first resulting from the death of Christ; the second from his life; this, the fruit of his resurrection; that, of his sacrifice. He died for the ungodly; and by this means, "commended his love toward us," even in our sinful state, or while we were yet sinners; but by his blood, or faith in his blood, we "are justified from all things, from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses."

The apostle does not, in the foregoing passage, affirm that we are saved by the death of Christ; for that would hardly be correct; but that we are "saved by his life." "Because I live, ye shall live also."

What then is this reconciliation, of which the apostle speaks, which results from the death of Christ? It evidently has not the sense of the term justification. The former meaning simply the renewal of friendship of parties who had been at variance; while the latter involves the idea of pardon, absolution, acquittance from guilt and merited punishment.

Now reconciliation may take place between parties at variance, if the party at fault makes suitable amends; or, if not so, then by the intervention of a third party who, by some act or method, removes the cause or causes of variance. In man's case, it was the latter. Man, himself, had no power to do this; hence the apostle, "For when we were without strength.... Christ died for the ungodly." It was not possible for man, poor fallen man, to remove the cause of variance which existed between himself and his God. He was an enemy to his maker, and could only be reconciled by the death of the Son of God, an event, entirely outside of himself, devolving exclusively upon Christ.

This reconciliation was necessary in order to salvation. It paved the way for it, without which it could not be realized. The parties must be reconciled before they would or could enter into the contract—a new contract. The first contract had been made void, had been broken. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Thus it was that the friendship heretofore existing between God and man, was broken off. Man became an enemy to God, broke the conditions of the primeval covenant, and rendered himself obnoxious to the penalty of God's law. Man was first in the fault, had nothing to offer, neither merit nor riches—had forfeited all: how then could he be reconciled? Not by anything he could do. He was in debt, and had nothing to pay; he was bankrupt, and hence entirely at the mercy of his creditor. His creditor had the right and might exercise the power of pardon if he chose. It was optional with him as to whether it should be done. In doing it he might impose conditions or not at his pleasure, conditions few or many, hard or easy, great or small.

Now what did he do? He permitted his Son to step in and die for or on account of man's sin, and by this means he does, conditionally, break up, reverse, or render void, the otherwise inevitable result growing out of the infliction of the penalty of God's prime law—that of perishing. Man would have had no subsequent existence but for the death of Christ; whose death does not save man from dying, but from perishing in the corruption of death. God does not, therefore, make void the penalty; but he recalls, holds back, arrests the result, on condition that man does not a second time revolt against his government. In case he rebels during his second probation, the results follow the penalty—he perishes in death— the "wrath of God abideth on him."

From what has been said we infer the following facts:

1. That by the death of Christ the world is reconciled to God.

2. That reconciliation—in this case—refers to a renewal of friendship—a kindly regard which God exercises toward the human race.

3. That this reconciliation is effected exclusively by the death of the Saviour.

4. That it resulted in releasing mankind from the otherwise inevitable results of the infliction of the penalty of God's law—that of perishing.

5. That this exemption from the aforesaid results, rested upon the following conditions: (1.) The death of Christ. (2.) His resurrection. (3.) A conformity—so far as lay in his power—of man to the divine will. Including all in this exemption who do not deliberately and persistently violate the known will of God, whether children or heathen; and excluding all who break the law of God, whether it consists in the violation of revealed law or the light or law of nature.

6. That prime transgression is not forgiven or pardoned, is seen in the fact that death "has passed upon all men." That "it is appointed unto man once to die." This is the penalty inflicted because of his transgression. But God promises, conditionally, to relieve or save him from perishing in death. What then is this condition upon which turns a matter of such infinite moment? It is this, simply this, that he should not again rebel against the divine government.

Now, this does not refer to children who have not come to the years of discretion, because they can neither do good nor evil; nor does it refer to that part of the heathen world who, though they have not the (revealed) law, yet "do by nature the things contained in the law;" nor yet to believers, who, through repentance and faith, and the advocacy of the Redeemer, receive a pardon of their sins; but to that part of mankind who, by reason of persistent transgression, are by the Scriptures pronounced rebels against the government of God.

7. Hence it is, that the justification of which the apostle speaks, is a state or condition growing out of the pardon of sins—or the personal acts of individuals; and is applicable to none but believers. It is the justification of faith or grace conditional in two principles—belief in Christ, and conformity to his will; neither of which can be affirmed of children or heathen who have not heard of Christ —the former being prevented through the want of mental ability; the latter, from the lack of intellectual culture.

8. We see how the argument of the apostle on the subject of justification by faith applies to those only who, "by reason of use, have their senses exercised to disern both good and evil;" who have became loyal to God. While they "were yet sinners Christ died" for them, but now, "being justified by his blood" they are "saved from wrath through him." When they were enemies, they "were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled" they "shall be saved by his life." They are those who "receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," and are to "reign in life by one, Jesus Christ."

How clear from the foregoing facts is the declaration of the apostle, "Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." His death was for the benefit of the race, for every son and daughter of Adam who fell under the power of a broken law. He did not cancel the original guilt, otherwise they would not have died: but lengthening out their lives, and favoring them with another probation, he assures them that they shall be redeemed from death if not found guilty of rebelling a second time against the divine government. That if they believe they shall not perish. The meaning therefore of the phrase, "come upon all men to justification of life," is this: God has, by the death of his Son, opened up a way by which all may be saved. The sacrifice or death of Christ is God's gift. Suppose some will not accept the offered help, will God thrust it upon them? Christ died not only that all mankind might be raised from the dead, but that they might be eternally happy; but will they be happy irrespective of moral character? No more will they be raised from the dead without it. This last remark does not refer to children, but to the world of mankind, who, by reason of persistent transgression, have forfeited all right to a second life, and hence they perish.

He is the Saviour of all men; not because he saves them from dying, nor yet because he saves them from sinning; but because he is the one who has instituted the methods of salvation, or worked out the plan that was instituted by the Father. He has opened a door of hope, has set the table and invited all to come and eat. He hath said, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth." Why does he do this? Because he is the Saviour of all men. He "will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." But while he wills, is it certain that they will come? Nay, is it not certain that many will not come? "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." The spirit of rebellion is within them. Their names are written in the earth. Let them never "see the light," but consume in the grave for ever.

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

BY CHARLES C. TUCK.

In my former article on this subject, I endeavored to show that that tribulation was upon the Jewish people, during the seven years war between the Jews and Romans, and not upon the Christian church during the papal persecution. I showed that the tribulation was at the time when, according to the teaching of Christ, the "abomination of desolation should stand in the holy place." I also referred to, and examined some portions of the prophecy of Daniel, concerning the "daily sacrifice," and the "abomination that maketh desolate," and found that the power that took away the "daily sacrifice," or, in other words, "caused the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," was the same power that "placed the abomination that maketh desolate;" and that power was the Roman civil power. Therefore, when Christ spoke of the "abomination of desolation" standing "in the holy place," and admonished those who were in Judea, who should witness that event, to flee to the mountains, he evidently referred to the time spoken of in Matthew xxiv. 2 verse, when there should not be left "one stone upon another" which should not be "thrown down." See also the parallel passages in Mark and Luke.

My object in speaking of this subject is not for the purpose of controversy, but for the sake of truth. For this I would gladly sacrifice everything else. It matters not what the consequences of embracing truth may be; I leave that matter in the hands of the Lord. It is enough for me to believe and obey.

Owing to circumstances, I was unable, in my former article, to notice many points connected with the tribulation, which are very important ones to be considered. For this reason I refer to the subject again. Even now, I shall probably fall short of doing the subject full justice. The first point I will notice is that concerning the shortening of "those days."

In verse 15, Christ says: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand.)" He then says, verses 16–22, "Then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains; let him which is on the house-top not come down to take any thing out of his house; neither let him which is in the field return bach to take his clothes. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days; but pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath day; for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time; no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened."

Christ does not specify, nor intimate, any particular number of days which were to be shortened, but merely says "those days (of tribulation) shall be shortened." If we trace the expression "abomination of desolation" back to the book of Danied, we find that in no case is it used in connection with either 1260 or 1290 days of persecution by the "little horn" power; but is used in connection with the Roman civil power, in its work of desolation upon the Jewish nation. Therefore the idea that Christ referred to 1290 days of papal persecution, when he said those days of tribulation should be shortened, is a mere assumption.

The expression, "there should no flesh be saved," certainly means that if those days of tribulation had not been shortened, all flesh would have perished in the tribulation, whether it comprises only the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, or the papal persecution universally; and it certainly could not have comprised the latter, for (allowing that it did, and those days had not been shortened) none but Christions would have been its victims: and Christians can no more be comprehended in the expression "no flesh" than can the rest of mankind. But when we apply the tribulation where it belongs, and where Christ placed it, everything is harmonious; for we then see that if the tribulation on Jerusalem had not been shortened, "no flesh" in that city would have been saved from the impending destruction. "But for the elect's sake" the tribulation was shortened. It appears that although the Christians fled, when they saw the "abomination of desolation stand in the holy place," there were still some left whom God foresaw were his elect, and therefore, in order that they might not be destroyed with the wicked Jews, the siege was brought to an end.

Another point which I wish to notice is the expression "immediately after the tribulation of those days," which is found in verse 29. This is thought to be a great objection in the way of applying the tribulation to the destruction of Jerusalem, because Christ said "immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c.; and therefore it is said, it could not apply there, for the sun was not darkened for many hundred years after the destruction of Jerusalem. That little word "immediately" is thus given more weight by some, than all the rest of the testimony of Christ in the matter, to say nothing about the testimony of Daniel the prophet. I do not think it was necessary for the sun to be darkened the next year after the tribulation, nor within hundreds of years after, in order to have it called by Christ immediately after; because "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

In Rev., xxii. 7, 12, 20, Christ is represented as saying, after showing John the glory of the new Jerusalem, "Behold I come quickly;" and yet his coming will be many hundreds of years after he uttered those words. Nevertheless, he said it would be QUICKLY, and therefore I let it be so. He also said that the sun should be darkened "immediately after" the great tribulation at Jerusalem; and although hundreds of years elapsed after the tribulation, before the sun was darkened, yet he called it immediately after, and therefore I believe.

Bangor, Me., Jan. 15, 1865.

JERUSALEM AND THE JUDGMENT.

"Run speak to this young man saying, Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein; for I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her." Zech. ii. 4, 5.

When will this splendid prediction be fulfilled? Let us compare spiritual things with spiritual. Rev. xxi. 23. The CITY had no need of the sun neither the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it. The throne of God is to be in the midst of the city. Rev. xxii. 3. The ancient city was walled about; but of this city it is said, that God shall be a wall of fire round about it. Gog and Magog are represented as saying, Ezek. xxxviii. 11, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages. John said, Rev. xx. 9, They (Gog and Magog) compassed the camp of the saints about, and God's wall of fire came down and devoured them. Ezek. xxxviii. 18—23, It shall come to pass at the same time when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face.... surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel, so that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heavens, and the beasts of the fields, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth shall shake at my presence, and the mountains shall be thrown down (Zech. xiv. 4,) and the steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground; and I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountain, saith the Lord God, every man's sword shall be against his brother; and I will plead against him (Gog) with pestilence, (Zech. xiv. 12), and with blood; and I will rain upon him and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone; thus will I magnify myself and sanctify myself, and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they (the nations) shall know that I am the Lord. Isa. lxvi. 15, 16, 18, For behold the Lord will come with fire and with his chariots, like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire; for by fire (or cannon) and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many; for I know their works and their thoughts, it shall come that I will gather all nations and they shall come (to Jerusalem) and see my glory; and I will send those that escape of them (that is, the soldiers that fought against Jerusalem) unto the (heathen) nations.... to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory, and they shall declare my glory among the gentiles. Matt. xxv. 31, When the Son of Man shall come in his glory.... then shall he sit upon the throne of (David in Jerusalem) his glory, and before him shall be gathered [every body? no:] all NATIONS.

Of those who believe that the saints go up in that vast throng, and are then and there singled out one by one, we would inquire, What do you do with the passages that read thus, The Lord my God shall come and ALL the saints with thee? Zech. xiv. 5. Behold the Lord cometh WITH ten thousand of HIS SAINTS to execute judgment [not upon his saints, for they are associated with their Lord in the judgment of the world] upon all. Jude 14, 15. The facts in the case are these, those who are raised from the dead are raised immortal; their position cannot be changed by any future judgment. The fact that they are raised proves them to be the children of God. The living are changed in a moment from mortality to immortality. This, in my judgment, is judgment enough for them. Proclaim ye this among the gentiles, prepare war, wake up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near; let them come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about. Joel iii. 9, 12. We believe that Joel speaks of the same time and place to which Christ refers; and that the gathering of the nations to Jerusalem will be a sign if not the sign of the Son of man in (the political) heaven. WANT OF DECISION.

A great deal of talent is lost to the world for the want of a little courage. Every day sends to their graves a number of obscure men, who have only remained in obscurity because their timidity has prevented them from making a first effort, and who, if they had only been induced to begin, would in all probability have gone great lengths in the career of fame. The fact is, that in doing anything in the world worth doing, we must not stand shivering on the bank, thinking of the cold and danger, but jump in and scramble through as well as we can. It will not do to be perpetually calculating risks and adjusting nice chances; it did all very well before the flood when a man could consult his friends, upon an intended publication for a hundred and fifty years, and live to see its success for six or seven centuries afterward; but at present a man waits and doubts, and consults his brothers, and his uncles, and his particular friends, till one day he finds that he is sixty-five years of age, that he has lost so much time in consulting first cousins and particular friends that he has no more time to follow their advice. There is so little time for over-squeamishness at present, that the opportunity slips away. The very period of life at which man chooses to venture, if ever, is so confined that it is no bad rule to preach up the necessity, in such instances, of a little violence done to the feelings, and efforts made in defiance of strict and sober calculation.—[Sidney Smith.

THE FRUIT OF FIDELITY.

Hubbard, a young man from the country, entered Phillips' academy, Andover. His heart was filled with the love of God. He soon found one scholor who felt as he did, and they two found a third. The three agreed to have a prayer-meeting. They met in a little room in the academy; and here they prayed and sang and read God's word, and like good old Jacob, wrestled for a blessing. The Lord Jesus says, "Where two or three are met together in my name, I will be with them;" and the Lord Jesus was in that small meeting, and the Holy Spirit; and such blessed society was it found to be, that they continued all night in prayer. Having tasted so much of heaven, their hearts went out towards their fellow-students. They wanted to bring others into the same sweet fellowship with Jesus. And as, in order to do good, we need to have some plan about it, and for want of it much good is lost, they each agreed to select some scholar, make him the special subject of prayer, and seek in every kind and true way to lead him to the Saviour. Hubbard thought of one who lived in the house where he roomed, Amos, a little lad of thirteen. Amos had pious parents. He knew the commandments, had studied the catechism, and read his Bible. He never swore or used bad language. Everybody called him a fine little fellow. Yet you know Christ tells us there are but two ways in the world—one the straight and narrow which leads to life, the other the broad way which leads to destruction; and everybody whose face is not set towards life, is there. Amos' face was not set towards life. He did not like to have God in his thoughts. The love of Christ did not rule his heart. Amos was in the "broad way." Hubbard first tried to win Amos' love and confidence. He helped him over hard places in his studies, and often asked him to take a walk. Younger boys are easily attracted to the society of older ones; sometimes, alas, to their hurt. Hubbard's lovely disposition and pleasant talk, in addition to a fund of interesting stories, soon won Amos, and he asked if he might not room with him. Hubbard of course willingly acquiesced, and Amos was soon his chum. Amos was now the intimate of one who was intimate with Jesus, and on comparing himself with his friend, he found that Hubbard took delight in some things which he had no relish for. This began to trouble him. He wondered why he should not take delight in God; yet God seemed far off, and something separated them. Hubbard's prayers and conversation made him more and more uneasy. The Holy Spirit showed him what made the difference between them, and that it was sin which separated him from God. Hubbard was not sorry to see his little friend feel so, because he knew what Christ could do for him. And when Amos asked again and again, "What shall I do to be saved?" Hubbard pointed him as often to Christ who washes away our sins in his own blood. Amos depended very much upon his friend. Day after day he begged him to pray for him and with him, as if that could save him. It could not. We must take hold of Jesus each one for himself. He is the Saviour. Hubbard at last told Amos so. "Amos" he said, "I can do no more for you. Your minister, your father, your mother, nobody can save you but the Lord Jesus Christ. He and he only can. Believe him when he says, "Come unto me and be ye saved." Go cast yourself wholly on him for forgiveness and peace." Amos looked as if he was deserted when Hubbard went out the door and left him alone—alone with his Saviour. He threw himself on his knees. It was an hour or more before Hubbard came back. When he entered the room, Amos looked up, and that look had heaven in it. Hubbard saw in a moment that he had found his Saviour, and that his face was turned heavenward. Oh happy moment! Amos had not been to school for several days. Anxiety for his eternal interest would not allow him to study The next morning he rose serene, and tranquil, and gathered up his books for school. "Dare you trust yourself among the boys yet?" asked Hubbard; "they may laugh at you. Are you strong enough to bear up under what they might say?" Amos turned round to his friend, and what answer did he make?

"How can I sink with such a prop
As my eternal God,
Who bears the earth's huge pillars up,
And spreads the heavens abroad?

How can I die while Jesus lives,
Who, rising, left the dead?
Pardon and grace my soul receives
From my exalted Head.

All that I am, and all I have,
Shall be forever thine:
What e'er my duty bids me give,
My cheerful hands resign.

That was the boy's answer. It was a remarkable answer. Of course, while he felt so, there was no danger that ungodly companions would steal a march on him; and Hubbard said no more, only he thanked God in his heart. From that hour Amos' course was onward. He is now a distinguished minister of the gospel, and for thirty years his labors and influence have been blessing and enriching the city where he labors.

CHRISTMAS.

'Twas Christmas eve, and St. Nicholas had just deposited with safety his annual gifts in the stockings of Willie and Mary Brown, and proceeded on his journey. The long-wished for morning arrived which caused a merry bustle among the children, each anxious to discover what Santa Claus had brought them.

One after another were the toys and candies poured forth from their well-filled stockings, exclaiming as they did so: "What a nice little doll for Mary!" and "What a cunning little donkey for Willie!" combined with numerous other exclamations while examining their valuable gifts.

There resided in a distant part of the neighborhood a widow who, after having partaken of some scanty food which comprised their morning meal sent her two fatherless children in search of something with which to provide themselves a dinner; she having been disabled by a fall received one day while searching for work, from which to support herself and children. Having attired themselves in their ragged garments the children set forth. Arriving at the dwelling of Mary and Willie they halted, and the eldest gently rang the door-bell, to which call a servant responded, to whom the girl applied for some thing to rescue them from starvation. The servant informed her mistress who, accompanied by her daughter immediately set to work obtaining some thing which would suit the little sufferers appetite, and which would shelter them more closely from the piercing cold. Some food having been obtained, they gave it to the little beggars who, after devouring a small quantity, carefully stowed the remainder in their shabby basket, while Mary was busy gathering such clothing as could possibly be spared, and also such toys, candies, &c., which she thought would amuse and comfort the little sufferers. Having collected the articles together, they presented them to the little girls who after returning many hearty thanks, hastily returned to their miserable abode.

More contentedly could both parties pass the remainder of the day; the one in playing with the toys and things which had been given them, the other in remembering that in the midst of their happiness they had caused others to be happy also. All you little children who have been blessed with a rich supply of presents and are enjoying much happiness, remember that many there are who are suffering even for the want of some thing to eat. Give then with an open heart, and remember that in so doing you are obeying one of God's greatest commandments—"Give to him that asketh, and him that would borrow of thee turn thou not away." W. D. TROUBLE BREWING IN FRANCE.

It seems things do not go perfectly smooth in the Imperial household of Louis Napoleon. The following item we take from The Methodist, and is from its Paris Correspondent of Dec. 27. He says:

"There will be no reception of the ladies usually admitted to that privilege by the Empress on the 2d of January. The reason given for these changes in the customs of the court is that her Majesty's health has been seriously injured by the waters of Schwalbach, and we are also told that the Emperor is suffering from the effects of too much Vichy water. The death of M. Mocquard, the emperor's private secretary, is also said to have been so serious a blow that the greatest despondency prevails at the Tuileries. These motives are not accepted by all the world as the true ones. There are still stronger reasons for refraining from gay demonstrations in Paris. There is no doubt that there is great dissatisfaction existing against the government in a variety of classes. The system of repression has been carried to what would appear its utmost limits in the midst of a high spirited people, yet they are threatened with still further restrictions, and symptoms of insubordination are beginning to show themselves. Vague rumors of plots against the Emperor's life, and rumors—not at all vague, but very well defined—of conspiracies in favor of the Orleans family, are heard every day. Large numbers of workmen are out of employment, and trouble seems to be brewing from this circumstance."

THE WORLD TO COME.

BY T. P. LEWIS.

(TUNE—"Jamie's on the stormy sea.)

"Sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—Isa. xxxv. 10.

World of worlds where no more sorrow
Dims the prospect of to-morrow;
World where none can trouble borrow—
World so free from noise and strife,
World where sickness enters never,
Where no pangs the heart can sever,
World where all shall live forever,
World where blooms eternal life.

In that world there's no more dying,
No repining, no more sighing,
No more anguish, no more crying,
All of these have passed away.
Those who here have sadly parted,
Sighed farewell while tears have started,
Round the world all broken hearted,
Hail the dawn of that glad day.

No more clouds obscure the vision—
No more scoffers make derision—
Fields of light and pure elysian—
Paradise breaks to our view.
Hearts that once by anguish riven,
To desponding thoughts were given,
Tune aloud their harps in heaven,
To glad notes for ever new.

World to come! O world of pleasure!
Where the holy lay their treasure—
World where none their joy can measure—
Long the pilgrim's joyous theme.
Where the ransomed throng are seated,
Round the throne with hopes completed,
I, with those I oft have greeted,
Fain would share thy joys supreme.

DEATH OF CHRIST AND ITS RESULTS.

In what respect and to what extent did the death and resurrection of Christ affect the human family?

That there are two phases or results growing out of the atonement is, we think, evident from many passages of Scripture. For instance, the apostle remarks, "For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."

There are two things suggested in this passage, a reconciliation and a salvation. The first resulting from the death of Christ; the second from his life; this, the fruit of his resurrection; that, of his sacrifice. He died for the ungodly; and by this means, "commended his love toward us," even in our sinful state, or while we were yet sinners; but by his blood, or faith in his blood, we "are justified from all things, from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses."

The apostle does not, in the foregoing passage, affirm that we are saved by the death of Christ; for that would hardly be correct; but that we are "saved by his life." "Because I live, ye shall live also."

What then is this reconciliation, of which the apostle speaks, which results from the death of Christ? It evidently has not the sense of the term justification. The former meaning simply the renewal of friendship of parties who had been at variance; while the latter involves the idea of pardon, absolution, acquittance from guilt and merited punishment.

Now reconciliation may take place between parties at variance, if the party at fault makes suitable amends; or, if not so, then by the intervention of a third party who, by some act or method, removes the cause or causes of variance. In man's case, it was the latter. Man, himself, had no power to do this; hence the apostle, "For when we were without strength....Christ died for the ungodly." It was not possible for man, poor fallen man, to remove the cause of variance which existed between himself and his God. He was an enemy to his maker, and could only be reconciled by the death of the Son of God, an event, entirely outside of himself, devolving exclusively upon Christ.

This reconciliation was necessary in order to salvation. It paved the way for it, without which it could not be realized. The parties must be reconciled before they would or could enter into the contract—a new contract. The first contract had been made void, had been broken. "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Thus it was that the friendship heretofore existing between God and man, was broken off. Man became an enemy to God, broke the conditions of the primeval covenant, and rendered himself obnoxious to the penalty of God's law. Man was first in the fault, had nothing to offer, neither merit nor riches—had forfeited all: how then could he be reconciled? Not by anything he could do. He was in debt, and had nothing to pay; he was bankrupt, and hence entirely at the mercy of his creditor. His creditor had the right and might exercise the power of pardon if he chose. It was optional with him as to whether it should be done. In doing it he might impose conditions or not at his pleasure, conditions few or many, hard or easy, great or small.

Now what did he do? He permitted his Son to step in and die for or on account of man's sin, and by this means he does, conditionally, break up, reverse, or render void, the otherwise inevitable result growing out of the infliction of the penalty of God's prime law—that of perishing. Man would have had no subsequent existence but for the death of Christ; whose death does not save man from dying, but from perishing in the corruption of death. God does not, therefore, make void the penalty; but he recalls, holds back, arrests the result, on condition that man does not a second time revolt against his government. In case he rebels during his second probation, the results follow the penalty—he perishes in death— the "wrath of God abideth on him."

From what has been said we infer the following facts:

1. That by the death of Christ the world is reconciled to God.

2. That reconciliation—in this case—refers to a renewal of friendship—a kindly regard which God exercises toward the human race.

3. That this reconciliation is effected exclusively by the death of the Saviour.

4. That it resulted in releasing mankind from the otherwise inevitable results of the infliction of the penalty of God's law—that of perishing.

5. That this exemption from the aforesaid results, rested upon the following conditions: (1.) The death of Christ. (2.) His resurrection. (3.) A conformity—so far as lay in his power—of man to the divine will. Including all in this exemption who do not deliberately and persistently violate the known will of God, whether children or heathen; and excluding all who break the law of God, whether it consists in the violation of revealed law or the light or law of nature.

6. That prime transgression is not forgiven or pardoned, is seen in the fact that death "has passed upon all men." That "it is appointed unto man once to die." This is the penalty inflicted because of his transgression. But God promises, conditionally, to relieve or save him from perishing in death. What then is this condition upon which turns a matter of such infinite moment? It is this, simply this, that he should not again rebel against the divine government.

Now, this does not refer to children who have not come to the years of discretion, because they can neither do good nor evil; nor does it refer to that part of the heathen world who, though they have not the (revealed) law, yet "do by nature the things contained in the law;" nor yet to believers, who, through repentance and faith, and the advocacy of the Redeemer, receive a pardon of their sins; but to that part of mankind who, by reason of persistent transgression, are by the Scriptures pronounced rebels against the government of God.

7. Hence it is, that the justification of which the apostle speaks, is a state or condition growing out of the pardon of sins—or the personal acts of individuals; and is applicable to none but believers. It is the justification of faith or grace conditional in two principles—belief in Christ, and conformity to his will; neither of which can be affirmed of children or heathen who have not heard of Christ—the former being prevented through the want of mental ability; the latter, from the lack of intellectual culture.

8. We see how the argument of the apostle on the subject of justification by faith applies to those only who, "by reason of use, have their senses exercised to disern both good and evil;" who have became loyal to God. While they "were yet sinners Christ died" for them, but now, "being justified by his blood" they are "saved from wrath through him." When they were enemies, they "were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled" they "shall be saved by his life." They are those who "receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," and are to "reign in life by one, Jesus Christ."

How clear from the foregoing facts is the declaration of the apostle, "Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." His death was for the benefit of the race, for every son and daughter of Adam who fell under the power of a broken law. He did not cancel the original guilt, otherwise they would not have died: but lengthening out their lives, and favoring them with another probation, he assures them that they shall be redeemed from death if not found guilty of rebelling a second time against the divine government. That if they believe they shall not perish. The meaning therefore of the phrase, "come upon all men to justification of life," is this: God has, by the death of his Son, opened up a way by which all may be saved. The sacrifice or death of Christ is God's gift. Suppose some will not accept the offered help, will God thrust it upon them? Christ died not only that all mankind might be raised from the dead, but that they might be eternally happy; but will they be happy irrespective of moral character? No more will they be raised from the dead without it. This last remark does not refer to children, but to the world of mankind, who, by reason of persistent transgression, have forfeited all right to a second life, and hence they perish.

He is the Saviour of all men; not because he saves them from dying, nor yet because he saves them from sinning; but because he is the one who has instituted the methods of salvation, or worked out the plan that was instituted by the Father. He has opened a door of hope, has set the table and invited all to come and eat. He hath said, "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth." Why does he do this? Because he is the Saviour of all men. He "will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." But while he wills, is it certain that they will come? Nay, is it not certain that many will not come? "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." The spirit of rebellion is within them. Their names are written in the earth. Let them never "see the light," but consume in the grave for ever.

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

BY CHARLES C. TUCK.

In my former article on this subject, I endeavored to show that that tribulation was upon the Jewish people, during the seven years war between the Jews and Romans, and not upon the Christian church during the papal persecution. I showed that the tribulation was at the time when, according to the teaching of Christ, the "abomination of desolation should stand in the holy place." I also referred to, and examined some portions of the prophecy of Daniel, concerning the "daily sacrifice," and the "abomination that maketh desolate," and found that the power that took away the "daily sacrifice," or, in other words, "caused the sacrifice and the oblation to cease," was the same power that "placed the abomination that maketh desolate;" and that power was the Roman civil power. Therefore, when Christ spoke of the "abomination of desolation" standing "in the holy place," and admonished those who were in Judea, who should witness that event, to flee to the mountains, he evidently referred to the time spoken of in Matthew xxiv. 2 verse, when there should not be left "one stone upon another" which should not be "thrown down." See also the parallel passages in Mark and Luke.

My object in speaking of this subject is not for the purpose of controversy, but for the sake of truth. For this I would gladly sacrifice everything else. It matters not what the consequences of embracing truth may be; I leave that matter in the hands of the Lord. It is enough for me to believe and obey.

Owing to circumstances, I was unable, in my former article, to notice many points connected with the tribulation, which are very important ones to be considered. For this reason I refer to the subject again. Even now, I shall probably fall short of doing the subject full justice. The first point I will notice is that concerning the shortening of "those days."

In verse 15, Christ says: "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand.)" He then says, verses 16–22, "Then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains; let him which is on the house-top not come down to take any thing out of his house; neither let him which is in the field return bach to take his clothes. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days; but pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath day; for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time; no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved; but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened."

Christ does not specify, nor intimate, any particular number of days which were to be shortened, but merely says "those days (of tribulation) shall be shortened." If we trace the expression "abomination of desolation" back to the book of Danied, we find that in no case is it used in connection with either 1260 or 1290 days of persecution by the "little horn" power; but is used in connection with the Roman civil power, in its work of desolation upon the Jewish nation. Therefore the idea that Christ referred to 1290 days of papal persecution, when he said those days of tribulation should be shortened, is a mere assumption.

The expression, "there should no flesh be saved," certainly means that if those days of tribulation had not been shortened, all flesh would have perished in the tribulation, whether it comprises only the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, or the papal persecution universally; and it certainly could not have comprised the latter, for (allowing that it did, and those days had not been shortened) none but Christions would have been its victims: and Christians can no more be comprehended in the expression "no flesh" than can the rest of mankind. But when we apply the tribulation where it belongs, and where Christ placed it, everything is harmonious; for we then see that if the tribulation on Jerusalem had not been shortened, "no flesh" in that city would have been saved from the impending destruction. "But for the elect's sake" the tribulation was shortened. It appears that although the Christians fled, when they saw the "abomination of desolation stand in the holy place," there were still some left whom God foresaw were his elect, and therefore, in order that they might not be destroyed with the wicked Jews, the siege was brought to an end.

Another point which I wish to notice is the expression "immediately after the tribulation of those days," which is found in verse 29. This is thought to be a great objection in the way of applying the tribulation to the destruction of Jerusalem, because Christ said "immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened," &c.; and therefore it is said, it could not apply there, for the sun was not darkened for many hundred years after the destruction of Jerusalem. That little word "immediately" is thus given more weight by some, than all the rest of the testimony of Christ in the matter, to say nothing about the testimony of Daniel the prophet. I do not think it was necessary for the sun to be darkened the next year after the tribulation, nor within hundreds of years after, in order to have it called by Christ immediately after; because "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

In Rev., xxii. 7, 12, 20, Christ is represented as saying, after showing John the glory of the new Jerusalem, "Behold I come quickly;" and yet his coming will be many hundreds of years after he uttered those words. Nevertheless, he said it would be QUICKLY, and therefore I let it be so. He also said that the sun should be darkened "immediately after" the great tribulation at Jerusalem; and although hundreds of years elapsed after the tribulation, before the sun was darkened, yet he called it immediately after, and therefore I believe.

Bangor, Me., Jan. 15, 1865.

JERUSALEM AND THE JUDGMENT.

"Run speak to this young man saying, Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein; for I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her." Zech. ii. 4, 5.

When will this splendid prediction be fulfilled? Let us compare spiritual things with spiritual. Rev. xxi. 23. The CITY had no need of the sun neither the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God did lighten it. The throne of God is to be in the midst of the city. Rev. xxii. 3. The ancient city was walled about; but of this city it is said, that God shall be a wall of fire round about it. Gog and Magog are represented as saying, Ezek. xxxviii. 11, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages. John said, Rev. xx. 9, They (Gog and Magog) compassed the camp of the saints about, and God's wall of fire came down and devoured them. Ezek. xxxviii. 18—23, It shall come to pass at the same time when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face.... surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel, so that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heavens, and the beasts of the fields, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth shall shake at my presence, and the mountains shall be thrown down (Zech. xiv. 4,) and the steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground; and I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountain, saith the Lord God, every man's sword shall be against his brother; and I will plead against him (Gog) with pestilence, (Zech. xiv. 12), and with blood; and I will rain upon him and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone; thus will I magnify myself and sanctify myself, and I will be known in the eyes of many nations, and they (the nations) shall know that I am the Lord. Isa. lxvi. 15, 16, 18, For behold the Lord will come with fire and with his chariots, like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire; for by fire (or cannon) and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many; for I know their works and their thoughts, it shall come that I will gather all nations and they shall come (to Jerusalem) and see my glory; and I will send those that escape of them (that is, the soldiers that fought against Jerusalem) unto the (heathen) nations....to the isles afar off, that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory, and they shall declare my glory among the gentiles. Matt. xxv. 31, When the Son of Man shall come in his glory....then shall he sit upon the throne of (David in Jerusalem) his glory, and before him shall be gathered [every body? no:] all NATIONS.

Of those who believe that the saints go up in that vast throng, and are then and there singled out one by one, we would inquire, What do you do with the passages that read thus, The Lord my God shall come and ALL the saints with thee? Zech. xiv. 5. Behold the Lord cometh WITH ten thousand of HIS SAINTS to execute judgment [not upon his saints, for they are associated with their Lord in the judgment of the world] upon all. Jude 14, 15. The facts in the case are these, those who are raised from the dead are raised immortal; their position cannot be changed by any future judgment. The fact that they are raised proves them to be the children of God. The living are changed in a moment from mortality to immortality. This, in my judgment, is judgment enough for them. Proclaim ye this among the gentiles, prepare war, wake up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near; let them come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about. Joel iii. 9, 12. We believe that Joel speaks of the same time and place to which Christ refers; and that the gathering of the nations to Jerusalem will be a sign if not the sign of the Son of man in (the political) heaven.

WANT OF DECISION.

A great deal of talent is lost to the world for the want of a little courage. Every day sends to their graves a number of obscure men, who have only remained in obscurity because their timidity has prevented them from making a first effort, and who, if they had only been induced to begin, would in all probability have gone great lengths in the career of fame. The fact is, that in doing anything in the world worth doing, we must not stand shivering on the bank, thinking of the cold and danger, but jump in and scramble through as well as we can. It will not do to be perpetually calculating risks and adjusting nice chances; it did all very well before the flood when a man could consult his friends, upon an intended publication for a hundred and fifty years, and live to see its success for six or seven centuries afterward; but at present a man waits and doubts, and consults his brothers, and his uncles, and his particular friends, till one day he finds that he is sixty-five years of age, that he has lost so much time in consulting first cousins and particular friends that he has no more time to follow their advice. There is so little time for over-squeamishness at present, that the opportunity slips away. The very period of life at which man chooses to venture, if ever, is so confined that it is no bad rule to preach up the necessity, in such instances, of a little violence done to the feelings, and efforts made in defiance of strict and sober calculation.—[Sidney Smith.

THE FRUIT OF FIDELITY.

Hubbard, a young man from the country, entered Phillips' academy, Andover. His heart was filled with the love of God. He soon found one scholor who felt as he did, and they two found a third. The three agreed to have a prayer-meeting. They met in a little room in the academy; and here they prayed and sang and read God's word, and like good old Jacob, wrestled for a blessing. The Lord Jesus says, "Where two or three are met together in my name, I will be with them;" and the Lord Jesus was in that small meeting, and the Holy Spirit; and such blessed society was it found to be, that they continued all night in prayer. Having tasted so much of heaven, their hearts went out towards their fellow-students. They wanted to bring others into the same sweet fellowship with Jesus. And as, in order to do good, we need to have some plan about it, and for want of it much good is lost, they each agreed to select some scholar, make him the special subject of prayer, and seek in every kind and true way to lead him to the Saviour. Hubbard thought of one who lived in the house where he roomed, Amos, a little lad of thirteen. Amos had pious parents. He knew the commandments, had studied the catechism, and read his Bible. He never swore or used bad language. Everybody called him a fine little fellow. Yet you know Christ tells us there are but two ways in the world—one the straight and narrow which leads to life, the other the broad way which leads to destruction; and everybody whose face is not set towards life, is there. Amos' face was not set towards life. He did not like to have God in his thoughts. The love of Christ did not rule his heart. Amos was in the "broad way." Hubbard first tried to win Amos' love and confidence. He helped him over hard places in his studies, and often asked him to take a walk. Younger boys are easily attracted to the society of older ones; sometimes, alas, to their hurt. Hubbard's lovely disposition and pleasant talk, in addition to a fund of interesting stories, soon won Amos, and he asked if he might not room with him. Hubbard of course willingly acquiesced, and Amos was soon his chum. Amos was now the intimate of one who was intimate with Jesus, and on comparing himself with his friend, he found that Hubbard took delight in some things which he had no relish for. This began to trouble him. He wondered why he should not take delight in God; yet God seemed far off, and something separated them. Hubbard's prayers and conversation made him more and more uneasy. The Holy Spirit showed him what made the difference between them, and that it was sin which separated him from God. Hubbard was not sorry to see his little friend feel so, because he knew what Christ could do for him. And when Amos asked again and again, "What shall I do to be saved?" Hubbard pointed him as often to Christ who washes away our sins in his own blood. Amos depended very much upon his friend. Day after day he begged him to pray for him and with him, as if that could save him. It could not. We must take hold of Jesus each one for himself. He is the Saviour. Hubbard at last told Amos so. "Amos" he said, "I can do no more for you. Your minister, your father, your mother, nobody can save you but the Lord Jesus Christ. He and he only can. Believe him when he says, "Come unto me and be ye saved." Go cast yourself wholly on him for forgiveness and peace." Amos looked as if he was deserted when Hubbard went out the door and left him alone—alone with his Saviour. He threw himself on his knees. It was an hour or more before Hubbard came back. When he entered the room, Amos looked up, and that look had heaven in it. Hubbard saw in a moment that he had found his Saviour, and that his face was turned heavenward. Oh happy moment! Amos had not been to school for several days. Anxiety for his eternal interest would not allow him to study The next morning he rose serene, and tranquil, and gathered up his books for school. "Dare you trust yourself among the boys yet?" asked Hubbard; "they may laugh at you. Are you strong enough to bear up under what they might say?" Amos turned round to his friend, and what answer did he make?

"How can I sink with such a prop
As my eternal God,
Who bears the earth's huge pillars up,
And spreads the heavens abroad?

How can I die while Jesus lives,
Who, rising, left the dead?
Pardon and grace my soul receives
From my exalted Head.

All that I am, and all I have,
Shall be forever thine:
What e'er my duty bids me give,
My cheerful hands resign."

That was the boy's answer. It was a remarkable answer. Of course, while he felt so, there was no danger that ungodly companions would steal a march on him; and Hubbard said no more, only he thanked God in his heart. From that hour Amos' course was onward. He is now a distinguished minister of the gospel, and for thirty years his labors and influence have been blessing and enriching the city where he labors.

CHRISTMAS.

'Twas Christmas eve, and St. Nicholas had just deposited with safety his annual gifts in the stockings of Willie and Mary Brown, and proceeded on his journey. The long-wished for morning arrived which caused a merry bustle among the children, each anxious to discover what Santa Claus had brought them.

One after another were the toys and candies poured forth from their well-filled stockings, exclaiming as they did so: "What a nice little doll for Mary!" and "What a cunning little donkey for Willie!" combined with numerous other exclamations while examining their valuable gifts.

There resided in a distant part of the neighborhood a widow who, after having partaken of some scanty food which comprised their morning meal sent her two fatherless children in search of something with which to provide themselves a dinner; she having been disabled by a fall received one day while searching for work, from which to support herself and children. Having attired themselves in their ragged garments the children set forth. Arriving at the dwelling of Mary and Willie they halted, and the eldest gently rang the door-bell, to which call a servant responded, to whom the girl applied for some thing to rescue them from starvation. The servant informed her mistress who, accompanied by her daughter immediately set to work obtaining some thing which would suit the little sufferers appetite, and which would shelter them more closely from the piercing cold. Some food having been obtained, they gave it to the little beggars who, after devouring a small quantity, carefully stowed the remainder in their shabby basket, while Mary was busy gathering such clothing as could possibly be spared, and also such toys, candies, &c., which she thought would amuse and comfort the little sufferers. Having collected the articles together, they presented them to the little girls who after returning their thanks, hastily returned to their miserable abode.

More contentedly could both parties pass the remainder of the day; the one in playing with the toys and things which had been given them, the other in remembering that in the midst of their happiness they had caused others to be happy also. All you little children who have been blessed with a rich supply of presents and are enjoying much happiness, remember that many there are who are suffering even for the want of some thing to eat. Give then with an open heart, and remember that in so doing you are obeying one of God's greatest commandments—"Give to him that asketh, and him that would borrow of thee turn thou not away."

TROUBLE BREWING IN FRANCE.

It seems things do not go perfectly smooth in the Imperial household of Louis Napoleon. The following item we take from The Methodist, and is from its Paris Correspondent of Dec. 27. He says:

"There will be no reception of the ladies usually admitted to that privilege by the Empress on the 2d of January. The reason given for these changes in the customs of the court is that her Majesty's health has been seriously injured by the waters of Schwalbach, and we are also told that the Emperor is suffering from the effects of too much Vichy water. The death of M. Mocquard, the emperor's private secretary, is also said to have been so serious a blow that the greatest despondency prevails at the Tuileries. These motives are not accepted by all the world as the true ones. There are still stronger reasons for refraining from gay demonstrations in Paris. There is no doubt that there is great dissatisfaction existing against the government in a variety of classes. The system of repression has been carried to what would appear its utmost limits in the midst of a high spirited people, yet they are threatened with still further restrictions, and symptoms of insubordination are beginning to show themselves. Vague rumors of plots against the Emperor's life, and rumors—not at all vague, but very well defined—of conspiracies in favor of the Orleans family, are heard every day. Large numbers of workmen are out of employment, and trouble seems to be brewing from this circumstance."

LUTHER LEE ON THE DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

The intelligent student of the Bible, I think, cannot fail to perceive the truth of the following position: That death is the full and final penalty of sin. Of course, in this proposition I make no allusion to national penalties; but to the end of sin personally considered. The principle I have stated runs parallel with the Revelations of God, and may be found on almost every page of the Scriptures. And I apprehend, we shall find but one penalty, in reference to the final destiny of man, from Genesis to Revelation. The penalty of Adam's sin is the penalty of the divine law, in every dispensation. If we sustain this position, Mr. Lee's whole superstructure crumbles into dust.

1. The penalty of Adam's sin is thus expressed: "Thou shalt surely die." This penalty is subsequently explained by the Lord, thus: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou shalt return to the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and to dust shalt thou return."

I wish it fully, distinctly and indelibly, impressed on the reader's mind, that the penalty of Adam's sin was not "eternal torments," but death—a death unbroken by a resurrection—a death perpetual in its dominion, unless some means were devised for his redemption.

Death, then, was and is the penalty of the law. Paul, in his letter to the Romans, presents this subject very lucidly, chapter v. 12, &c. "Wherefore as by one man (Adam) sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."

Here we are taught that by sin, death—thanatos, came into the world, or kosmon; and this by the sin of one man,—Adam. No man can doubt but this death was the penalty of the law, and that but for this violation of law, death would not have entered the world. This fixes the meaning of the penalty, and shows it to be literal death. But "death passed upon all men, in whom"—i. e., in Adam—"all have sinned." The word dierchomai, here rendered "passed" signifies to pass through, to pass over, to be propagated. Death, therefore, was propagated to the race. Adam, himself, being cut off from the tree of life; and the whole race being in his loins at the time, in him they sinned—i. e., became "subject to vanity," and with him they came under the law of death.

We shall have occasion to refer to this chapter again, and will, therefore, for the present, say no more on its contents.

In Rom. vi. 23, Paul states the principle we have presented—"the wages of sin is death." This is a general principle—a universal law, running through the Oracles of God.

There are many other proofs of this position, but these must now suffice. I regard the point as established, then, that death, and not the manner of dying, is the penalty of law—that the penalty is one and not many.

Having presented this general principle, or law, I shall now notice Mr. Lee's proofs of endless misery. He refers to Mark ix. 43, 44. "It is better for thee to enter into life, maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

The punishment here indicated is in gehenna, which is never used to denote "future punishment" of men, after the resurrection. The Lord refers to Isaiah, where the same phraseology is found in reference to the destruction of Israel's enemies at the coming of the Lord. The passage in Mark refers to the destruction of the Jews. Jesus taught his disciples that it was better for them to loose a hand, foot, or eye, and thus enter life; than to go into gehenna and be consumed by its fire, and devoured by its worms.

That the "worm" means a guilty conscience is a perfect fiction—the offspring of a distempered imagination.

2. His next proof is Luke xvi. 19–31, which is the parable of the rich man. This we have already examined, and shall let it pass.

3. His third proof, in the article before me, is Rev. xxi. 14, 15. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. For without are dogs and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." Upon this Mr. Lee remarks—"there is not the slightest allusion to annihilation." And I will add—not the "slightest allusion" to "eternal misery." There is no proof that they are even alive, much less in torments. They are merely said to be "without the city;" and, for all this text proves, they may be dead and devoured by worms! Besides their state stands opposed to "having a right to the tree of life"—the privilege of living, and must therefore be death.

4. Mr. Lee also refers to Rev. xiv. 11—"The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever." Mr. Lee observes on this—"we need not inquire whether or not this text relates to the final destiny of sin," &c. This is not the only text that Mr. Lee has taken for granted refers to the destiny of sinners; and before quoting this, or them, he should have "inquired" whether or not they related to the destiny of the wicked. This is "important to the argument," for "the "representation" is not "borrowed" from their final destiny. The passage clearly refers to the torments of the living, in the present state, who "worship the beast and his image" and contains no allusion to to the destiny of sinners in a future state.

5. His next proof is Rev. xx. 10. "Shall be tormented day and night forever and ever."

Mr. Lee is evidently straitened for proof of endless torments, or else he would not have quoted a passage so irrelevant to his subject. The Devil is here said to be cast into "the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet were and (the devil) shall be tormented day and night forever and ever." Whatever the Devil may be a symbol of in this place, the beast and false prophet are symbols of civil and ecclesiastical powers, which meet with their final overthrow in a place called "the lake of fire;" and I have no objection to the Devil's meeting his fate in the same place, although he should be "tormented" as long as "day and night" shall continue; for his end is destruction. See Heb. ii. 14.

6. Mr. Lee refers to the following expressions on the duration of punishment: "To be cast into everlasting fire." Math. xviii. 8. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment," chap. xxv. 46. "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire" verse 41. 2 Thess. i. 9. "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction."

"In this argument," he says, "we rely wholly upon the duration of the suffering." Leaving out the word "suffering," which is not warranted by Mr. Lee's proofs, I would observe, that we are perfectly agreed as to the duration of the punishment. Mr. Lee, however, has thrown together texts which have no connexion, and, without stating the context, presses them all into his service. Truly, Mr. Lee is a great sophist!

Mr. Lee quotes Rom. i. 18. "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." This is a truth, which I presume, none will deny; but I cannot see any proof of Mr. Lee's position in it.

He again refers to Rom. ii. 8. 9; and as we have promised to examine this passage more fully, we will now proceed to do so.

Having proved "both Jews and Gentiles to be under sin," the Apostle thus addresses the Jews: "Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whoever thou art, that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another," (the Gentiles) "thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest, doest the same things." "But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth, against them who commit such things"—whether they be Jews or Gentiles "And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them who do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?" This was "the Judgment of God," upon the Jews, a judgment which they did not escape. "Or dispisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long suffering," (to thee, O Israel;) "not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth them to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up to thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who by patient contin in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality—eternal life:—But to them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness—indignation and wrath; tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; but glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God." Jews and Gentiles stand on an equal footing before God. The Jews have received their indignation, wrath, tribulation, and anguish; these were poured upon them in the day of judgment upon Israel. They treasured up wrath against the day of wrath, and met with a terrible overthrow. Thus it fell upon the Jew first. They were contentious and would not obey the truth; they sought not for glory, honor, nor immortality; and therefore, God will never give them eternal life.

The day of judgment upon the Gentiles is now shortly coming upon them, when they will meet with a similar fate. The Apostle continues:—"For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish," apolountai from apollumi, perish—be destroyed—rendered vain—brought to nought:—"and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law," &c.

I have been thus particular on this passage, because I do not design returning to an exposition of it again. The reader will see nothing in this passage, favorable to the doctrine of endless misery.

7. Mr. Lee also quotes Heb. x. 28–31. See the passage. Paul, in writing to Hebrews, or Jews, who had many temptations to apostacy, says—"For if we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins. But a certain fearful apprehension of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries," or apostates. "He that despised Moses' law, died without mercy," (died without obtaining mercy) "under two or three witnesses: of how much more severe punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God," as the Jews had done, "and hath counted the blood of the covenant, by which he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the spirit of grace!" Paul teaches these Hebrews, that, if they apostatized, they would be counted worthy of a more severe punishment than the law of Moses inflicted—even a "fiery indignation which should devour" them. "And now," says he, "the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back to" destruction—or "perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

8. Mr. Lee's final proof of "eternal misery," is founded on the fact that "the Scriptures associate the punishment of sinners with the existence and punishment of devils," &c.

Upon this point we shall say but little, simply because whatever the punishment of fallen angels may be, Mr. Lee has no right thence to conclude that such will be the punishment of sinners. Mr. Lee says he will not undertake to prove that devils are disembodied spirits. I think he does well not to undertake it!

There is only one passage to which he refers, which has a sufficient bearing upon the question for me to notice it; and that is Matt. xxv. 41:—"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels."

This sentence is pronounced upon those out of the nations, who refuse to submit to Messiah's authority when He sits upon David's throne. Mr. Lee assumes they are persons raised from the dead. The "angels" spoken of may be no than the messengers, or agents, who are at that time sentenced to condemnation.

Mr. Lee has now finished his direct testimony on the punishment of the wicked, and the reader will observe that the larger portion of his evidence is in the Book of Revelation, which is confessedly the most highly symbolical book in the Bible. If "eternal torment" be the final destiny of sinners, it is very strange we do not find it taught in unfigurative and unmistakable language. The opposite view is everywhere presented in such language, that, it seems to me, no one should mistake it. This will appear manifest before we close.

It is proper that I should state here, that, Mr. Lee, having finished the presentation of his direct evidence, devotes the remainder of his articles to answering objections; and, therefore, as I shall follow him, the reader will see in my next article a digression from the present topic. But I shall return to it again, and not only answer his objections, but present direct testimony in favor of our view. We shall try fully to answer the question—What is the destiny of the wicked? HOMO.

THE PARABLE OF THE NOBLEMAN.

BY A. GUTHRIE.

I wish to give a few thoughts on the parable in Luke xix. 12–27.

In Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. page 51, we find the following facts, which help to illustrate the parable. He says, "Herod, misnamed the great, by his will divided his dominion among his three sons. Archelaus, Herod Antipas, and Herod Philip. To Archelaus he assigned Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, with the regal dignity, subject to the approbation of Augustus, who ratified his will as it respected the territorial division, but conferred on Archelaus the title of Ethnarch, or chief of the nation, with the promise of regal dignity if he should prove himself worthy of it. Archelaus entered upon his new office amid the loud acclamation of his subjects, who considered him as a king. Hence the evangelist, in conformity with the Jewish idiom, says that he reigned. (Matt. ii. 22). His reign, however, commenced inauspiciously; for, after the death of Herod and before Archelaus could go to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his father's will, the Jews having become very tumultuous at the temple, in consequence of his refusing them some demands, Archelaus ordered his soldiers to attack them; on which occasion upwards of three thousand were slain.

"On Archelaus going to Rome to solicit the regal dignity, (agreeably to the practice of the tributary kings of that age, who received their crowns from the Roman emperor), the Jews sent an embassy, consisting of fifty of their principal men, with a petition to Augustus that they might be permitted to live according to their own laws, under the Roman governor. To this circumstance our Lord evidently alludes in the parable related in Luke xix. 12–27. A certain nobleman (a man of birth or rank the son of Herod) went into a far country (Italy) to receive for himself a kingdom (that of Judea) and to return. But his citizens (the Jews) hated him, and sent a message (or embassy) after him (to Augustus Cæsar) saying 'We will not have this man to reign over us.' The Jews however failed in their request, and Archelaus having received the kingdom (or ethnarky) on his return inflicted a severe vengeance on those who would not that he should reign over them."

Now for the application. Our Saviour spake this parable to correct a misapprehension that had obtained among the disciples that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. Christ is the nobleman, or king's son. The Jews many of them said we have no king but Cæsar, and he pronounced judgment nationally upon them. His mission, at that time to them, was the good news of life, or of the kingdom; for he says in Matt. xxiv. 14, "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." The Saviour calls the money committed to them, in this parable, "true riches," in the explanation of a preceding one. Paul calls it a "treasure in earthen vessels." He said unto them "Occupy till I come." Again he said, "I go to the Father." Daniel the prophet saw, in vision, "one like the Son of man, come with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days: and there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." David said, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool." Those who occupy in his absence are "The children of God by faith," and when he returns they will become the inheritors by "being the children of the resurrection," and appointed a place in his kingdom, or over five or ten cities; or, as it is said in another place, "Ye shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." "But those mine enemies who would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me."

WHAT BECOMES OF INFANTS?

BY CATHARINE C. WILLIAMS.

T. W. W., in the Herald of Life for Sept. 14th, says, There is no one subject that has perplexed me more since I embraced the life views, than that of the future of infants; and then he asks, Are they, or are they not, subjects of the atonement? It may be some consolation to the above named individual to know that he is not alone, that his perplexity is the general experience of the thoughtful, judging both from experience and observation. Almost the first question of those who hear the ground plan of the Life views for the first time is, Well, if things are so, what will you do with infants?

As this question interests so many, and will arise, and must be met, I should like to state my mode of answering it, which is something after this fashion—If God has a plan, as doubtless he has, and has revealed it, it seems to me everything should bend to that, instead of trying to bend his plan to meet our sympathies. I feel it is best to try to find out what that plan is, understand and conform to it, though it crush some scheme which, viewed in the light of his plan, is 'fraught with mischief. We know how precious are our babes; how gladly we would have them returned to us again, those of us who have had them snatched away by death; but the question is not, what would we have, but what is the truth in the matter? 'Tis true we might, as the Editor consolingly remarks, "safely leave all in the hands of the all-wise God, who will do all things well;" but to me it is more comfortimg to understand my Father's plan, if I can. And can we not? Does he not plainly tell us who will have eternal life, and how it can be attained? "God visited the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name." Jesus gave himself for us to purify to himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. God gave his Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, &c. These and many other kindred passages seem to indicate clearly what class may expect eternal life;- and also to point out the philosophy of that state which needs to be considered in order to appreciate the requisite fitness for a condition where laws are unknown, and love to God and each other is the supreme governing principle.

Every promise of a future state seems so connected with the conditions of attaining it, as to leave no doubt as to who will be thought worthy of it, and also to leave no ground for hoping that any others than those designed will be; so that with regard to infants my only hope for them lies here. The passage quoted by the Editor, and also Paul's declaration, "else were your children unclean, but now are they holy," &c., seems to afford believers some ground of hope. It does not seem to me unreasonable, inasmuch as God knows the end from the beginning, that he should raise up such of the race, of those who died in infancy, as would, had they been spared, become good and pure; but none believe all who die young would have become so, had they lived. There is no virtue, as I can see, in not doing what one can not.

Young wild animals, venomous snakes, and reptiles are harmless; but the nature is there, waiting growth and development. So with infants, the nature is there. And the heathen, they have not the law; so law, so far as this world is concerned, is not binding on them. But does this make out that they are pure in heart? or that they do not live after the flesh? Does it make out that they deny themselves ungodliness and worldly lust, and live soberly? God is impartial: every one, everywhere, who fears him and does right is accepted, law or no law. Such alone could make a perfect state of society which must necessarily consist of tried ones.

One passage much relied on to prove the selvation of all infants will be found, I think, on a careful examination of the context to afford no proof of such a consummation. I allude to Jesus' words—"Suffer little children to come unto me," &c.; and also, "Except ye be converted and become as little children (become when they are converted) ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." It is very evident that "little children, that believe in me," are the little ones intended. Probably Job's views of what would have been his condition had he been "carried from the womb to the grave," as he at one time regretted he had not been, is as near correct (or more so) as those who expect all infants will be raised to life. We all die because we are mortal: "flesh and blood which can not see the kingdom of God." Being begotten of corruptible seed, we are necessarily corruptible, and must needs be begotten again by the word of God, which is incorruptible, and be born again, by the resurrection from the dead, in order to inherit eternal life.

If it was really certain that all infants were entitled to eternal life, because they neither did nor could sin, who could help thinking, however revolting to their instincts, that it would be far better not to risk their eternal well-being by having them grow up? How does it bid a bounty on elicit indulgencies and infanticides, and justify the heathen mother's offering of her babes to crocodiles and heathen deities. Better try to learn to rightly appreciate the gift of life, and to consider our offspring as rich boons from heaven, placed under our care to keep, improve, polish, and fit to shine as the stars for ever and ever. And if we fail to do this through ignorance, carelessness, vanity or pride, and our babes are taken from us in consequence, let us not arraign Providence, nor seek to pervert the laws of the all-wise Father to meet our sympathies; but let his laws take their course, and rejoicingly confide all to him, who is "too wise to err, and too good to be unkind."

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—On the text "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," &c., we do not see with our much esteemed Sister in her explanation. Luke says, explicitly, "They brought unto him infants, that he should touch them; but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them; but Jesus called them and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." Now, that truly converted persons are compared to little children, and called little ones, we admit; but that these little children, brought to Christ for his blessing, were "infants," brought by believing parents, for none others would have brought them for such a purpose, is to us a self-evident truth; and is an encouragement to all believing parents that their offspring, prior to personal accountability, are accepted by Christ for the parents' sake. Such is our opinion of the matter. All other children we leave in the hands of God, without questioning what disposal he will make of them. If unbelieving parents are troubled about their children, let them submit themselves to Christ. While they reject him themselves, and refuse to accept his salvation, let them not murmur because their infants are likely to share the same fate as their parents.

A "NON-RESURRECTION" DISCUSSION.

On the 27th of October last I addressed to Br. Miles Grant, Editor of the Crisis, a letter in which I invited him to engage with me in a public oral debate, in Kast Hall, Boston, on the relation of the wicked dead to a future life. I stated that I would prefer to assume the Affirmative, but left him free to elect which of us, in the event of a discussion, should take that position, I presented a series of twelve questions, giving Br. G. permission to select any one of them, and at the same time stating that, if he could not suit himself from the list, there were four other forms of question which I was ready to offer him. The questions which I submitted were the following:—

1. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will live again?

2. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will be made alive?

3. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will live again by a resurrection?

4. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will be made alive by a resurrection?

5. Do the Holy Scriptures warrant the belief that the wicked dead will ever have a conscious existence?

6. Do the Scriptures teach that the wicked, by a resurrection, will come to life again after they have died.

7. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not live again?

8. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not be made alive?

9. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not live again by a resurrection?

10. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not be made alive by a resurrection?

11. Do the Holy Scriptures warrant the belief that the wicked dead will never have a conscious existence?

12. Do the Scriptures teach that the wicked will not, by a resurrection, come to life again, after they have died?

Br. Grant, in replying to my letter, objected to the foregoing forms of question, and submitted two others for my acceptance. Of these the first was the following: "Do the Scriptures teach a universal resurrection of the dead?" This I rejected as being manifestly improper, on the ground that it, would as much require, of the one affirming it, proof that the Righteous will be raised as that the Wicked will be. But no question should demand the Affirmative to prove what the negative does not deny. The other question offered by Br. G. was as follows: "DO THE SCRIPTURES TEACH THE NON-RESURRECTION OF THE WICKED?" This pleased me perfectly and was accepted with pleasure. Up to the present time Br. G. and myself have not found it mutually convenient to attend to the discussion, but we decided yesterday that it should take place early in March. The precise time will be seasonably announced in the Crisis and this paper.

When I sent Br. Grant the invitation to debate, I desired him to stipulate in advance that neither of the disputants should, without the other's concurrence, have the right to terminate the discussion in less than ten evenings. He, however, judges that the discussion should not in any event consume so much time. But we have found no difficulty in arranging this point. Six evenings have been decided on, and two additional evenings are conditionally provided for. On the fifth evening the disputants are each to signify their wish in reference to a seventh evening and let the audience decide the matter by vote. On the sixth evening (in case it does not conclude the discussion) the same method shall determine whether the debate shall be extended to the eighth evening.

The parties to the discussion have agreed to invite their mutual friend, J. F. PICKERING, Esq., of Boston, to serve them as Moderator. Mr. P. presided at the debate, in the fall of 1863, between Elders Grant and Gates. He has expressed a desire to hear the issue between Br. Grant and myself controverted in a public discussion.

The question which I have accepted is not of doubtful import, Br. Grant having explicitly stated that he means by the resurrection of the righteous and wicked that "they will come to life again after they have died." He will, therefore, expect me to offer reasons for my belief that the ungodly will not "come to life again after they have died." With the help of God, this duty will be undertaken with great pleasure. May Heaven's blessing crown the effort. RUFUS WENDELL.

REMEMBERING INJURIES.

I was visiting a few weeks since among a people who had recently been bereaved of their pastor. He had felt himself called soon after the outbreak of the rebellion, to leave his parish, and serve God by standing up for his country against traitors in arms. At his self-selected post of duty, he had nobly fallen—a hero and a martyr. It was touching to hear from every lip among his people, testimonials to his rare worth and fidelity, both as a man and a minister.

One praised his personal endowments, and spoke of his beaming eyes and radiant smile. Another particularly commended his industry and averred that he was always at work. A third spoke of his humility—he never seemed to feel above the poorest of his flock, and was not ashamed to put his hand to any manual labor or drudgery. Many testified to his candor and his consistency, all to his conscientiousness and exemplary walk in daily life, and his uncommon power in the pulpit.

But among all these sincere and affectionate tributes to the loved and lost, none touch-

LUTHER LEE ON THE DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

The intelligent student of the Bible, I think, cannot fail to perceive the truth of the following position: That death is the full and final penalty of sin. Of course, in this proposition I make no allusion to national penalties; but to the end of sin personally considered. The principle I have stated runs parallel with the Revelations of God, and may be found on almost every page of the Scriptures. And I apprehend, we shall find but one penalty, in reference to the final destiny of man, from Genesis to Revelation. The penalty of Adam's sin is the penalty of the divine law, in every dispensation. If we sustain this position, Mr. Lee's whole superstructure crumbles into dust.

1. The penalty of Adam's sin is thus expressed: "Thou shalt surely die." This penalty is subsequently explained by the Lord, thus: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou shalt return to the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and to dust shalt thou return."

I wish it fully, distinctly and indelibly, impressed on the reader's mind, that the penalty of Adam's sin was not "eternal torments," but death—a death unbroken by a resurrection—a death perpetual in its dominion, unless some means were devised for his redemption.

Death, then, was and is the penalty of the law. Paul, in his letter to the Romans, presents this subject very lucidly, chapter v. 12, &c. "Wherefore as by one man (Adam) sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."

Here we are taught that by sin, death—thanatos, came into the world, or kosmon; and this by the sin of one man,—Adam. No man can doubt but this death was the penalty of the law, and that but for this violation of law, death would not have entered the world. This fixes the meaning of the penalty, and shows it to be literal death. But "death passed upon all men, in whom"—i. e., in Adam—"all have sinned." The word dierchomai, here rendered "passed" signifies to pass through, to pass over, to be propagated. Death, therefore, was propagated to the race. Adam, himself, being cut off from the tree of life; and the whole race being in his loins at the time, in him they sinned—i. e., became "subject to vanity," and with him they came under the law of death.

We shall have occasion to refer to this chapter again, and will, therefore, for the present, say no more on its contents.

In Rom. vi. 23, Paul states the principle we have presented—"the wages of sin is death." This is a general principle—a universal law, running through the Oracles of God.

There are many other proofs of this position, but these must now suffice. I regard the point as established, then, that death, and not the manner of dying, is the penalty of law—that the penalty is one and not many.

Having presented this general principle, or law, I shall now notice Mr. Lee's proofs of endless misery. He refers to Mark ix. 43, 44. "It is better for thee to enter into life, maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."

The punishment here indicated is in gehenna, which is never used to denote "future punishment" of men, after the resurrection. The Lord refers to Isaiah, where the same phraseology is found in reference to the destruction of Israel's enemies at the coming of the Lord. The passage in Mark refers to the destruction of the Jews. Jesus taught his disciples that it was better for them to loose a hand, foot, or eye, and thus enter life; than to go into gehenna and be consumed by its fire, and devoured by its worms.

That the "worm" means a guilty conscience is a perfect fiction—the offspring of a distempered imagination.

2. His next proof is Luke xvi. 19–31, which is the parable of the rich man. This we have already examined, and shall let it pass.

3. His third proof, in the article before me, is Rev. xxi. 14, 15. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. For without are dogs and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." Upon this Mr. Lee remarks—"there is not the slightest allusion to annihilation." And I will add—not the "slightest allusion" to "eternal misery." There is no proof that they are even alive, much less in torments. They are merely said to be "without the city;" and, for all this text proves, they may be dead and devoured by worms! Besides their state stands opposed to "having a right to the tree of life"—the privilege of living, and must therefore be death.

4. Mr. Lee also refers to Rev. xiv. 11—"The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever." Mr. Lee observes on this—"we need not inquire whether or not this text relates to the final destiny of sin," &c. This is not the only text that Mr. Lee has taken for granted refers to the destiny of sinners; and before quoting this, or them, he should have "inquired" whether or not they related to the destiny of the wicked. This is "important to the argument," for "the "representation" is not "borrowed" from their final destiny. The passage clearly refers to the torments of the living, in the present state, who "worship the beast and his image" and contains no allusion to to the destiny of sinners in a future state.

5. His next proof is Rev. xx. 10. "Shall be tormented day and night forever and ever."

Mr. Lee is evidently straitened for proof of endless torments, or else he would not have quoted a passage so irrelevant to his subject. The Devil is here said to be cast into "the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet were and (the devil) shall be tormented day and night forever and ever." Whatever the Devil may be a symbol of in this place, the beast and false prophet are symbols of civil and ecclesiastical powers, which meet with their final overthrow in a place called "the lake of fire;" and I have no objection to the Devil's meeting his fate in the same place, although he should be "tormented" as long as "day and night" shall continue; for his end is destruction. See Heb. ii. 14.

6. Mr. Lee refers to the following expressions on the duration of punishment: "To be cast into everlasting fire." Math. xviii. 8. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment," chap. xxv. 46. "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire" verse 41. 2 Thess. i. 9. "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction."

"In this argument," he says, "we rely wholly upon the duration of the suffering." Leaving out the word "suffering," which is not warranted by Mr. Lee's proofs, I would observe, that we are perfectly agreed as to the duration of the punishment. Mr. Lee, however, has thrown together texts which have no connexion, and, without stating the context, presses them all into his service. Truly, Mr. Lee is a great sophist!

Mr. Lee quotes Rom. i. 18. "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." This is a truth, which I presume, none will deny; but I cannot see any proof of Mr. Lee's position in it.

He again refers to Rom. ii. 8. 9; and as we have promised to examine this passage more fully, we will now proceed to do so.

Having proved "both Jews and Gentiles to be under sin," the Apostle thus addresses the Jews: "Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whoever thou art, that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another," (the Gentiles) "thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest, doest the same things." "But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth, against them who commit such things"—whether they be Jews or Gentiles. "And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them who do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?" This was "the Judgment of God," upon the Jews, a judgment which they did not escape. "Or dispisest thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long suffering," (to thee, O Israel;) "not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth them to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up to thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who by patient contin- in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality—eternal life:—But to them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness—indignation and wrath; tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; but glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God." Jews and Gentiles stand on an equal footing before God. The Jews have received their indignation, wrath, tribulation, and anguish; these were poured upon them in the day of judgment upon Israel. They treasured up wrath against the day of wrath, and met with a terrible overthrow. Thus it fell upon the Jew first. They were contentious and would not obey the truth; they sought not for glory, honor, nor immortality; and therefore, God will never give them eternal life.

The day of judgment upon the Gentiles is now shortly coming upon them, when they will meet with a similar fate. The Apostle continues:—"For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish," apolountai from apollumi, perish—be destroyed—rendered vain—brought to nought:—"and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law," &c.

I have been thus particular on this passage, because I do not design returning to an exposition of it again. The reader will see nothing in this passage, favorable to the doctrine of endless misery.

7. Mr. Lee also quotes Heb. x. 28–31. See the passage. Paul, in writing to Hebrews, or Jews, who had many temptations to apostacy, says—"For if we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins. But a certain fearful apprehension of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries," or apostates. "He that despised Moses' law, died without mercy," (died without obtaining mercy) "under two or three witnesses: of how much more severe punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God," as the Jews had done, "and hath counted the blood of the covenant, by which he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the spirit of grace!" Paul teaches these Hebrews, that, if they apostatized, they would be counted worthy of a more severe punishment than the law of Moses inflicted—even a "fiery indignation which should devour" them. "And now," says he, "the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back to" destruction—or "perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

8. Mr. Lee's final proof of "eternal misery," is founded on the fact that "the Scriptures associate the punishment of sinners with the existence and punishment of devils," &c.

Upon this point we shall say but little, simply because whatever the punishment of fallen angels may be, Mr. Lee has no right thence to conclude that such will be the punishment of sinners. Mr. Lee says he will not undertake to prove that devils are disembodied spirits. I think he does well not to undertake it!

There is only one passage to which he refers, which has a sufficient bearing upon the question for me to notice it; and that is Matt. xxv. 41:—"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels."

This sentence is pronounced upon those out of the nations, who refuse to submit to Messiah's authority when He sits upon David's throne. Mr. Lee assumes they are persons raised from the dead. The "angels" spoken of may be no than the messengers, or agents, who are at that time sentenced to condemnation.

Mr. Lee has now finished his direct testimony on the punishment of the wicked, and the reader will observe that the larger portion of his evidence is in the Book of Revelation, which is confessedly the most highly symbolical book in the Bible. If "eternal torment" be the final destiny of sinners, it is very strange we do not find it taught in unfigurative and unmistakable language. The opposite view is everywhere presented in such language, that, it seems to me, no one should mistake it. This will appear manifest before we close.

It is proper that I should state here, that, Mr. Lee, having finished the presentation of his direct evidence, devotes the remainder of his articles to answering objections; and, therefore, as I shall follow him, the reader will see in my next article a digression from the present topic. But I shall return to it again, and not only answer his objections, but present direct testimony in favor of our view. We shall try fully to answer the question—What is the destiny of the wicked? Homo.

THE PARABLE OF THE NOBLEMAN.

BY A. GUTHRIE.

I wish to give a few thoughts on the parable in Luke xix. 12–27.

In Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. page 51, we find the following facts, which help to illustrate the parable. He says, "Herod, misnamed the great, by his will divided his dominion among his three sons. Archelaus, Herod Antipas, and Herod Philip. To Archelaus he assigned Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, with the regal dignity, subject to the approbation of Augustus, who ratified his will as it respected the territorial division, but conferred on Archelaus the title of Ethnarch, or chief of the nation, with the promise of regal dignity if he should prove himself worthy of it. Archelaus entered upon his new office amid the loud acclamation of his subjects, who considered him as a king. Hence the evangelist, in conformity with the Jewish idiom, says that he reigned. (Matt. ii. 22). His reign, however, commenced inauspiciously; for, after the death of Herod and before Archelaus could go to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his father's will, the Jews having become very tumultuous at the temple, in consequence of his refusing them some demands, Archelaus ordered his soldiers to attack them; on which occasion upwards of three thousand were slain.

"On Archelaus going to Rome to solicit the regal dignity, (agreeably to the practice of the tributary kings of that age, who received their crowns from the Roman emperor), the Jews sent an embassy, consisting of fifty of their principal men, with a petition to Augustus that they might be permitted to live according to their own laws, under the Roman governor. To this circumstance our Lord evidently alludes in the parable related in Luke xix. 12–27. A certain nobleman (a man of birth or rank the son of Herod) went into a far country (Italy) to receive for himself a kingdom (that of Judea) and to return. But his citizens (the Jews) hated him, and sent a message (or embassy) after him (to Augustus Cæsar) saying 'We will not have this man to reign over us.' The Jews however failed in their request, and Archelaus having received the kingdom (or ethnarky) on his return inflicted a severe vengeance on those who would not that he should reign over them."

Now for the application. Our Saviour spake this parable to correct a misapprehension that had obtained among the disciples that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. Christ is the nobleman, or king's son. The Jews many of them said we have no king but Cæsar, and he pronounced judgment nationally upon them. His mission, at that time to them, was the good news of life, or of the kingdom; for he says in Matt. xxiv. 14, "This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." The Saviour calls the money committed to them, in this parable, "true riches," in the explanation of a preceding one. Paul calls it a "treasure in earthen vessels." He said unto them "Occupy till I come." Again he said, "I go to the Father." Daniel the prophet saw, in vision, "one like the Son of man, come with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days: and there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." David said, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool." Those who occupy in his absence are "The children of God by faith," and when he returns they will become the inheritors by "being the children of the resurrection," and appointed a place in his kingdom, or over five or ten cities; or, as it is said in another place, "Ye shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." "But those mine enemies who would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me."

WHAT BECOMES OF INFANTS?

BY CATHARINE C. WILLIAMS.

T. W. W., in the Herald of Life for Sept. 14th, says, There is no one subject that has perplexed me more since I embraced the life views, than that of the future of infants; and then he asks, Are they, or are they not, subjects of the atonement? It may be some consolation to the above named individual to know that he is not alone, that his perplexity is the general experience of the thoughtful, judging both from experience and observation. Almost the first question of those who hear the ground plan of the Life views for the first time is, Well, if things are so, what will you do with infants?

As this question interests so many, and will arise, and must be met, I should like to state my mode of answering it, which is something after this fashion—If God has a plan, as doubtless he has, and has revealed it, it seems to me everything should bend to that, instead of trying to bend his plan to meet our sympathies. I feel it is best to try to find out what that plan is, understand and conform to it, though it crush some scheme which, viewed in the light of his plan, is fraught with mischief. We know how precious are our babes; how gladly we would have them returned to us again, those of us who have had them snatched away by death; but the question is not, what would we have, but what is the truth in the matter? 'Tis true we might, as the Editor consolingly remarks, "safely leave all in the hands of the all-wise God, who will do all things well;" but to me it is more comfortimg to understand my Father's plan, if I can. And can we not? Does he not plainly tell us who will have eternal life, and how it can be attained? "God visited the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name." Jesus gave himself for us to purify to himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. God gave his Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, &c. These and many other kindred passages seem to indicate clearly what class may expect eternal life;-and also to point out the philosophy of that state which needs to be considered in order to appreciate the requisite fitness for a condition where laws are unknown, and love to God and each other is the supreme governing principle.

Every promise of a future state seems so connected with the conditions of attaining it, as to leave no doubt as to who will be thought worthy of it, and also to leave no ground for hoping that any others than those designed will be; so that with regard to infants my only hope for them lies here. The passage quoted by the Editor, and also Paul's declaration, "else were your children unclean, but now are they holy," &c., seems to afford believers some ground of hope. It does not seem to me unreasonable, inasmuch as God knows the end from the beginning, that he should raise up such of the race, of those who died in infancy, as would, had they been spared, become good and pure; but none believe all who die young would have become so, had they lived. There is no virtue, as I can see, in not doing what one can not.

Young wild animals, venomous snakes, and reptiles are harmless; but the nature is there, waiting growth and development. So with infants, the nature is there. And the heathen, they have not the law; so law, so far as this world is concerned, is not binding on them. But does this make out that they are pure in heart? or that they do not live after the flesh? Does it make out that they deny themselves ungodliness and worldly lust, and live soberly? God is impartial: every one, everywhere, who fears him and does right is accepted, law or no law. Such alone could make a perfect state of society which must necessarily consist of tried ones.

One passage much relied on to prove the selvation of all infants will be found, I think, on a careful examination of the context to afford no proof of such a consummation. I allude to Jesus' words—"Suffer little children to come unto me," &c.; and also, "Except ye be converted and become as little children (become when they are converted) ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." It is very evident that "little children, that believe in me," are the little ones intended. Probably Job's views of what would have been his condition had he been "carried from the womb to the grave," as he at one time regretted he had not been, is as near correct (or more so) as those who expect all infants will be raised to life. We all die because we are mortal: "flesh and blood which can not see the kingdom of God." Being begotten of corruptible seed, we are necessarily corruptible, and must needs be begotten again by the word of God, which is incorruptible, and be born again, by the resurrection from the dead, in order to inherit eternal life.

If it was really certain that all infants were entitled to eternal life, because they neither did nor could sin, who could help thinking, however revolting to their instincts, that it would be far better not to risk their eternal well-being by having them grow up? How does it bid a bounty on elicit indulgencies and infanticides, and justify the heathen mother's offering of her babes to crocodiles and heathen deities. Better try to learn to rightly appreciate the gift of life, and to consider our offspring as rich boons from heaven, placed under our care to keep, improve, polish, and fit to shine as the stars for ever and ever. And if we fail to do this through ignorance, carelessness, vanity or pride, and our babes are taken from us in consequence, let us not arraign Providence, nor seek to pervert the laws of the all-wise Father to meet our sympathies; but let his laws take their course, and rejoicingly confide all to him, who is "too wise to err, and too good to be unkind."

Note by the Editor.—On the text "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," &c., we do not see with our much esteemed Sister in her explanation. Luke says, explicitly, "They brought unto him infants, that he should touch them; but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them; but Jesus called them and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." Now, that truly converted persons are compared to little children, and called little ones, we admit; but that these little children, brought to Christ for his blessing, were "infants," brought by believing parents, for none others would have brought them for such a purpose, is to us a self-evident truth; and is an encouragement to all believing parents that their offspring, prior to personal accountability, are accepted by Christ for the parents' sake. Such is our opinion of the matter. All other children we leave in the hands of God, without questioning what disposal he will make of them. If unbelieving parents are troubled about their children, let them submit themselves to Christ. While they reject him themselves, and refuse to accept his salvation, let them not murmur because their infants are likely to share the same fate as their parents.

A "NON-RESURRECTION" DISCUSSION.

On the 27th of October last I addressed to Br. Miles Grant, Editor of the Crisis, a letter in which I invited him to engage with me in a public oral debate, in Kast Hall, Boston, on the relation of the wicked dead to a future life. I stated that I would prefer to assume the Affirmative, but left him free to elect which of us, in the event of a discussion, should take that position. I presented a series of twelve questions, giving Br. G. permission to select any one of them, and at the same time stating that, if he could not suit himself from the list, there were four other forms of question which I was ready to offer him. The questions which I submitted were the following:—

1. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will live again?

2. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will be made alive?

3. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will live again by a resurrection?

4. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will be made alive by a resurrection?

5. Do the Holy Scriptures warrant the belief that the wicked dead will ever have a conscious existence?

6. Do the Scriptures teach that the wicked, by a resurrection, will come to life again after they have died.

7. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not live again?

8. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not be made alive?

9. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not live again by a resurrection?

10. Do the Holy Scriptures teach that the wicked dead will not be made alive by a resurrection?

11. Do the Holy Scriptures warrant the belief that the wicked dead will never have a conscious existence?

12. Do the Scriptures teach that the wicked will not, by a resurrection, come to life again, after they have died?

Br. Grant, in replying to my letter, objected to the foregoing forms of question, and submitted two others for my acceptance. Of these the first was the following: "Do the Scriptures teach a universal resurrection of the dead?" This I rejected as being manifestly improper, on the ground that it, would as much require, of the one affirming it, proof that the Righteous will be raised as that the Wicked will be. But no question should demand the Affirmative to prove what the negative does not deny. The other question offered by Br. G. was as follows: "Do the Scriptures teach the non-resurrection of the wicked?" This pleased me perfectly and was accepted with pleasure. Up to the present time Br. G. and myself have not found it mutually convenient to attend to the discussion, but we decided yesterday that it should take place early in March. The precise time will be seasonably announced in the Crisis and this paper.

When I sent Br. Grant the invitation to debate, I desired him to stipulate in advance that neither of the disputants should, without the other's concurrence, have the right to terminate the discussion in less than ten evenings. He, however, judges that the discussion should not in any event consume so much time. But we have found no difficulty in arranging this point. Six evenings have been decided on, and two additional evenings are conditionally provided for. On the fifth evening the disputants are each to signify their wish in reference to a seventh evening and let the audience decide the matter by vote. On the sixth evening (in case it does not conclude the discussion) the same method shall determine whether the debate shall be extended to the eighth evening.

The parties to the discussion have agreed to invite their mutual friend, J. F. Pickering, Esq., of Boston, to serve them as Moderator. Mr. P. presided at the debate, in the fall of 1863, between Elders Grant and Gates. He has expressed a desire to hear the issue between Br. Grant and myself controverted in a public discussion.

The question which I have accepted is not of doubtful import, Br. Grant having explicitly stated that he means by the resurrection of the righteous and wicked that "they will come to life again after they have died." He will, therefore, expect me to offer reasons for my belief that the ungodly will not "come to life again after they have died." With the help of God, this duty will be undertaken with great pleasure. May Heaven's blessing crown the effort. Rufus Wendell.

REMEMBERING INJURIES.

I was visiting a few weeks since among a people who had recently been bereaved of their pastor. He had felt himself called soon after the outbreak of the rebellion, to leave his parish, and serve God by standing up for his country against traitors in arms. At his self-selected post of duty, he had nobly fallen—a hero and a martyr. It was touching to hear from every lip among his people, testimonials to his rare worth and fidelity, both as a man and a minister.

One praised his personal endowments, and spoke of his beaming eyes and radiant smile. Another particularly commended his industry and averred that he was always at work. A third spoke of his humility—he never seemed to feel above the poorest of his flock, and was not ashamed to put his hand to any manual labor or drudgery. Many testified to his candor and his consistency, all to his conscientiousness and exemplary walk in daily life, and his uncommon power in the pulpit.

But among all these sincere and affectionate tributes to the loved and lost, none touched me like the following: "Our minister had one trait which you don't often see, and which I shall not soon forget: he never seemed to remember an injury. I was prejudiced against him when he came here, and spoke harshly and bitterly. I know that he was informed of it; but he always treated me as kindly as if I had been his best friend. It breaks my heart to think of it; and if ever I meet him in heaven, I shall want to throw my arms around his neck and beg him to forgive me."

"And I too," rejoined a neighbor who had listened to the foregoing, "got angry at him once, and without cause, and tried to injure him. But he would not see it; and when I was laid up with the rheumatism, he drove my cow to pasture every day, and treated me like a brother."

Oh, may it be said of me when I am in my grave, what these stout men said with tears, of their gifted pastor, "He never seemed to remember an injury."—Cong.

Babylon is Fallen.

The great Babylon of America has been slavery. We have labored and prayed against this enormous sin for thirty years; and not one morsel of our hatred has been abated against that God dishonoring and heaven-defying institution. We rejoice therefore in being able to record this day that the all-important blow has been struck which lays this monster sin in the agonies of death. Congress has at length spoken out, that, "Liberty shall be proclaimed throughout all the land, to all the inhabitants thereof." For this we praise YAHVEH—the great DELIVERER. True, He has had to harden the hearts of our modern Pharaohs—the Slaveholders; and in their time of madness has been God's opportunity to stir up our Rulers to "break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free." The nation looks now like keeping such a "fast as YAHVEH has chosen."

The U. S. Senate having, on the 8th of April last, initiated by the decisive majority of 38 to 6, the following Amendment to the Federal Constitution:

ART. XIII.—SEC. 1. Neither Slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, of which the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The House, after debate, proceeded (June 15th) to vote thereon, and it was lost—Yeas 95; Nays 64—the Constitution requiring an affirmative vote of two thirds in either House to launch a Constitutional Amendment.

During the present session of Congress, Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved that the above vote be reconsidered; and the issue thus raised, having been passed upon by the People in the late Presidential Election, has been debated at the present session at much length by some twenty to thirty Members. Finally, after a successful resistance to motions to lay on the table, &c., the House, on the 31st day of January, A. D. 1865, came to a final vote on the above, having listened to forcible speeches in its favor from Messrs. McAllister and Coffroth of Pennsylvania, and Herrick of this city—all Democrats who had voted against it at the last Session. The vote was finally taken, and the Amendment affirmed by Yeas 119; Nays 56—three more than were necessary in the affirmative. So the Amendment is fully sanctioned by Congress, and now goes to the Legislatures of the States, three-fourths of which must ratify it by a majority vote to render it a part of the Constitution.

This constitutional amendment has been received by the people with enthusiasm, and is being acted upon by the Legislatures of some of the States with promptness. Already it has been fully ratified by several States. In a speech which President Lincoln made on Wednesday night, last week, in response to a serenade in honor of the success of the amendment in the House of Representatives, he said that, while some might entertain doubts about the legal validity of the abolition of slavery by his proclamations, none could cavil when it was decreed by the concurrence of three-fourths of the States in the resolution adopted by Congress.

The work of ratifying the amendment by the several States goes bravely on. It seems the honor of being the first in this work belongs to Missouri; being ratified in the Senate by a vote of 18 to 2; and in the House by yeas 83 to nays 8. Hail Missouri, redeemed from the curse of slavery, she at once puts forth her hands to redeem others.

The Peace Movement Failed.

There has been much talk of peace for the past week or two, but the effort failed; as it seems the rebel agents, who met President Lincoln and Secretary Seward at Fortress Monroe, last week, only wanted an armistice and the consideration of the maintainance of the Union to be postponed to another time. Says the New York Herald:

Mr. Lincoln informed them that the preservation of the Union must be a condition precedent to any other arrangements, and that he would never consent to but one cessation of hostilities and that would be the final one. Four hours of good-natured, civil talk ensued; but it all resulted in nothing more than we have already stated.

"The truth is that the rebels are very hardly pressed by our armies. They see that by the sword they must perish, and so they have sought to save themselves by negotiation and diplomacy. But in this Mr. Lincoln has shown himself more than a match for them. They have found him amiable and courteous, but firm and inflexible as the everlasting rocks. He has now satisfied the clamorous peace men of the North, who have pertinaciously insisted that soft words would melt the hearts of the obdurate rebels. Talk is of no use. All that remains is to fight it out, and the quicker that is done the better."

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 8, 1865.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

"The Life and Advent Union" have held two of these meetings, and with profit. The time and place of the third has not yet been definitely fixed on, but it is highly probable it will be in New York city, about the time of the Passover in April; if so, due notice will be given, and we shall expect the feast to be one of uncommon interest. Our friends in New York and Brooklyn are "devising liberal things; and by liberal things shall they stand:" so saith the word of the LORD; and so may it prove.

A Word to Correspondents.

When we were publishing the Bible Examiner one of our rules was the following:

"Each writer is required to state his own views on the topic he takes up, without a direct personal controversy with any other writer in our columns. This course does not restrict liberty of expression, but will save personal feelings."

This rule we found to be of great service in conducting that Magazine; and we were disposed to adopt it when we entered on our duties as Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE, but were over persuaded not to insist upon it. Our mind is unchanged on the subject, and we shall hereafter adhere to this rule. Brethren may differ, and express their own views without such direct personalities just as well as with; and what they say will be better received by our readers; for, when there is the appearance of an attempt to harass another who writes for the same paper, such articles become disagreeable to a portion of readers. State your own positions strong and clear as possible; but refrain from a direct attack on other correspondents. We believe the rule above is both wise and just; and we hope all our friends will see it in the same light. By it, we shall be saved from personal irritations, which the opposite course is liable to engender, and the truth will be more likely to be promoted. This rule does not interfere with any review of articles in other papers: it applies, as it is distinctly expressed, to "other writers in our columns."

Definite Time for the Advent.

There are those who think they cannot live prepared for the advent of Christ unless they can fix on the definite time for that event; or at least are trying to find out such time. We have long been satisfied that such a spirit prevents a rational and scriptural preparation. The person who will not serve God without such excitement, acts not from principle, but an inferior motive, which is very likely to prove a cause of self-deception. If disappointment follows their calculations of time, they either set to work to hunt up another definite time or fall into a state of indifference, in the things of religion, which manifests that their zeal for the Lord's coming was not from love to his service, but from some other motive. They are ready in their excitement to say like Jehu, "Come see my zeal for the Lord;" when, in fact, it is the zeal of selfishness; like the loitering laborer who does his work earnestly only when he thinks his employer is about to see how he labors. True love to Christ is none the less dilligent when the time of the Lord's return is uncertain, than at other times. Such an one serves his Redeemer because he loves him, and desires to do all he can to promote the interests of Him who has bought him with his blood, whether it is by doing or suffering; nor would he choose to have his work close only at the time his Lord should decide.

The present attempted work to arouse excitement, as to the time of our Lord's return, has already begun to show its fruit in the censure of those who do not see it their duty to run the race of attempting to fix, by chronology, the time of the second advent; and, for the thousandth time, we are told, "the wise shall understand." Understand what? "The prophetic periods," say they. Well, what then? O, "the time of the advent," of course. And as they run they still shout, "The wise shall understand." But they assume themselves to be the wise.

Now, we really think, the wise will understand the deep folly of attempts to fix the definite time of our Lord's return from heaven by any of the prophetic periods. Let any of the definite time believers prove, if they can, there is one of those periods that give the precise time of the advent, either day, hour, or year. They never have done it; and, in our judgment, they never can; and we regard the attempt to do it as little less than rebellion against Christ; especially in such as have in time past had experience in such work.

Observe, we do not say the prophetic periods can never be understood; nor that the termination of some of them does not bring us into the vicinity of the advent; but we do say, not one of them give us the definite time—hour, day, or year—of that event. We regard our Lord Jesus Christ as having forever settled that question, when He said, "So ye.... when ye see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh at the door....Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is." Mark xiii. 29–33.

Here our Lord tells his followers they may know when the event is near; but explicitly affirms, the time they know not. We have put our view of this teaching of our Lord before timeists and challenged its refutation; but the silence of death reigns among all of them as to a reply. They seem to suppose they can drown our view by the perpetual cry, "The wise shall understand." Truly, we repeat it, they shall understand yet, more and more, the supreme folly of a disregard of our Lord's words.

That our readers shall have no cause to complain of us for neglecting to give full warning against the definite time movements, we will repeat some of our reasons for the disbelief of any such time being revealed for the second advent.

The whole argument in favor of its being revealed is based on assumed premises, or inferential conclusions. The one single positive assertion of our Lord is sufficient to settle this whole controversy in our mind. Mark xiii 32, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father." It is worse than idle for any man to say, that our Lord did not teach that we had not the definite year revealed; for, he guards against his words being thus perverted in the next verse,—"Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the TIME is. Now if the time is revealed in any of the prophetic numbers of Daniel, some man, some angel, or, the Son did make it known, and of course did know it. There is no escape from this conclusion but by doing violence to the words of our Lord; and those who persist in doing it may prepare themselves for greater trials than any they have yet experienced, if the Lord does not give them over to the wildest fanaticism. We put our argument in a logical form, thus:

If the definite time for the second advent is revealed, in the prophetic numbers of Daniel, some man, some angel, or the Son of God did reveal it, and must therefore know it.

Our Lord Jesus Christ saith—Ye know not when the time is: Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels, which are in heaven, neither the Son.

THEREFORE no man, nor angel, neither the Son hath made the time known, and the inference from the prophetic numbers of Daniel is false.

An attempt may be made, and one has just been by a writer in the Voice of the West, to evade the words of our Lord in Mark xiii., on the expression, "neither the Son." That writer tells us, that Dr. Clarke says: "I strongly suspect that the clause was not originally in this gospel." So, on a suspicion of Dr. Clarke, Jesus' words are to be totally disregarded! Truly the credulity that can be satisfied in that way, can very easily be satisfied not only of the definite year of the advent, but of the day, hour, and minute; for, some notable personage has only to "suspect," that, "of that day and hour knoweth no man," was "not originally in the text," and the difficulty is nearly over. Yet there happens to be another little difficulty in the text, viz., "Ye know not when the TIME is." Perhaps the writer in the Voice will find some other Doctor who will "suspect this clause was not originally in this gospel."

We begin very strongly to suspect that a time movement that needs such helps must have its origin from any other place than from heaven; and we suspect the men who engage in it will be found to be "blind leaders of the blind," and that both will "fall into the ditch." We shall say more when we think it called for, the LORD being our helper.

Loving the Time.

"It needs no argument to prove that when we love an event, we love the time connected with it . . . indifference to the time of an event is strong evidence that we are not interested in the event itself."—Crisis, Jan. 31.

Yes, Brother, if the time is revealed. That is the point you need first to prove, but never have, if you mean the hour, day or year of the second advent. It has been often enough assumed in the last twenty-five years, and always claimed "the wise shall understand" the time; but with all such wisdom there has been a uniform failure; and if the whole store of wisdom is not exhausted, it is our opinion, it would be better and more consistently employed in some other work, even if it were in cultivating the earth to get an honest living. We have seen enough of the ruin brought upon honest hearted individuals by the speculations of theorists on definite time. We desire to see no more of it; and we certainly do not intend to lend any aid to such vain speculations.

We do not yield to our Crisis brother, nor any other person, the palm of loving the event of Christ's appearing in glory, more than we do; and if we believed the precise time of that event was revealed, we do not yield to him, or any one else, the preeminence in endeavoring to find and proclaim it. Our past history, in that matter, will not suffer by a comparison with any who have believed, or do now believe in definite time. But experience, study, and further light on the word of eternal truth, has satisfied us, that, while we may know the event is near, the precise time is wisely hidden from all men, even the dearest saints of God. And when Jesus said, twice in the last chapter of Revelation, "Behold I come quickly," and a third time, "Surely I come quickly," he did not tell John the time; but he had given him a chain of events, the accomplishment of which would show the churches when that coming was near. That is just the position we maintain.

If any are disposed to spend the days still allowed us to work for God, in hunting after the time when their work shall end, or, like slothful servants, looking for sun-down, they must and will take their own course, and to their own Master they stand or fall; but we have no wish nor desire to be of that number; and if we can do anything to enable our readers and friends to be engaged in a more honorable and pious work, we shall rejoice. Let us all see to it that we are occupying the time and talents, our Lord has committed to us, so that when He shall come, we may be found in his work, and not seeking self-agrandizement or any selfish ends; but studying to be conformed to the will and mind of Christ. Then, whether he comes at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, in the morning, or at any other time, sooner or later, we shall be accepted of him. To such he will say, "Well done.... enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Chronology.

Two men have recently made their appearance as champions of a true Chronology, Wm. C. Thurman and John Stevenson. The latter adhers to Ptolemy's canon, and the former departs from it. The contest has waxed so hot between them, and their partizans, that the two champions have been brought face to face in a discussion on the subject, in Boston, during the week of Jan. 24 to 27. The following remarks from the Crisis will show how the Editor of that paper stands on the subject. He says:

"Few, probably, are better prepared to speak on the subject of Chronology than these two brethren. Both have devoted several years to the study of this subject. A large and intelligent audience was present, and manifested a deep interest. Many came a long distance for the purpose of listening to the discussion.

"The debate was conducted with a kind spirit, that added much to the pleasure of those who listened. It was a feast to those who love to investigate the Chronology of the Bible. It appears very evident, from the examination, that we are near the end of the present dispensation.

"We see light and harmony now, where before we saw only obscurity. It was very clearly shown that Ptolemy's canon, on which our chronology has been based, cannot be harmonized with the Bible; but when Ptolemy's errors are corrected, all seems to be harmonious. We think it was made quite plain that the only 'commandment to restore and build Jerusalem,' given in harmony with the Bible, was the one issued by Cyrus, which, according to Ptolemy's canon, was about B. C. 536; whereas the Bible will not allow but 69 weeks, 488 years between the commandment and our A. D. 1, or 483 years to the true birth of Christ, about B. C. 5, which is in harmony with the chronological arrangement of Bro. Thurman."

The following from the Advent Herald shows how DR. LITCH, Editor of that paper, viewed the matter in this same discussion. He says:

"The discussion between the two brethren came off during the past week. We were not able to attend all the sessions, but was deeply interested with what we did attend. While we are not a convert to the peculiar theories of either the disputants, we feel deeply interested in the great question in debate: 'Is the Canon of Ptolemy correct?' We are interested in it because the whole historical and chronological question is uprooted and unsettled if it is proved incorrect, and history and chronology is entirely afloat.

"We are now entirely at rest on that question. Mr. Stevenson, by the most indubitable arguments and proofs, has done what he pledged himself to do, proved the Canon true. He has done a mighty work for the Christian world, and shown himself a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, in the department of chronology. The report is not to be published."

Thus two Editors are seen to disagree, materially, as to the result of the discussion. While we would say nothing in disparagement of Br. Grant, we must say, we think the long study of the subject by Dr. Litch, gives his judgment, in this matter, the greatest weight in our mind. It matters not to us, personally, which of the chronological champions—Thurman or Stevenson—is right, or whether both are wrong, so far as the advent is concerned; for if they could demonstrate the precise age of the world, it would prove nothing as to the time of the coming of our Lord from heaven. Where is the evidence that it is to take place at the end of six thousand years? Plainly, there is no such revelation—God has given none; and the traditions or fancies of men in this matter, are "wood, hay, and stubble," that will not stand the fire of divine truth. Let all take heed that they do not build with such materials.

The difficulty of which the Crisis complains, of "harmonizing with the Bible our chronology, based on Ptolemy's canon," in our mind, is all solved by the fact that Cyrus the great, or Khosrau, is taken for Coresch; the latter being the true Bible Cyrus, who reigned at a later period. We called the attention of the readers of the Bible Examiner to this subject as long ago as 1848, and have since done the same thing in the HERALD OF LIFE. We have no doubt, and have not had for many years, that "the only commandment to restore and build Jerusalem" was given by Cyrus; not by Cyrus the great, B. C. 536, but by Coresch, or the Bible Cyrus about 444, B. C., and not 488 or 483, as the Crisis takes it to be. This "proclamation," Ezra i. 1–4, to restore and build Jerusalem, was made in the 60th year of the Babylonish captivity; and in the 49th of the desolations of Jerusalem. But we will not now enlarge on the subject. If necessary, hereafter, we will again reproduce our whole argument relating to it.

The Two Flocks.

I wish you to give your views of John x. 16, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." Yours for the truth, ROSWELL HART.

We can give our views briefly. Centuries before the advent of our Lord, the children of Jacob had been divided into two families or kingdoms—the kingdom of Judah, or the Jews; and the kingdom of Israel, sometimes called Ephraim, from that tribe being the leading one in that kingdom. Some hundred and fifty years before the Babylonish captivity of Judah, or the Jews, Israel had been carried away captive into Assyria, and planted in the cities of the Medes. See 2 Kings xvii. 6, also xviii. 18, 20, 23, 24. In other words, God gave the kingdom of Israel a Bill of Divorce and sent it away, and said, Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. See Hosea i. 6, 9.

This people never returned from their captivity; and, to the world, had no known nationality. They most likely had left Assyria for a more distant land long before the captivity of the Jews in Babylon; yet they must have had a being somewhere; for God had said of them, when he sent them out from under the law covenant, "Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which can not be measured nor numbered:" Hosea i. 10. They were thus under a pledge to be preserved, and, in due time, the same word of promise declared, "It shall come to pass, in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God." Hosea i. 10.

Now, the kingdom of Judah, alone, was in the land when Christ, the true Shepherd came; and were the fold from which He was gathering his flock. There was another fold—the kingdom of Israel—which contained "other sheep" not of the Jewish fold, and Christ pledges himself to bring them also, according to YAHVEH's promise in Hosea. Both folds are yet to be assembled and made one nation on the mountains of Israel: (See Ezk. xxxvii. 15–28) and one Shepherd and one King will be over them all. We might much enlarge, but we presume it is not necessary to do so now.

"Stop My Paper."

What for? Because:

"You have changed the character of the paper from the Herald of Life to advocate the prosecution of a war to the sacrifice of life and property, for the sole purpose of elevating an inferior race of beings to the rank of a superior race and still higher than equal; and justifying all the horrors of war and blood-shed, death, and carnage to effect a purpose purely political and sectional."

So writes one of our subscribers. We really think, to make such a war of words is no less criminal than to do it with any other carnal weapons. We hesitate not to say, There is not a word of truth in this statement of our subscriber. We will not say that he deliberately falsified the matter; we prefer to cover the fault with the plea of misapprehension on his part. His statements bear on the face of them evidence that he neither understands our position, nor the cause of the present war, either in its commencement or its continuance. He goes on to say:

"I am not in love with slavery, neither am I in favor of abolishing slavery by war. I am in favor of every State and every individual's minding their own business...... Now your political paper has got to be a 'purgatory' to me, and I wish to keep out...... You will please discontinue the Herald to me at the end of my subscription. God forbid that I should advocate the shedding of blood to overthrow an institution which the Lord himself established among men; and whose prerogative it is to change when His pleasure shall demand, in his own way; then may the nations rejoice and give God thanks, and the glory will be His and not the praise of arms."

Our friend is "not in love with slavery," he says, but he declares it is "an institution which the Lord himself established," &c. We are sorry he is so unholy. Holiness is harmony with God; but our friend does "not love" God's institution! Well, now, see how much better a man's heart can be than his head. God never established such an institution as American slavery: the imputation is a blasphemy. God is now overthrowing it "in His own way," and let "the nations rejoice and give God thanks." But instead of our friend's practicing his own preaching, he wishes a paper stopt that rejoices in the downfall of "the sum of all villanies." Bad as our paper is, he had rather be kept in "purgatory" seven weeks longer (seven Nos. being still due him) than lose twenty-eight cents by stopping it now. We hope our good, but mistaken friend may have "sober second thoughts" that will result in a more peaceable frame.

As a further apology for our friend, we ought, perhaps, to say, he is an inhabitant of New Jersey; the only free State that gave a pro-slavery vote at the Presidential election last November. May he live more in the light hereafter; for Babylon is fallen.

Tobacco

MRS. C. C. WILLIAMS, Shell Rock, Iowa, writes us as follows:

"There is a Preacher of 'the faith,' near us, who like many others—of various faiths—is a slave to tobacco. There was an article in the Bible Examiner, near its close, about eating, &c., that pleased him much. He felt to derive encouragement from it for his practice. Also, Jesus' words are used in justification, viz., 'Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man,' &c. For one, I cannot reconcile such a practice with that purity and self-denial that will fit for the future life. I wish you would define your position in the Herald."

We can very soon "define our position" on the filthy practice of using tobacco. "Touch not, taste not, handle not" the abominable thing. We pity any man whose moral, mental, or physical diseases make the use a necessity. We think hospitals out to be established for the cure of such poor unfortunates. It is a terrible disease which makes a well man sick to be compelled to come near the victim. We have our patience more tried by these "filthy dreamers," who smoke themselves into imaginary bliss, than by almost any other evil with which we come in contact; especially here in the city, where we can scarcely get a breath of pure air in the street or on a ferry-boat by reason of the stench from the mouths of smokers, and we cannot help thinking them well described in Rev. ix. 18, "By these was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths." As to that "Preacher of the faith," who comforts himself with the words of our Saviour, "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man," he should remember that Jesus also said, "But that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man." You only need contemplate an inveterate tobacco chewer or smoker to be convinced that filthiness "cometh out of his mouth." He indulges in the practice of using a weed that only two other animals in the world, beside man, will eat, viz., the Tobacco worm and "THE FILTHY WILD GOAT OF AFRICA."

God's Individual Plan.---No. 7

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

Having shown that the object of the Edenic trial was to demonstrate man's physical incapacity to harmonize with the spiritual law, we pass to a brief treatment of the results of the trial. In the condemnation of Adam as a representative of the animal race, and not as an individual, we find the true philosophy. If the nature is condemned, we perceive the justice of condemning all that bear the nature. "Law worketh wrath" to the flesh. Rom. iv. 15. The catechism of condemnation is very simple, very direct, and very comprehensive. Why are all men condemned? Because their nature is condemned. And why is their nature condemned? Because it is flesh. And why is the flesh condemned? Because the mind of the flesh is enmity against God? And why is the carnal mind enmity against God? Because it is not subject to the law of God. And why is it not subject to the law of God? Because it cannot be. Rom. viii. 7. And why can it not be? Because "the law is spiritual." Rom. vii. 14. As man is "not spiritual," but carnal, he "cannot please God." Rom. viii. 8. Paul states the case for all, from Adam down. "The law is spiritual but I am carnal, sold under sin." That is, man, without the help of the Spirit, is in complete bondage to his nature, and the lusts of that nature he must fulfil. Hence, Paul describes the utter weakness of the animal nature, and shows that even believers, as long as they are connected with it, are imperfect in the sight of the spiritual law. "For that which I [the essential man] do [through the fleshly natures] I allow not: for what I [the essential man] would, that do I not [because of the flesh]: but what I hate, that do I. If then I do, that which I would not, I consent unto the law, that is good. Now it is no more I [the essential man] that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh), [not in me, the essential man that has become spiritualized] dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not [I am yet connected with the flesh, and until I am delivered from its leaden weight, I must be content to do the best I can, and find my justification in Christ by faith]. For the good that I would, I do not; [what seems good is the work of the Spirit] but the evil which I would not, that I do. [The flesh often shows me its power and influence over me]. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me [my present nature]. I find then the law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me [in the condemned nature]. For I delight in the law of God after the INWARD MAN [which has been begotten by the Spirit]: but I see another law in MY MEMBERS [the present animal organism], warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. [When I consider my imperfection I groan out, for "ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit even we ourselves groan within ourselves"]. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me [the essential man] from this body of death [the condemned nature]? I thank God [who will deliver me] through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then, [until I am delivered] with the mind I myself [the essential man] serve the law of God; but with the flesh [as still connected with the condemned nature] the law of sin. [In view of this distinction between the essential man, begotten of the Spirit, and the flesh,] there is, therefore, now no condemnation to them who [having been begotten again in their essential being] are in Christ Jesus." Rom. vii. 15—viii. 1.

That the condemnation is on the nature, is shown in Eph. ii. 3. "Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were BY NATURE the children of wrath, even as the rest" [of mankind]. The same thing is evidently taught in Psa. li. 5. "Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me." There is no reference here to moral depravity, as is supposed by many, but to physical depravity, as wrought by the workings of the spiritual law against the animal nature.

Some may object to this view of the condemnation, because it makes the Almighty condemn that which he called "very good." We have already explained this expression in a previous article. Everything made by the Almighty was "very good"—it answered the purpose for which it was made. God simply condemned the animal nature as not in harmony with the spiritual law. If that law had not been introduced the animal nature would be just as good in man as in the other animals—not a whit better. The standard of goodness is spiritual—hence all flesh is condemned by that standard. "By deeds of law shall no flesh be justified in his sight; for by law is the knowledge of sin." Rom. iii. 20. Says Paul, "I had not known sin, but by law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without law sin was dead. For I was alive without law once: but when the commandment came, sin gained strength, and I died." Rom. vii. 7–9. This is an exact history of the Adamic trial. Sin would not have been known, if the law had not been introduced; and it was introduced, "that the offence might abound."

The condemnation was for good, and not for evil. If the Almighty had not had designs of mercy and love toward man, no spiritual law would have been known, and man would have utterly perished like the brutes of the field. So we magnify God for the condemnation, which, in the light of the justification by Christ, shines with resplendent glory.

"The law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and GOOD." Rom. vii. 12. "O that men would praise YAHVEH for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" "Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of YAHVEH." Psa. cvii.

The grand conclusion is, that men are condemned in their nature. Their acts, either good, bad, or indifferent, cannot affect the matter a whit. The Almighty divides men into two classes—"the spiritual" and "the sensual, having not the Spirit." With one class we rise to an immortal throne, or with the other we sink into oblivion. And ever since Adam was thrust out of Eden, the question to him and his posterity is, Have you the Spirit? All other standards are false.

The Rest of My Tour.

In Winsted I received the following letter (which had been in the post-office a month):

Br Wendell,—I have seen your name in connection with the believers of "No Life out of Christ." I am a Baptist clergyman, though I do not preach statedly. But I would say that I have studied and read much, and thought more, upon the subject of man's inherent immortality, and fully made up my mind he has none. My mind is now exercised as to whether the wicked dead will live at all, or have a resurrection. I am not settled on this point; but my purpose in writing this is to invite you to call on me, if you can make it convenient, during your tour in Conn. I understand you are to be at Winsted next week and at New Haven the Sunday following. I would gladly be at W., but my business will not permit. I live near the Canal railroad, half a mile from Bradley's Station; my post-office address is Mount Carmel, Conn. I would be very happy to see you at my place, and talk with you on future life, &c. From an earnest inquirer after truth,

THOMAS T. JENKS.

Hamden, Conn., Nov. 17, 1864.

This was a refreshing epistle. One from the same source, but without a signature was published by our EDITOR, with an appended note, in the Herald of Dec. 28th, under the heading "Yearnings After Truth." I bade adieu to Winsted on the morning of Dec. 24th, and, on my way to New Haven, visited Br. Jenks at his home. Found him to be in reality "an earnest inquirer after truth." He moves with great caution in the matter of receiving new views. But he moves! On the non-immortality of the wicked I found him established. For several years past there has been in his preaching no endless misery or going to heaven at death. The doom of the impenitent he has been accustomed to speak of in the terms the Scriptures employ, and when dwelling upon the future of the righteous he has made prominent the promises of the resurrection of the dead. His dissent from the received view he had never made public, though he had talked on the subject privately with various persons. He was, seemingly, waiting to get fully settled, one way or the other, on the question of no life for the wicked dead, before braving the perils of an open avowal of his convictions. Our pleasant interview of several hours, I felt well assured, accomplished something in this derection. The discourse which Br. and Sr. J. heard in New Haven the next afternoon did still more. I had opportunities to learn from several sources that Br. J. is held in esteem by the people among whom he lives and has labored as a minister. Sister Jenks had not progressed so far as her husband in the life doctrine; but she loves the truth and is looking into the subject. May the Lord lead them both fully into the glorious light, and make them a blessing in opening the eyes of many others.

On Saturday evening there was a Children's prayer meeting in Br. Denny's parlor. Br. D. himself took charge of the exercises, and the meeting was an excellent one. The Lord has done a precious work among the youth of the New Haven church. The spectacle is a beautiful one to behold. May the tender Shepherd continue to carry these dear lambs in his bosom.

Christmas Day will be long rembered by me. In the afternoon, I proclaimed Life only in Jesus Christ to an attentive congregation—taking John iii. 14–16 for a text. This truth is gradually spreading in the church there, while peace and harmony among its members remain undisturbed.

In the evening—pursuant to an arrangement of which I was apprised by letter while in Winsted—I preached on the Coming of the Lord to a Colored Methodist congregation. The delight with which I looked forward to this privilege was only exceeded by that which I derived from the occasion itself. Ordinarily, I avoid when I can preaching three times a day; but New Haven shall be an exception to this rule, if the third sermon can be to these colored people. Br. Denny knows my feelings on this point. I took for a text Acts i. 11 ("Ye men of Galilee," &c.); and I think that, all things considered, I never before had quite so good a time since I first tried to preach,

I had been told that many of those who would hear me had formerly been slaves, and that all were very ignorant; but I felt while speaking that every word was comprehended, and that the truth was like honey to their taste. The doctrine of the resurrection was made prominent, and was received as if it was the most blessed and soul-inspiring truth that ever fell on mortal ear. Such is its character; and who knows but that it will be our privilege as a people to carry the blessed tidings to the thousands in the South, whom the march of events is delivering from the wickedest and cruelest bondage the world ever saw? It is part of my faith that this grand emancipation movement, which is going on under our eyes, is the harbinger of glorious opportunities to those who desire to carry joy and gladness to the hearts of the lowly ones of earth. Sister N. M. Henry, don't you believe this?

Tuesday evening, Dec. 27th, found me at my old battle ground—Room 24, Cooper Institute, New York City. The N. Y. & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, with commendable fidelity to their appropriate work, keep up these meetings in the manner they did a year ago; and it is certain that their influence has told, and is telling for the advancement of the Life truth in the great Metropolis. Br. S. W. Bishop, the speaker of the evening, gave us an excellent discourse on the Old Testamant proofs of no life for the wicked dead. He afterwards responded to a variety of questions from the audience. (I gladly accepted the invitation to take some part in these latter exercises.) Among the questioners was Br. F. H. Burbank; who, if I do not greatly misjudge as to the tendency of his convictions, will himself, at no distant day, be helping others to see that the impenitent dead, having preferred the lethal potion of sin to the "living water" which Christ gives, must "sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awake."

In visiting the HERALD OF LIFE office, I found our beloved EDITOR and his working force at their post. The readers of this paper do not generally begin to know how incessant and toilsome are the labors of Brother STORRS. How he endures them as well as he does I do not see.

New Year's Day found me in Philadelphia. The friends there holding Life only in Christ have at length opened a meeting of their own, and erected their standard. I remained two Sundays. Our congregations were good, and the prospects encouraging. We held a meeting on the intervening Friday evening, but, owing to the "present rain," few were out. Still, the occasion was one of interest. The discourse was devoted to an examination of Acts xxiv. 14, 15. After it was finished, Br. Burbank, who was present to hear, rose and stated that that passage had been, up to that time, one of his proofs against the non-living of the wicked, but that he was entirely satisfied with the exposition that had been given, and that he could, therefore, no longer use it as an argument against our position! So much for the labors of a rainy night. Thank the Lord! I heard Br. Burbank preach on the second Sunday afternoon.

Of my pleasant visits in the families of Br'n White, Grim, Hahn, Boyd, McFarland, Park, Sr. McClain, &c., &c., I have some interesting reminiscences, but will make no note of them here. The kindness of the friends in P. and elsewhere is remembered with gratitude.

Monday evening, January 9th, I attended the annual donation visit given to Br. Samuel Curry by his parishioners, in his church on 24th street. Br. Joseph T. Curry was also present. Joseph's excellent remarks embodied thoughts which I remember wishing at the time he would write out for the paper.

Tuesday evening, January 10th, I was again at Cooper Institute, to hear Br. J. T. Curry preach on the "first recorded lie." The argument was clear and conclusive. The after exercises—questions and answers—possessed their usual interest. I was indulged in the priviledge of bearing testimony to the truth we love.

Thursday morning, January 12th, found me, after an all night's ride on the cars, at Providence, R. I. Of our excellent Conference in that city others have spoken in the paper. I enjoyed it exceedingly, and have no doubt that it gave an onward impetus to the cause of truth, besides widening and strengthening the bonds of fraternal love among those who enjoyed its priviledges. Br. Jenks was in attendance.

Gladly would I have remained over Sunday, but this I could not do. I reached home in safety on Saturday evening, after an absence of four weeks, and found my family well. Since then I have found plenty to do in my home field of labor. I was present during two sessions of the Stevenson and Thurman Discussion on Chronology, in Boston, but am too ignorant of the whole subject to give any opinion of its merits. It is not to be published.

A CORRECTION.—In my response to Br. Grant, in last week's issue, the wayward types made me say (in allusion to Br. G.)—"it is creditable to his head that he can not conscientiously reject the view which was taken of the matter by myself and many others." Instead of this, I meant and wrote as follows: "it is creditable to his heart that he can conscientiously reject the view which was taken of the matter by myself and many others." In the second paragraph, for "would countenance" read "would have countenanced."

Letters and Extracts.

From Catharine C. Williams.

ON BOARD STEAMER JACOB LAWRENCE, BOUND TO MEMPHIS, TENN, OCT. 13, 1864.

BR. STORRS:—It may not be altogether uninteresting to you to read a short explanation of the reason of my strange whereabouts. Although I doubt not your time is too valuable to admit of your troubling yourself much with merely personal details, yet if it can be made to subserve a good cause, it may perhaps be not altogether amiss. I do not know as I can explain my situation in any other way only as an answer to the deep, harrowing sympathies for our country's woes, and the cause for which so many mothers have offered up their beloved sons, &c., and for which mine, the only son old enough, was given up, and my earnest yearnings to contribute my feeble efforts toward mitigating the horrors of this terrible strife and ending this rebellion.

Without relaxing any effort I could make at home for this end, I have meanwhile shaped all my acts for the past six or eight months to the step I have taken, without seeing any way, however, how it could be. During this interim, I not unfrequently said to my husband, children, and friends, I intended to go to the army, if there was any call or opening; and unremittingly applied myself to making the necessary preparations for enabling my dear children to be comfortably cared for should I leave them, having one grown up daughter, and another nearly so, with a married nice to lead them. Unsought, and very unexpectedly, the call came the latter part of summer. Mrs. Annie Whittermyer, Agt. of the United States Christian Commission, applied to me to take charge of a special Diet kitchen, and see to the proper distribution of sanitary stores to low class patients. Accordingly, with many misgivings, I thought, the "Lord willing," I will go and do what I can; at the same time, I earnestly desired that if it was not right I should go, my way might be hedged so I could not. At last the necessary preliminaries were arranged, and obstacles were removed, and one week ago to-day my husband took me to the cars at Cedar Falls, our nearest R. R. Depot, and next morning the iron steed was a bearing me away from my loved ones. I knew not what for, nor whither; all I asked was, that my Father would go with me and lead the way, and grant the needed wisdom for any part I might be called to act.

I am required to report at Memphis, Tenn. I have met with some unavoidable detentions on the way; two days at Dubuque; and one at Louisville; otherwise it has been very pleasant, and with very little to remind one that war is in the land. It is my first day on steamboat. The boat is new and every precaution seems to have been taken to provide against disasters. Life preservers at hand with printed directions how to use them in case of need, and doors opening from every sleeping apartment on to the deck suggests the saying "in the midst of life we are in the midst of death." It is a lovely day; the scenery is grand on our right, the bank presenting a rocky face as though built up by a master mason, though frequently broken and gullied, and crowned with trees of richly verigated foliage; while the left suggests swamps; though the scenery varies alternately; but it is all worth a little sacrifice to see and enjoy. And must this noble river be given up to, or under the control of a foreign power? I trust this question has been settled at Columbus and other places on the way between here and Memphis.

I am informed it will take four days from St. Louis to that point, as the river is very low and sand bars not uncommon. We were aground the greater part of the night. On hearing this, I immediately began to cast about to see how the time could be employed so as to be of some use to somebody. Our luxuriously furnished parlor-cabin is supplied with a large splendid Bible, on a beautiful stand, but none seem disposed to disturb it. Light trash is handed around, and papers, such as the Ledger, &c. At length I thought of my HERALDS, which I brought along, together with two Bible Examiners, and some other good papers. I took them from my trunk, wrote on the outside margin, "Read, whoever wills, only please return them whence they were taken, folded right side out," and laid them in a place convenient of access and left them, hoping it would not be labor thrown away. There are two "Sisters of Loretts," I think they style themselves, on board. I introduced conversation with them. They have a singularly cheerful aspect. The oldest of the two, after a little talk said something like this, Could it be known how happy they were all would join them. Also, that all others were rebels, revolters (like "the rebellion") from the Roman Catholic church. I replied, You don't profess to date back farther than Peter, do you? No: Peter was their foundation. But the gospel was preached to Abraham, thousands of years before; and there were christians—good men—what do you think of that? She made no reply, sighed, turned and left, it seemed to me, in fear of having to confess to listening to heresy. The meshes that encircle them, and such like, are too strong to be broken, whether a good or evil net. 'Tis not to me they stand or fall. I am glad of that.

I have started under the auspices of the United States C. C.; whether or not I can do what will be required of me, without compromising what I consider truth remains to be seen. I thought from the nature of the requisition I could. But of this I can tell better by and by. I wanted to write to you before I left home, especially after reading your appeal to the friends of the cause to speak out and say what they could do; but I was obliged to leave what could be left till a more convenient season. I have also wanted to write my thoughts on some things, but could not well get to it. Now, as I have leisure, I will do something toward relieving my mind; though it may not be thought worth the space and time it would take to print it.

P. S., Dec. 30, 1864.—A long time has passed since the above was written. I purposed, when I wrote it to send you five dollars on arriving at Memphis; but on reaching there I thought it not best to spare it till I knew what I should do, and where I should be. I spent a month there, visiting hospitals and ministering, in various ways, to our sick and wounded, when I was sent for to go up to Louisville, where I arrived Thanksgiving day. I was engaged in Brown hospital there but a short time when letters came from home informing me of the sickness of my oldest and youngest daughters, and I very reluctantly (on the soldiers' account) retraced my steps, and one week ago last Thursday rejoined my dear family, after an absence of two months and an half of varied, interesting, and many harrowing scenes and touching incidents.

From Charles R. Percy.

NORWALK. CONN., Jan. 12, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—I would say, my health is still failing. Yet I hope, if it be God's will, to recover; but if it be my lot to be laid for a short time away, from the storms and commotions of this life, I feel that all will be well. O, yes, in my flesh I shall see HIM who's right it is to reign, and who will come, and will not tarry. What a glorious prospect to look forward to. And how I long to have it realized. Although life is sweet, and it is natural for man to love life and the society of loved ones here, yet the hope that is big with immortality hurries one along and enables him to pass o'er the rough places in this life, and long to be there. And how I love to read about these things.

We can not live without the Herald, of Life; for it has become a welcome visitor; and we hope to find those of the same faith here. But O, what a glorious time when all the scattered flock will be gathered, and all see alike. May the Lord add his blessing to what is being done to advance his cause the coming year, and cause more and more to see the truth and rejoice in it, is the prayer of your brother, who is in hope of eternal life only through Christ.

P. S. My Post Office address, hereafter, will be Darien Depot, Conn.

A Subscriber in New Jersey writes:—I am a firm believer in the doctrine which you advocate. Thanks to you for leading me to the light. I see a beauty in the Scriptures which I never saw before. I sometimes wonder I did not see the truth sooner, it is so plain. I like the Herald very much. I should not know how to get along without it. May God bless and sustain you in your toil is my prayer.

ROSWELL HART, Southington, Conn., writes:—I send you five dollars; wishing you to use it as you think best.

[We have applied it to help pay for a horse for Br. Thos. W. Smith, Iowa.—EDITOR.

ELD. WILLIAM BRAYTON, New Hartford, Butler Co., Iowa, writes:—Through the kindness of some friend I have had the privilege of reading the Herald of Life almost a year; for which I thank the Lord. I am doing all I can to advance the truth of no life out of Christ—no resurrection, no hereafter, if we die in our sins. There are some who begin to investigate and believe that this is a truth. I send you the name of one more subscriber. I am one looking for the coming and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

From Paris.

"There are those who think that what is passing in the whole religious world to-day, is but the harbinger of a great approaching change; of the dissolution of that system of medieval theocracy, which has exercised for a thousand years so great a power over the minds and consciences of men and the most of nations. Many of the most enlightened minds of this age are filled with a presentiment of an approaching storm; and though we are unable at present to foresee the results of a great ecclesiastical revolution, (of which the fall of the temporal power of the Papacy would probably be the signal) yet it is impossible for the most sanguine or the most indifferent to ignore that in every Europeon country a strong religious movement is taking place."

The above was clipped from the New York Tribune, and sent us by a lover of the "Herald." It is another witness to the fact that the world generally is waking up to the question of the fall of Papacy. Wise men without prophecy can see that it threatens to shake society, and should not the children of God see it? "Many of the most enlightened minds of the age," says the writer, "are filled with a presentiment of an approaching storm," and well they may be; for it is about to burst. Doubtless a wise Father intended this event should be so marked and prominent that as many as have a heart to understand should be the wiser for it. "But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end." Dan. vii. 24. See also Rev. xvii. 16, 17. May we all have grace to discern the signs of the times.

Romanism, or Papacy.

The Romanists seem terribly frantic at the exposure some of the New York papers make of their wicked designs against liberty, civil and religious. The Tablet of this city—a Roman Catholic paper—is amazingly disturbed at some of these exposures, and prates about its favor for civil and religious liberty." The Methodist well exposes this hypocracy. The Tablet professed the reason why Romanists, in this country, so uniformly vote the Democrat ticket was, that that party held to "civil and religious liberty." A part of the reply of the Methodist is as follows:

As to "civil and religious liberty," there is no difference of opinion among Whigs, Democrats or Republicans. It is next thing to an inborn sentiment of the American mind. But it is one of the transparent tricks of Romanist policy that while it hates both civil and religious liberty, it affects to be zealous for both. Has the Tablet forgotten that a few years ago General Cass, that eminent Democratic statesman and patriot, made a speech in the Senate, in which he took the broad American ground of universal toleration, and universal liberty of conscience, as well in Popish countries as here? And has it forgotten that Bishop Hughes made a labored reply to it, in which he employed all his rhetoric to ridicule both the speech and its author?

But fortunately for the cause of both civil and religious liberty, the Pope's bull has just been let loose upon the world. The mad animal, with blood in his eye, and a wisp of hay on each horn, with head down and tail up, rushes hither and thither, pawing the ground, and throwing dirt in general. We invite the Tablet to a few sentences of this remarkable demonstration of love that Rome feels for religious and and civil liberty. Out of the "most profound grief of soul" (this is the stereotyped phrase of every Pope since the days of Luther) he denounces those who hold that "the best condition of society is that in which the power of the laity is not compelled to inflict the penalties of law upon violators of the Catholic religion."

The Pope then is in favor of compelling the laity to inflict the penalties of law upon violators of the Catholic religion. What say you, O Tablet? do you agree with the Pope or not? Remember, before you answer that he is infallible.

Again, following Gregory XVI, and quoting his words, he denounces those who hold that "liberty of conscience and of worship is the right of every man—a right which ought to be proclaimed and established by law in every well-constituted State."

Now this very liberty which is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, the Pope calls "the liberty of perdition," which he would visit with civil pains and penalties.

We demand of the Tablet an answer: Is the Pope right or wrong in thus denouncing those who hold that "liberty of conscience and of worship is the right of every man?" Is Romanism in America more tolerant than Romanism in Rome? Is Popery in New York more liberal than the Pope himself! Let the Tablet answer these questions straight out, or cease for ever its pretended zeal for "civil and religious liberty," which in the mouth of a Romanist means nothing more nor less than liberty to believe as Rome believes, and liberty to do as Rome does.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with it egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

LONGINGS.

With holy trust we wait
To see that morn so near,
When Jesus Christ, our Lord, our Life,
Shall on the earth appear.
Not as the lowly babe,
In Bethlehem's manger laid;
He comes in power! the King of kings!
Let nations be afraid.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!

But all the longing ones,
Who wait, and watch, and pray,
And yearn their coming Lord to see,
Shall triumph in that day.
All trials then shall cease—
Gone with the mortal breath;
Christ comes to reign, the "Prince of peace,"
The victor over death.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!

"Saint, after saint on earth,
Has lived, and loved, and died,
And as they left us, one by one,
We laid them side by side;
We laid them down to sleep,
But not in hope forlorn;
We laid them but to ripen there,
Till the last glorious morn.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!

"The whole creation groans
And waits to hear that voice,
That shall restore her comliness,
And make her wastes rejoice.
Come Lord and wipe away
The curse, the sin, the stain,
And make this blighted world of ours,
Thine own fair world again.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!"

CHRIST'S REIGN AND CONQUEST.

In one of the late issues, a writer refers to the article by "B. M.," on the Millennium notion of a thousand years reign of our blessed Lord. He thinks that such a specified reign is not liable to the objection that no more time is employed for his reign. He does not relive the subject in the least by his classification of the reigns, "special" and "subordinate." Please allow me a little space to notice these reigns. The first, your correspondent calls "special." If special it must be specially disastrous; for, according to that theory, the beast reigns in the same world and through the whole term, and has the victory, and drives Jesus and his friends into a corner; when God comes to their rescue, and rains fire from heaven, and devours the enemy. That is the terminus of the thousand years, and there is no getting away from it. Whenever it ends, that is the way laid down. There is much more suggested in this stage of the subject, but we will let this pass for the present.

The "subordinate" reign. Jesus was never in any other position. He is such by his relation; being a Son. Paul says, "though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things he saffered." He never wished any other relation. He used to say, "My father is greater than I." The sin of Adam was, ambition. He aspired to the godship. Satan said, you shall be as gods. The temptation found a response. "The angels that kept not their first estate, but fell from their own habitation." But Jesus was reverent, obedient, loyal. This idea of subordination, is taken from the text in 1 Corth. xv. "Then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." Having no desire to give this a controversial complexion, but to make it an instructive lesson, allow me briefly to look at this account.

There are two periods of power set forth for Jesus our blessed Lord, in the scriptures, and an intermediate reign, to which I will refer. The first period is the time that occurs between his ascension to heaven and the end of his power at the right hand of his Father; which period of power, was most honorable and glorious. In which time he had more power than he will ever have again. He was as near being supreme as possible and not be. Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Only in the throne will I be greater than thou." Paul says, "According to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places; far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion; and every name that is named, not only in this world, but that which is to come," &c. Eph. i. 19–21. "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name," &c. Phil. ii. 9.

The second period of power, for our Lord, is properly the subordinate reign. He at the termination of his reign in his Father's throne, commences the conquest of his own kingdom, embracing the kingdoms of this world. They are put in his power, made his footstool. He has been restrained from doing it sooner, according to the language of Paul in Hebrews, Henceforth expecting, till his enemies be made his footstool.

To the Gentiles were given a lease of power for the term of 2300 years; which is called, The time of the Gentiles. They could not legally be disturbed in thir power while their lease was in force. But when out, by limitation, a writ of ejectment is issued from the great high throne in the heavens. Then all rule and power is to be put down by "the rod of God's strength." See Psa. cx. "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath; and fill the places with dead bodies." This is after they are made his footstool, and before his advent.

In keeping with this statement, see what constitutes the seventh trumpet. The 7th angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." It has been insisted that these voices announce the above after the advent of our Lord, and after he is in full power, &c., which does not need an argument to refute, but deserves simple con tradiction.

The only question on the passage is—Is it true? Do these voices pronounce truly, when they say, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ?" The seventh trumpet is the signal for this declaration; or the declaration itself constitutes the 7th trumpet.

But is its truthfulness a question? That heaven stands for the church is admitted. The church has anticipated events more than once. It is in the nature of the case to do so. Instances might be cited. I will name one. "And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation and strength, and the kingdom of God, and the power of his Christ, for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night." Rev. xii. 10.

This experience and acclaim came, according to the most approved expositions of this chapter, hundreds of years since. Is the the other text subject to the same doubt, or explanation? is the question. Let us see.

"The four and twenty elders which sat before God, on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come," because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and to them that fear thy name, small and great, and that thou shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth."

The elders before the throne, who cannot be mistaken, deliver the above response, to the voices; the import of which is significant of the day of judgment, of retributions, and rewards.

There is more of this elsewhere. Dan. vii. 14. "And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom." This event is understood by these same elders, as appears from another scripture: "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power," &c. Rev. iv. 11. After this, many angels, and the living creatures, and elders, even ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands unite in saying, Worthy is the Lamb, that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and glory, and blessing. And yet, after this, "Every creature in heaven (the fore-named angels, living creatures, and elders,) and on earth, (all the informed—or all in sympathy with the "voices" which say, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ: all these, above, below, and everywhere, join in concert) "Saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever." I believe that all this experience, and these sayings, have their time this side of the Advent. If any think otherwise, let them show cause and reason.

I may be allowed one other citation found in Luke xix. 12. The case of the nobleman who took his departure into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return, &c. It came to pass that when he had returned, having received the kingdom. He then reckoned with his own servants. Then turned his attention to his enemies that would not have him for their king, though he should get a kingdom, for they had sent messengers after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us—of whom the nobleman says, "Bring them hither and slay them before me." This is after he receives his kingdom; and in the time of reckoning and of judgment, and before the advent. This is the period referred to in Psa. cx. "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." And 1 Corth. xv. 25, "For he must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet." "Till I make thine enemies thy footstool." That is what the Father says to his Son. Of the Son, he must reign (or "rule") until he puts his enemies under his feet: has reduced them to footstools.

I should have been glad to have written less on this reign of conquest, coming in between the reign of Jesus on his Father's throne, and his reign upon his own throne, which will be a reign without end—but could not. Much more presented itself. B. M.

THE MIND OF MAN.

"My Br. asks, Who is the he, that has a soul? I answer—as stated in my article—the man, the same man that has a hand, a foot, a heart, a brain, has a mind."

We reply, that neither exists when the man perishes; and if the Br. places the mind in the same condition as the heart, the foot, and the brain, he has given up the question; but he does not believe that the heart or foot or brain constitutes the man. But he does say, he admits "man has a soul, spirit, or mind which constitutes his, man's, essential identity." ("Essential identity:" necessary to the existence of any thing; the same; sameness.) Now take away the brain, mind, heart, or either, and you have no man left; and a man, as you call it, without a mind is not considered a man, in law; it requires all the parts to make a man; and when God made the man, he was perfect in all those parts of which my Br. speaks.

"The difference between my Br. and myself is this: he is so fearful of fable that he will deny a truth.

What truth have I ever denied? I understand the truth to be, man has a mind just as he has a foot, or any other member; but it is only a part of the man, and is not the essential man. Again, you say:

"Lest he should believe that man's mind is immortal, he (I) will deny that man has any mind."

This is an assumption, and is not found in my article. Again, you say:

"It is clear, to my mind, that something is left unchanged in the process which brings us from mortality to immortality."

Now if I understand my Br., he means, in death something is left unchanged, and this something is soul, body, or spirit,; and yet this contradicts his expression, "but we deny, now and forever, that this soul, or spirit, or mind is capable of a living existence apart from the body." In what sense is this mind, or soul, or spirit, unchanged? Does it have intelligence without life, or without a body? Will my Br. explain. Again, he says:

"Our Br. is so anxious to save the animal man, that he will be compelled to deny any change whatever."

Not at all. Do not be too anxious in telling your Br. what he will be compelled to deny. We have no anxiety in saving any man, except in the manner in which the scriptures declare he shall be saved. Again, you say:

"My Br. appears to scout the idea that there is an essential difference between the condition of the righteous and the wicked in this life."

O no, my Br., I have believed for twenty-two years, that the righteous have the Spirit of God in them, that will bring them again from the dead; while the wicked being without the Spirit, will perish. You say, I "ignore the work of the Spirit altogether." Where did my Br. learn this fact? Not from any article that I have ever written. He asks, "Does the Spirit do nothing for us?" Yes, I have said the dead (the righteous) are sown in corruption, and the Spirit raises THEM in incorruption; they are sown animal, and by the action of the Spirit of God, they are raised spiritual; the same dead that were sown animal. And if so be the Spirit of God, that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwells in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, because of his Spirit that dwells in you. Yes, my Br., the Spirit of God does much for us. But it is not the Spirit of God we are talking about; it is the mind, the soul, or spirit, the somthing or other life, which man has when he gives up the blood life, or present life, or idenity. You say, You "believe it makes all the difference in the world to a man whether he has the Spirit or not:" and so do I; but that is not the mind with which you started. You say, "the Spirit is the preserving element." Here we are agreed. You ask, "What does it take hold of? Does it affect the flesh and blood? then the flesh and blood must be saved in the resurrection. But here we query." I do not. It takes hold of the man, the same man upon which the curse took hold; the "thou", Adam, and brings back the man. So say the the scriptures; and I believe them. Whosoever eateth of my flesh and drinketh of my blood....I will raise HIM up at the last day. Now, does my Br. believe that God will raise the mind, or soul, or spirit, and leave man, which possesses all these, behind, and save an entity?

You say, If you "can help any one to the plain truth by dropping a point that seems use less, I am willing to do so." It is all important that we have the plain truth; andthat is just where you and I differ. I think the Spirit of God takes hold of the man and brings him back from the dead; and we do not think this important truth useless; and we are not willing to drop it. You think the blood man, or animal man perishes, and the mind of man is kept in existence, and made or organized into a man. This we think is the vitality of the whole question. You say, you are willing to receive light from any quarter. In this we are agreed. Yours, JACOB GRIM.

"EVEN SO."

"Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." Luke xvii. 30.

This text parallels with Matt. xxiv. 39, where the leading idea in the Saviour's mind was the knowledge of the proximity of the time of the second coming, which the church would possess, and the total disregard of that event on the part of the world. He makes these things pointed and forcible by citing the ways of the antediluvian, with which the disciples were familiar. The facts may be simply stated: Noah was a preacher of righteousness. 2 Pet. ii. 5; God gave him a message of definite time to publish to a wicked world. Gen. vi. 3. From this we glean two facts: 1st. Noah knew the ending of the years. 2d. From the fact that he published it abroad every one knew the same that had an ear to hear. But the Saviour commenting upon this state of things, says, "For as the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not ("willingly ignorant" of the coming deluge) until the flood came and took them all away." Verse 38.

He forcibly instructs concerning their unbelief of the message, by stating that even during the seven days—additional revelation—they were wholly engrossed in gratifying the flesh; and then adds, "So shall also the coming of the Son of man be;" 39. The teaching appears to be: So will the church understand concerning the time of my coming; and so will the balance of the inhabitants be "overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life;" because they will know (believe) not the message that I am "even at the door." Now it is plain that unbelief was the ruin of the people before the flood; and if we can credit the Saviour, similar unbelief will be the ruin of the world when he is revealed. A hearty belief of the message would have prompted them to provide a place of safety from the deluge as it did Noah; it would also have paved the way for a separation from the unbelieving and a life of holiness. Even so, concerning the Saviour's appearing: those who believe it can not be, or it is delayed at least a thousand years, see no extra motive to change their life; hence they will be found mixing int he affairs of life without stint, making arrangements for length of days in the midst of a proud, voluptuous and pleasure-seeking age, which will characterize the closing days; while on the other hand, those who believe will make preparation in keeping with its imminence and importance: they will cast off care that they may watch unto prayer; they will forego the pride of riches, that they may publish the pending calamity; they will despise the honor of this world, that they may be kings and priests unto God; like Moses, having "respect unto the recompence of the reward." To our mind, that is the way it is working, and will work unto the consumation.

We have seen that the antediluvians were following the desires of the flesh unto the day of their overthrow, because of unbelief. When we raise the curtain and look in upon that generation, we will see that not only was there an unrestrained sensuality, but violence and every evil work. Let us look at the record: "And it came to pass, when (wicked) men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God (righteous) saw the daughters of men that they were fair: and they took them wives of all which they chose. And the Lord said, My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years. ....And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually....the earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth, and behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold, I will destroy them with the earth." Gen. vi. 1–13.

This is the inspired picture of that age when God looked upon the earth and pronounced its doom and the length of his long suffering, while there is not the slightest intimation but that this continued to be its character even while Noah published its dreadful end, and manifested his faith in what he preached by building an ark. It may be safely remarked that resistance to truth and light alike upon individuals and nations does not stop with mere carnality, but rushes on to the blackest and darkest deeds. See Rom. i. 21–31. In the case of individuals they become covetous, hateful, infidel, and defiant of God; with nations it culminates in blood-thirsty revolutions and desolating wars.

The people before the flood resisted the strivings of the Spirit till God's patience was sorely taxed, which prepared them for a total unbelief of his threatening when it was announced. God's Spirit strove with the sons of God in their carnal ways till it had no lodgement by reason of their wickedness, and when the godly man ceases out of the land, the Spirit of God ceases; so that the final withdrawal of God's Spirit oft spoken of, will consist in the removal of his saints out from among the wicked; but this will not be un-until all hope is expended;allwarning is useless; until they have been his witnesses to the full, and have left the wicked without excuse. Then comes the fierce indignation of a just, yet insulted Creator; till then towns are saved by the pleadings of one, and cities by the righteousness of ten.

Now, if the likeness of this day with that is already perfect in unbelief in the message that warns of a fiery deluge, in sensuality and unbrideled pleasure seeking, why may we not expect the balance of the picture filled up? Why not expect the even so to the full? and as the godly man ceaseth, the righteous become few, faith obsolete, and the strivings of the Spirit feeble, why not expect the earth to be filled with corruption and violence? Like cause, like effect; for human nature is essentially the same in all time.

O, says one, you do not consider how times have changed; you forget the bible societies, and tract societies, the pulpit filled with learning, the general enlightenment and refinement of this generation: you must not look for the counterpart of those days. Ah, do not such forget our once happy, prosperous land, blessed with religious instruction and practice, with toleration to the utmost!

Let any man read the cultivated cruelty and inhumanity of the authorities of the so-called Confederate States to the people of their father land; especially the confinement of our prisoners in the prison-pens of Georgia and South Carolina; then let him scan the history of the heathen; take even the stern cruelties of the Punic wars when heathen strove against heathen for supremacy, and they will grant the latter more humane. Think of months of nakedness, unrelieved sickness, exposure, lingering starvation in the midst of plenty—till maniacy was relieved by death! We must look at the persecutions waged by the professed followers of the Lamb to find its equal; for it is only those whose hearts are calloused by resisting the words of God, who could invent the diabolical works of the Inquisition or measure up to the blackness of a rebel heart.

All this in the boasted "19th Century"! and just entering the beautitudes of the Millennium! No, we expect violence, and everything that is bad. The scriptures sustain this: Haggai speaks of a shaking from the Lord—the overthrow of the kingdoms of the heathen, "And the horses and their riders shall come down, every one by the sword of his brother." ii. 22. The angel tells Daniel of "a time of trouble" in the ending of the days, "such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time;" Dan. xii. 1; and the Revelator says, under the sounding of the seventh angel, "the nations were angry." Rev. xi. 18. Anger leads to violence and overthrow from the Lord. And if we permit our minds to go on a little in advance, if not already visible, we can see the picture so graphically drawn by the Seer concerning a class, "And he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever." Rev. xiv. 10, 11. When armies are mingling in frantic combat; when towns and cities are burning; when the wails of the suffering go up, and the world according to Jer. 25, has become an Aceldema, to our mind it will be in course of fulfilment. Following on will be the purgation of the world. Then, as the floods came and destroyed them all—even the little children—no more mercy—even so, we expect "flaming fire" (1 Thess. i. 8) will consume all who are "not found written in the book of life." Rev. xx. 15.

Thank a just and holy Father, there is a bright side to this subject. He has always delivered the righteous, as saith the Apostle, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations." 2 Pet. ii. 9. Before the floods came down, Noah was safely housed in the ark; for the Lord "shut him in;" praise his name! Before fire and brimstone turned the cities of the plain into ashes, Lot was delivered: the words of the angel were, "Haste thee, escape thither; for I can not do anything till thou be come thither." So with Jerusalem, there was a way of escape; and blessed be his name, even so will there be deliverance in the closing days: "And he (the Son of man) shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. xxiv. 31.

THE NAPOLEON BETWEEN TWO SOUS.

In the south of France, where the air is soft and mild, and the sunshine seems brighter than any where else, large sweet grapes grow in great abundance, and the fields in which they are cultivated are called vineyards. All the poor people, and the little children too, go out to gather the grapes. The pretty village of L—— was surrounded with vineyards, and when the time for gathering the grapes came it seemed almost deserted. The men, women, and children, with baskets on their heads, went early to the field and did not return until evening.

A little boy was playing under the trees in front of a fine looking house. Suddenly he stopped his play, and ran into the house, up stairs, opened the nursery door, and shut it with quite a good deal of noise, and said: "Nurse, will you take me out to the vineyards this afternoon? It is so still here, I am almost afraid to breathe. I haven't heard a bit of noise, not so much as a fly buzzing, since I got up."

"That is strange, Earnest. I wonder where your ears were a minute ago, when you made such a noise coming up stairs and shutting the door. I fear you disturbed your mamma," said Julia, the nurse.

"Where is mamma?"

"She was very tired with taking care of Mamie last night, and she has gone to lie down and get a little nap if she can."

"Oh! I did not know that. If I had, I would have come in the house more carefully. Do you suppose I disturbed mamma?"

"I hope not, dear; but if you would always open the door quietly you would never disturb any one," said Julia, very kindly.

"Yes, I know it; but do tell me quick, will you take me to the vineyards this afternoon?"

"Yes, if your mother is willing. I will go softly and see if she is asleep—if not, I will ask her."

Julia soon returned saying they could go.

As soon as they reached the vineyards, Earnest began looking for a little pale-faced boy whom he had often seen going to gather grapes.

"Do you know where Amon is?" he asked one of the men.

"Yonder he is, by those large baskets."

Earnest hurried on, and seeing Amon he called out: "Amon! Amon! See here! Here, out this way. I'm so short, I can hardly see you over the top of the vines." Coming up to a tired looking boy, Earnest said: "Are you well enough to pick grapes to-day?"

"No; I can only watch the baskets and keep the birds away."

"Can I have a cluster of grapes, Amon? I am so thirsty."

"I do not know; they are not mine; and there is no one here just now. Wait a few minutes."

"Can't you give me just one?"

"No; I'd rather not, for I think that would be stealing; and I repeated at the prayers this morning, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and I've said it over ever so many times to-day."

"Well, I will wait; for I would not like to steal. Mamma says God does not love little children that steal," said Earnest.

"I'm glad you remember what your mother teaches you, my little man," said one of the overseers, who had just come up behind Earnest. "Here are some fine grapes. Would you like some?"

"Thank you, sir; I am very glad to have them."

The man passed on, and Amon said to the nurse, who was his cousin: "Julia, do you remember what the minister said he would preach about next Sunday? I've forgotten the text."

Earnest did not wait for the nurse to answer, but said quickly: "I know. It is in Matthew, sixth chapter and first verse, 'Do not your alms before men to be seen of them.' And Amon, do you remember he said he would preach to the children? I'm so glad; aren't you?"

"Yes, I am. I hope I shall be well enough to go," said the little boy, with tears in his eyes.

"I guess you will. Good by," said Earnest, and went home with his nurse."

The next Sunday Julia took Earnest to church, for his mother was ill. The minister took his text as he had said, "Take heed that you do not your arms before men to be seen of them," and Earnest opened his little testament and found the words.

The minister talked to the children in such a simple way that they could understand him, and he finished by saying: "Jesus Christ said these words to the people many thousand miles from here, and many years ago, and I dare say there were some little children like you listening to him, and learning the way to be good from his own lips. But you can learn the same things to-day, as well as the children could then. So remember to do all the good you can; but do it in a quiet way, so that only God will know it. If you give your money to the heathen, and think that people will say: 'What a kind and noble little boy that is,' God will not love and bless you for it; and so you will not receive 'the reward of our Father which is in heaven.'"

When the sermon was finished a collection was to be taken up after the singing. Earnest had listened very attentively, and when the minister began to read the hymn, he whispered to the nurse, and said: "Will you lend me twenty francs?"

She asked him what he wished to do with it. He said he wished to give it to the missionaries who were going to tell the poor heathen about God. He said he had got twenty francs at home, that his uncle had given him, and he would return it as soon as they got home.

The nurse said she was willing, but she feared his mother might be displeased.

"If you are willing, I will go out quietly, and run over home and ask her. It is just across the street, you know; and I will get back before they are through singing."

"Well, go very carefully, and I think you will not disturb the people," said Julia.

Earnest hurried across the street, into the house, and said: "Mamma, you knew I have twenty francs that Uncle George gave me. Will you give it to me to give to the missionaries?"

"That is more than you would like to give, I think? Would not half of it be enough?"

"Oh no, mamma! There are so many poor little children that don't love God."

"Very well. Here are four five-franc pieces."

"I'd rather have one gold piece, mamma."

"Why so, my child?"

"Because four pieces will make so much noise on the plate, that people will look and see that I have given so much money. But if you give me a Napoleon, I will put it between two sous (or pennies), and put it carefully on the plate, and no one will see the gold piece."

The mother did not understand why her little boy was so careful; but when he came from church, and told her all about the sermon, then she knew, and was very glad that Earnest had been so attentive. And he was very happy to think that he had given his money and no one had seen it.

"Now, mamma, God will be glad, and bless me. Don't you think he will?"

"Yes, my dear child, I think he will."

LONGINGS.

With holy trust we wait
To see that morn so near,
When Jesus Christ, our Lord, our Life,
Shall on the earth appear.
Not as the lowly babe,
In Bethlehem's manger laid;
He comes in power! the King of kings!
Let nations be afraid.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!

But all the longing ones,
Who wait, and watch, and pray,
And yearn their coming Lord to see,
Shall triumph in that day.
All trials then shall cease—
Gone with the mortal breath;
Christ comes to reign, the "Prince of peace,"
The victor over death.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!

"Saint, after saint on earth,
Has lived, and loved, and died,
And as they left us, one by one,
We laid them side by side;
We laid them down to sleep,
But not in hope forlorn;
We laid them but to ripen there,
Till the last glorious morn.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!

"The whole creation groans
And waits to hear that voice,
That shall restore her comliness,
And make her wastes rejoice.
Come Lord and wipe away
The curse, the sin, the stain,
And make this blighted world of ours,
Thine own fair world again.
Come then, Lord Jesus, come!"

CHRIST'S REIGN AND CONQUEST.

In one of the late issues, a writer refers to the article by "B. M.," on the Millennium notion of a thousand years reign of our blessed Lord. He thinks that such a specified reign is not liable to the objection that no more time is employed for his reign. He does not relive the subject in the least by his classification of the reigns, "special" and "subordinate." Please allow me a little space to notice these reigns. The first, your correspondent calls "special." If special it must be specially disastrous; for, according to that theory, the beast reigns in the same world and through the whole term, and has the victory, and drives Jesus and his friends into a corner; when God comes to their rescue, and rains fire from heaven, and devours the enemy. That is the terminus of the thousand years, and there is no getting away from it. Whenever it ends, that is the way laid down. There is much more suggested in this stage of the subject, but we will let this pass for the present.

The "subordinate" reign. Jesus was never in any other position. He is such by his relation; being a Son. Paul says, "though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things he suffered." He never wished any other relation. He used to say, "My father is greater than I." The sin of Adam was, ambition. He aspired to the godship. Satan said, you shall be as gods. The temptation found a response. "The angels that kept not their first estate, but fell from their own habitation." But Jesus was reverent, obedient, loyal. This idea of subordination, is taken from the text in 1 Corth. xv. "Then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." Having no desire to give this a controversial complexion, but to make it an instructive lesson, allow me briefly to look at this account.

There are two periods of power set forth for Jesus our blessed Lord, in the scriptures, and an intermediate reign, to which I will refer. The first period is the time that occurs between his ascension to heaven and the end of his power at the right hand of his Father; which period of power, was most honorable and glorious. In which time he had more power than he will ever have again. He was as near being supreme as possible and not be. Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Only in the throne will I be greater than thou." Paul says, "According to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places; far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion; and every name that is named, not only in this world, but that which is to come," &c. Eph. i. 19–21. "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name," &c. Phil. ii. 9.

The second period of power, for our Lord, is properly the subordinate reign. He at the termination of his reign in his Father's throne, commences the conquest of his own kingdom, embracing the kingdoms of this world. They are put in his power, made his footstool. He has been restrained from doing it sooner, according to the language of Paul in Hebrews, Henceforth expecting, till his enemies be made his footstool.

To the Gentiles were given a lease of power for the term of 2300 years; which is called, The time of the Gentiles. They could not legally be disturbed in thir power while their lease was in force. But when out, by limitation, a writ of ejectment is issued from the great high throne in the heavens. Then all rule and power is to be put down by "the rod of God's strength." See Psa. cx. "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath; and fill the places with dead bodies." This is after they are made his footstool, and before his advent.

In keeping with this statement, see what constitutes the seventh trumpet. The 7th angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." It has been insisted that these voices announce the above after the advent of our Lord, and after he is in full power, &c., which does not need an argument to refute, but deserves simple con tradiction.

The only question on the passage is—Is it true? Do these voices pronounce truly, when they say, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ?" The seventh trumpet is the signal for this declaration; or the declaration itself constitutes the 7th trumpet.

But is its truthfulness a question? That heaven stands for the church is admitted. The church has anticipated events more than once. It is in the nature of the case to do so. Instances might be cited. I will name one. "And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation and strength, and the kingdom of God, and the power of his Christ, for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night." Rev. xii. 10.

This experience and acclaim came, according to the most approved expositions of this chapter, hundreds of years since. Is the the other text subject to the same doubt, or explanation? is the question. Let us see.

"The four and twenty elders which sat before God, on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come," because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and to them that fear thy name, small and great, and that thou shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth."

The elders before the throne, who cannot be mistaken, deliver the above response, to the voices; the import of which is significant of the day of judgment, of retributions, and rewards.

There is more of this elsewhere. Dan. vii. 14. "And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom." This event is understood by these same elders, as appears from another scripture: "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power," &c. Rev. iv. 11. After this, many angels, and the living creatures, and elders, even ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands unite in saying, Worthy is the Lamb, that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and glory, and blessing. And yet, after this, "Every creature in heaven (the fore-named angels, living creatures, and elders,) and on earth, (all the informed—or all in sympathy with the "voices" which say, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ: all these, above, below, and everywhere, join in concert) "Saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever." I believe that all this experience, and these sayings, have their time this side of the Advent. If any think otherwise, let them show cause and reason.

I may be allowed one other citation found in Luke xix. 12. The case of the nobleman who took his departure into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return, &c. It came to pass that when he had returned, having received the kingdom. He then reckoned with his own servants. Then turned his attention to his enemies that would not have him for their king, though he should get a kingdom, for they had sent messengers after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us—of whom the nobleman says, "Bring them hither and slay them before me." This is after he receives his kingdom; and in the time of reckoning and of judgment, and before the advent. This is the period referred to in Psa. cx. "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." And 1 Corth. xv. 25, "For he must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet." "Till I make thine enemies thy footstool." That is what the Father says to his Son. Of the Son, he must reign (or "rule") until he puts his enemies under his feet: has reduced them to footstools.

I should have been glad to have written less on this reign of conquest, coming in between the reign of Jesus on his Father's throne, and his reign upon his own throne, which will be a reign without end—but could not. Much more presented itself. B. M.

THE MIND OF MAN.

"My Br. asks, Who is the he, that has a soul? I answer—as stated in my article—the man, the same man that has a hand, a foot, a heart, a brain, has a mind."

We reply, that neither exists when the man perishes; and if the Br. places the mind in the same condition as the heart, the foot, and the brain, he has given up the question; but he does not believe that the heart or foot or brain constitutes the man. But he does say, he admits "man has a soul, spirit, or mind which constitutes his, man's, essential identity." ("Essential identity:" necessary to the existence of any thing; the same; sameness.) Now take away the brain, mind, heart, or either, and you have no man left; and a man, as you call it, without a mind is not considered a man, in law; it requires all the parts to make a man; and when God made the man, he was perfect in all those parts of which my Br. speaks.

"The difference between my Br. and myself is this: he is so fearful of fable that he will deny a truth."

What truth have I ever denied? I understand the truth to be, man has a mind just as he has a foot, or any other member; but it is only a part of the man, and is not the essential man. Again, you say:

"Lest he should believe that man's mind is immortal, he (I) will deny that man has any mind."

This is an assumption, and is not found in my article. Again, you say:

"It is clear, to my mind, that something is left unchanged in the process which brings us from mortality to immortality."

Now if I understand my Br., he means, in death something is left unchanged, and this something is soul, body, or spirit,; and yet this contradicts his expression, "but we deny, now and forever, that this soul, or spirit, or mind is capable of a living existence apart from the body." In what sense is this mind, or soul, or spirit, unchanged? Does it have intelligence without life, or without a body? Will my Br. explain. Again, he says:

"Our Br. is so anxious to save the animal man, that he will be compelled to deny any change whatever."

Not at all. Do not be too anxious in telling your Br. what he will be compelled to deny. We have no anxiety in saving any man, except in the manner in which the scriptures declare he shall be saved. Again, you say:

"My Br. appears to scout the idea that there is an essential difference between the condition of the righteous and the wicked in this life."

O no, my Br., I have believed for twenty-two years, that the righteous have the Spirit of God in them, that will bring them again from the dead; while the wicked being without the Spirit, will perish. You say, I "ignore the work of the Spirit altogether." Where did my Br. learn this fact? Not from any article that I have ever written. He asks, "Does the Spirit do nothing for us?" Yes, I have said the dead (the righteous) are sown in corruption, and the Spirit raises THEM in incorruption; they are sown animal, and by the action of the Spirit of God, they are raised spiritual; the same dead that were sown animal. And if so be the Spirit of God, that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwells in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, because of his Spirit that dwells in you. Yes, my Br., the Spirit of God does much for us. But it is not the Spirit of God we are talking about; it is the mind, the soul, or spirit, the somthing or other life, which man has when he gives up the blood life, or present life, or idenity. You say, You "believe it makes all the difference in the world to a man whether he has the Spirit or not:" and so do I; but that is not the mind with which you started. You say, "the Spirit is the preserving element." Here we are agreed. You ask, "What does it take hold of? Does it affect the flesh and blood? then the flesh and blood must be saved in the resurrection. But here we query." I do not. It takes hold of the man, the same man upon which the curse took hold; the "thou", Adam, and brings back the man. So say the the scriptures; and I believe them. Whosoever eateth of my flesh and drinketh of my blood....I will raise HIM up at the last day. Now, does my Br. believe that God will raise the mind, or soul, or spirit, and leave man, which possesses all these, behind, and save an entity?

You say, If you "can help any one to the plain truth by dropping a point that seems use less, I am willing to do so." It is all important that we have the plain truth; andthat is just where you and I differ. I think the Spirit of God takes hold of the man and brings him back from the dead; and we do not think this important truth useless; and we are not willing to drop it. You think the blood man, or animal man perishes, and the mind of man is kept in existence, and made or organized into a man. This we think is the vitality of the whole question. You say, you are willing to receive light from any quarter. In this we are agreed. Yours, JACOB GRIM.

"Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." Luke xvii. 30.

This text parallels with Matt. xxiv. 39, where the leading idea in the Saviour's mind was the knowledge of the proximity of the time of the second coming, which the church would possess, and the total disregard of that event on the part of the world. He makes these things pointed and forcible by citing the ways of the antediluvian, with which the disciples were familiar. The facts may be simply stated: Noah was a preacher of righteousness. 2 Pet. ii. 5; God gave him a message of definite time to publish to a wicked world. Gen. vi. 3. From this we glean two facts: 1st. Noah knew the ending of the years. 2d. From the fact that he published it abroad every one knew the same that had an ear to hear. But the Saviour commenting upon this state of things, says, "For as the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not ("willingly ignorant" of the coming deluge) until the flood came and took them all away." Verse 38.

He forcibly instructs concerning their unbelief of the message, by stating that even during the seven days—additional revelation—they were wholly engrossed in gratifying the flesh; and then adds, "So shall also the coming of the Son of man be;" 39. The teaching appears to be: So will the church understand concerning the time of my coming; and so will the balance of the inhabitants be "overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life;" because they will know (believe) not the message that I am "even at the door." Now it is plain that unbelief was the ruin of the people before the flood; and if we can credit the Saviour, similar unbelief will be the ruin of the world when he is revealed. A hearty belief of the message would have prompted them to provide a place of safety from the deluge as it did Noah; it would also have paved the way for a separation from the unbelieving and a life of holiness. Even so, concerning the Saviour's appearing: those who believe it can not be, or it is delayed at least a thousand years, see no extra motive to change their life; hence they will be found mixing int he affairs of life without stint, making arrangements for length of days in the midst of a proud, voluptuous and pleasure-seeking age, which will characterize the closing days; while on the other hand, those who believe will make preparation in keeping with its imminence and importance: they will cast off care that they may watch unto prayer; they will forego the pride of riches, that they may publish the pending calamity; they will despise the honor of this world, that they may be kings and priests unto God; like Moses, having "respect unto the recompence of the reward." To our mind, that is the way it is working, and will work unto the consumation.

We have seen that the antediluvians were following the desires of the flesh unto the day of their overthrow, because of unbelief. When we raise the curtain and look in upon that generation, we will see that not only was there an unrestrained sensuality, but violence and every evil work. Let us look at the record: "And it came to pass, when (wicked) men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God (righteous) saw the daughters of men that they were fair: and they took them wives of all which they chose. And the Lord said, My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years. ....And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually....the earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth, and behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold, I will destroy them with the earth." Gen. vi. 1–13.

This is the inspired picture of that age when God looked upon the earth and pronounced its doom and the length of his long suffering, while there is not the slightest intimation but that this continued to be its character even while Noah published its dreadful end, and manifested his faith in what he preached by building an ark. It may be safely remarked that resistance to truth and light alike upon individuals and nations does not stop with mere carnality, but rushes on to the blackest and darkest deeds. See Rom. i. 21–31. In the case of individuals they become covetous, hateful, infidel, and defiant of God; with nations it culminates in blood-thirsty revolutions and desolating wars.

The people before the flood resisted the strivings of the Spirit till God's patience was sorely taxed, which prepared them for a total unbelief of his threatening when it was announced. God's Spirit strove with the sons of God in their carnal ways till it had no lodgement by reason of their wickedness, and when the godly man ceases out of the land, the Spirit of God ceases; so that the final withdrawal of God's Spirit oft spoken of, will consist in the removal of his saints out from among the wicked; but this will not be un-until all hope is expended; all warning is useless; until they have been his witnesses to the full, and have left the wicked without excuse. Then comes the fierce indignation of a just, yet insulted Creator; till then towns are saved by the pleadings of one, and cities by the righteousness of ten.

Now, if the likeness of this day with that is already perfect in unbelief in the message that warns of a fiery deluge, in sensuality and unbrideled pleasure seeking, why may we not expect the balance of the picture filled up? Why not expect the even so to the full? and as the godly man ceaseth, the righteous become few, faith obsolete, and the strivings of the Spirit feeble, why not expect the earth to be filled with corruption and violence? Like cause, like effect; for human nature is essentially the same in all time.

O, says one, you do not consider how times have changed; you forget the bible societies, and tract societies, the pulpit filled with learning, the general enlightenment and refinement of this generation: you must not look for the counterpart of those days. Ah, do not such forget our once happy, prosperous land, blessed with religious instruction and practice, with toleration to the utmost!

Let any man read the cultivated cruelty and inhumanity of the authorities of the so-called Confederate States to the people of their father land; especially the confinement of our prisoners in the prison-pens of Georgia and South Carolina; then let him scan the history of the heathen; take even the stern cruelties of the Punic wars when heathen strove against heathen for supremacy, and they will grant the latter more humane. Think of months of nakedness, unrelieved sickness, exposure, lingering starvation in the midst of plenty—till maniacy was relieved by death! We must look at the persecutions waged by the professed followers of the Lamb to find its equal; for it is only those whose hearts are calloused by resisting the words of God, who could invent the diabolical works of the Inquisition or measure up to the blackness of a rebel heart.

All this in the boasted "19th Century"! and just entering the beautitudes of the Millennium! No, we expect violence, and everything that is bad. The scriptures sustain this: Haggai speaks of a shaking from the Lord—the overthrow of the kingdoms of the heathen, "And the horses and their riders shall come down, every one by the sword of his brother." ii. 22. The angel tells Daniel of "a time of trouble" in the ending of the days, "such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time;" Dan. xii. 1; and the Revelator says, under the sounding of the seventh angel, "the nations were angry." Rev. xi. 18. Anger leads to violence and overthrow from the Lord. And if we permit our minds to go on a little in advance, if not already visible, we can see the picture so graphically drawn by the Seer concerning a class, "And he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever." Rev. xiv. 10, 11. When armies are mingling in frantic combat; when towns and cities are burning; when the wails of the suffering go up, and the world according to Jer. 25, has become an Aceldema, to our mind it will be in course of fulfilment. Following on will be the purgation of the world. Then, as the floods came and destroyed them all—even the little children—no more mercy—even so, we expect "flaming fire" (1 Thess. i. 8) will consume all who are "not found written in the book of life." Rev. xx. 15.

Thank a just and holy Father, there is a bright side to this subject. He has always delivered the righteous, as saith the Apostle, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations." 2 Pet. ii. 9. Before the floods came down, Noah was safely housed in the ark; for the Lord "shut him in;" praise his name! Before fire and brimstone turned the cities of the plain into ashes, Lot was delivered: the words of the angel were, "Haste thee, escape thither; for I can not do anything till thou be come thither." So with Jerusalem, there was a way of escape; and blessed be his name, even so will there be deliverance in the closing days: "And he (the Son of man) shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Matt. xxiv. 31.

THE NAPOLEON BETWEEN TWO SOUS.

In the south of France, where the air is soft and mild, and the sunshine seems brighter than any where else, large sweet grapes grow in great abundance, and the fields in which they are cultivated are called vineyards. All the poor people, and the little children too, go out to gather the grapes. The pretty village of L—— was surrounded with vineyards, and when the time for gathering the grapes came it seemed almost deserted. The men, women, and children, with baskets on their heads, went early to the field and did not return until evening.

A little boy was playing under the trees in front of a fine looking house. Suddenly he stopped his play, and ran into the house, up stairs, opened the nursery door, and shut it with quite a good deal of noise, and said: "Nurse, will you take me out to the vineyards this afternoon? It is so still here, I am almost afraid to breathe. I haven't heard a bit of noise, not so much as a fly buzzing, since I got up."

"That is strange, Earnest. I wonder where your ears were a minute ago, when you made such a noise coming up stairs and shutting the door. I fear you disturbed your mamma," said Julia, the nurse.

"Where is mamma?"

"She was very tired with taking care of Mamie last night, and she has gone to lie down and get a little nap if she can."

"Oh! I did not know that. If I had, I would have come in the house more carefully. Do you suppose I disturbed mamma?"

"I hope not, dear; but if you would always open the door quietly you would never disturb any one," said Julia, very kindly.

"Yes, I know it; but do tell me quick, will you take me to the vineyards this afternoon?"

"Yes, if your mother is willing. I will go softly and see if she is asleep—if not, I will ask her."

Julia soon returned saying they could go.

As soon as they reached the vineyards, Earnest began looking for a little pale-faced boy whom he had often seen going to gather grapes.

"Do you know where Amon is?" he asked one of the men.

"Yonder he is, by those large baskets."

Earnest hurried on, and seeing Amon he called out: "Amon! Amon! See here! Here, out this way. I'm so short, I can hardly see you over the top of the vines." Coming up to a tired looking boy, Earnest said: "Are you well enough to pick grapes to-day?"

"No; I can only watch the baskets and keep the birds away."

"Can I have a cluster of grapes, Amon? I am so thirsty."

"I do not know; they are not mine; and there is no one here just now. Wait a few minutes."

"Can't you give me just one?"

"No; I'd rather not, for I think that would be stealing; and I repeated at the prayers this morning, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and I've said it over ever so many times to-day."

"Well, I will wait; for I would not like to steal. Mamma says God does not love little children that steal," said Earnest.

"I'm glad you remember what your mother teaches you, my little man," said one of the overseers, who had just come up behind Earnest. "Here are some fine grapes. Would you like some?"

"Thank you, sir; I am very glad to have them."

The man passed on, and Amon said to the nurse, who was his cousin: "Julia, do you remember what the minister said he would preach about next Sunday? I've forgotten the text."

Earnest did not wait for the nurse to answer, but said quickly: "I know. It is in Matthew, sixth chapter and first verse, 'Do not your alms before men to be seen of them.' And Amon, do you remember he said he would preach to the children? I'm so glad; aren't you?"

"Yes, I am. I hope I shall be well enough to go," said the little boy, with tears in his eyes.

"I guess you will. Good by," said Earnest, and went home with his nurse."

The next Sunday Julia took Earnest to church, for his mother was ill. The minister took his text as he had said, "Take heed that you do not your arms before men to be seen of them," and Earnest opened his little testament and found the words.

The minister talked to the children in such a simple way that they could understand him, and he finished by saying: "Jesus Christ said these words to the people many thousand miles from here, and many years ago, and I dare say there were some little children like you listening to him, and learning the way to be good from his own lips. But you can learn the same things to-day, as well as the children could then. So remember to do all the good you can; but do it in a quiet way, so that only God will know it. If you give your money to the heathen, and think that people will say: 'What a kind and noble little boy that is,' God will not love and bless you for it; and so you will not receive 'the reward of our Father which is in heaven.'"

When the sermon was finished a collection was to be taken up after the singing. Earnest had listened very attentively, and when the minister began to read the hymn, he whispered to the nurse, and said: "Will you lend me twenty francs?"

She asked him what he wished to do with it. He said he wished to give it to the missionaries who were going to tell the poor heathen about God. He said he had got twenty francs at home, that his uncle had given him, and he would return it as soon as they got home.

The nurse said she was willing, but she feared his mother might be displeased.

"If you are willing, I will go out quietly, and run over home and ask her. It is just across the street, you know; and I will get back before they are through singing."

"Well, go very carefully, and I think you will not disturb the people," said Julia.

Earnest hurried across the street, into the house, and said: "Mamma, you knew I have twenty francs that Uncle George gave me. Will you give it to me to give to the missionaries?"

"That is more than you would like to give, I think? Would not half of it be enough?"

"Oh no, mamma! There are so many poor little children that don't love God."

"Very well. Here are four five-franc pieces."

"I'd rather have one gold piece, mamma."

"Why so, my child?"

"Because four pieces will make so much noise on the plate, that people will look and see that I have given so much money. But if you give me a Napoleon, I will put it between two sous (or pennies), and put it carefully on the plate, and no one will see the gold piece."

The mother did not understand why her little boy was so careful; but when he came from church, and told her all about the sermon, then she knew, and was very glad that Earnest had been so attentive. And he was very happy to think that he had given his money and no one had seen it.

"Now, mamma, God will be glad, and bless me. Don't you think he will?"

"Yes, my dear child, I think he will."

MICAH III. AND IV. CONSIDERED.

Let us remember the division of the Bible into chapters and verses is not inspiration, and often is so injudiciously done as to make the readers lose sight of the connection. We shall therefore read from Micah iii. 10, to iv. 4, without interruption. If the first part of the prophecy has been literally accomplished so will the remainder be.

"They build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity. The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money: yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, is not the Lord among us? none evil can come upon us. Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest. But in the last days it shall come to pass that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come, and say, come, and let us go up unto the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: For THE MOUTH OF THE LORD OF HOSTS HATH SPOKEN IT."

Not, "the people say it;" but, The Lord of Hosts himself. Has Zion literally been ploughed as a field? It has. If one part of the prophecy has has had a literal fulfilment, then that is God's commentary with regard to the accomplishment of the remainder. It is most manifest that the part of this prophecy contained in the 4th chapter, has never had its fulfilment. To talk about its being fulfilled in the sayings of the professed church is to pervert the words of the Lord of hosts; and the absurdity of applying this state of things to the new earth is too glaring to need a serious answer. To talk of rebuking strong nations afar off, after the earth has been burned, or melted by fire; and of beating swords into plough-shares, and spears into pruning hooks, after they have all all been melted in the conflagration of the world, is a theory which might well be denominated spiritualism spiritualized, or, double refined.

The prophet goes on to say, verse 5, "All people, [not of the nation of Israel; i. e., the Gentiles,] will walk in the name of his God, [the true God whom they had not known, but now acknowledge agreeably to the prophecy of Isa. liv. 5, The God of the whole earth shall be called;] and we, [gathered Israel,] will walk in the name of the Lord our God, [whom we formerly had for our God,] for ever and ever."

The prophet then adds:

"In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation: and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even forever."

This corresponds exactly with Isa. 11th, and to put the matter beyond all doubt, the prophecy adds, verse 8th:

"And thou, O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come unto the daughter of Jerusalem."

While christians in general are agreed as to the fact, they differ as to the circumstances with which that glorious time is to be ushered in. One opinion is, that it is to be gradually ushered in by the conversion of the world, and is only to be a spiritual reign of Christ, and the personal advent not to take place till the close of the millenium. This view may well be denominated the cry of peace and safety; for the nearer we approach the supposed time for that event, the less concern will sinners feel to deny themselves and take up their cross to follow Christ; because, they flatter themselves they shall live to see the millenium and then, as all will be some how or other converted, they shall share in it without the trial that it would now cost them to be christians. It is not our present design to go into a labored refutation of that theory; we will only say—The Scriptures everywhere note the ushering in of that day with awful judgments on them who have not obeyed the Gospel—not their conversion, but their destruction. While that theory in its legitimate influence, is producing the cry of "peace and safety, sudden destruction shall come upon them and they shall not escape." 1 Thess. v. 2, and 3, and 2 Thess. i. 7–10.

Another opinion is, that that day will be ushered in with the burning of the world, the cutting off of every soul not then prepared for the inheritance of eternal life—the appearance of the new earth—the ending of probation to every soul of man, under whatever state of light or darkness they are living at the time; and that the period of all these great events is revealed in the prophetic numbers in the Bible. This last view is calculated to produce the greatest excitement when and where it is promulgated; and thus unfit men for sober reflection. The false views of the first class mentioned, prevent an alarm being given at all, and the erroneous views last mentioned produce so much alarm as to defeat the real benefit of one. Too much excitement is as evil in its tendency as none at all; and the results of it are quite as fatal. Men under the influence of strong excitement act from the influence of their animal feelings, while their judgment finds very little chance to act at all; hence it is that when the excitement is past they are found without any settled principle; and if that which produced the excitement be an error, they relapse into a deeper state of insensibility than before; or, it is followed by a state of fanaticism worse than insensibility itself. Such has been the result with many of preaching that the world was to be burned in any given year.

Neither our Lord nor his apostles have given us any intimation that such a state as that described in the texts we have quoted should be realized by his followers till his return. The hope of the church in those days was the return of their Lord. All they said and all they wrote shows that clearly. All our Lord's parables teach this, without exception. See the parable of the tares and wheat; the parable of the nobleman, &c. The design of the present age or dispensation, is clearly stated in Acts xv. 14. God is visiting the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name; to fill up the number of the rulers, the kings and priests that he is determined to have at the opening of the next age to sit with his Son on his throne. That high honor was first offered to the posterity of Jacob; but when they by transgression fell, through unbelief, the Gentiles were called to this honor, and the present age is allotted to bring this work to its completion; and when the number of chosen rulers is filled up, this age will end, and the next will open by sitting the Son of God on David's throne; and all his elect rulers, being made immortal at his coming and kingdom, will sit down with him; and with him will have power over the nations. Those nations that do not then submit are to be dashed in pieces.

In Mr. Lee's 19th article he presents an answer to the objection that his theory of the human mind, and his method of proving its immateriality from its own phenomena, will prove that brutes have immaterial souls. With what success he has met this objection, we shall soon see.

1. Mr. Lee says—"We shall not deny ourself a soul lest we should give one to our faithful dog! We shall not reason our own soul out of existence lest we should reason one into a brute."

Well, I have no doubt Mr. Lee's faithful dog has just as much soul as he has. Of course I use the term now, in its primary sense of life. Mr. Lee is a living soul and so is his faithful dog. At least, so taught Moses; and he is good authority.

Mr. Lee further says—"We would sooner embrace a theory which would elevate brutes to men, by giving them souls, than one which would degrade men to brutes, by taking away their souls." No doubt of it, Mr. Lee; for you are so hostile to the truth that you would sooner ascribe immortality to every beast of the field, every fowl of the air—the fish of the sea, and all the animalculæ in the universe, than predicate mortality of the entire man.

We are not at all "alarmed at the idea that a horse should be so much like a man as to have a soul;" for this is true: both have souls, for both are "living souls" Mr. Lee says—"We would rather a horse should have a soul, than not to have one ourself!" Certainly, Mr. Lee, I have no doubt of it.

But what does all this prove? It proves to a demonstration, that Mr. Lee knows nothing about the soul.

He continues—"If any man can prove from them (his arguments) that beasts have souls, we shall not do violence to the reason which God has given us to escape the consequences." Well, we shall see.

2. Mr. Lee remarks—"The objection, if admitted, would involve the objector in precisely the same difficulty," &c. This is not true; because we make the superiority of man over the brutes, to consist in organization. And this difference in organization was the result of design on the part of the Creator. Man's superior organization gives him superior powers—some of which are moral, and the whole render him a responsible and moral agent. But not so with the brutes. But, to commence with Mr. Lee's arguments, he affirms, that the difference between human intelligence and brute intelligence, lies not in degree, but in nature.

Mr. Lee evades or shifts, his original position; for at first, he contended that matter had no intelligence: and when pressed on this point in relation to brutes, that his theory must necessarily give immortality to all animals, he meets it by saying it is not the same kind of intelligence! Pray, then, is matter possessed of any sort of intelligence? Mr. Lee's answer must be—"Yes, of brute intelligence." Thus he has to dispose of his original position, before he can proceed.

Mr. Lee has certainly abandoned his first position. He has profited by my strictures, although he has passed them in sullen silence, lest his readers should know that a stripling with a smooth stone from the brook, had smote the Goliah to the ground, and cut off his head.

But let us see what he makes of his present position. Mr. Lee gives to brutes sensation and perception, which he calls instinct. Well, Mr. Lee, do you ascribe sensation and perception to matter or not? If you do, you have given up as lost your original position; but, if you do not, you are compelled by your theory to give animals immaterial minds! because matter, in your view of the subject, has not the properties of sensation, perception, nor instinct.

What is instinct? The word is derived from the Latin instinctus, and signifies the power determining the will of brutes.

Mr. Lee says—"Instinct never improves." This is not true; for that power which controls, or modifies, the will of brutes can be educated, as we see in the horse, dog, elephant, camel, monkey, &c., &c. But even supposing it were otherwise, the very existence of instinct in brutes is incompatible with Mr. Lee's theory, unless he can prove it to be a property of matter; which he is far from being disposed to admit.

Mr. Lee remarks that animals "never think," and immediately after he speaks of "their mental operations," as if mental operations could go on without thought! Animals do think, however, as we shall soon prove. And if "animal instinct never imparts to its fellow animal, the limited education it is capable of receiving from the more skilful hand of man," it is capable of teaching its fellow animal many things which man cannot. Man cannot teach the newly fledged bird to fly; but she who nursed it, and watched over it, can do this in the shortest possible time.

3. Mr. Lee says brutes are not conscious. This is also a fallacy. Mr. Lee's illustration does dot disprove it. Consciousness is a sensation of identity, without which one animal might, and would mistake himself for another, or another for himself. It is folly to say that animals have not a sentiment of personal identity, which is self-consciousness.

4. Mr. Lee remarks—"brutes do not possess volition and will." This is an error; for a horse not only prefers "to go in one direction, rather than to be driven in another;" but he has a will to return from the distance of many miles, and that too by the most direct route, to the place of his abode. This involves will, memory of place, and locality, or a perception of relative distance, and the mental operation of selecting the nearest route. This is more than mere instinct, or desire, or impulse. Instinct is desire—appetite—predisposition; and why should an animal desire one place above another, but for a consideration? The feline species, though tied up in a bag, will return to their original home by the most direct route, even in the dark, when at liberty.

5. "Brutes have no memory," says Mr. Lee. This is a greater error than any of the preceding. If brutes had no memory, when they left one place they would have no desire to return to their original place of abode, more than to another; but this is contrary to fact. Animals prefer one place above another, when they are absent from them. Animals trained by one individual, if taken from them for a time, will recognize their original master when they meet them, and manifest pleasure at the sight. What is this but the associations of memory?

6. Mr. Lee says—"Men have conscience, but brutes have none." This may be true; for we have never maintained that brutes were men. Their organization is different, and, by consequence, their powers, or faculties, are different. But, up to this item, Mr. Lee has been in error, and I defy him to reconcile the preceeding items with his theory.

7. Whether brutes are the subjects of hope, or not, I will not now dispute; but that they have fears, none who understand their nature will deny. They manifest fear on many occasions, and, also, joy, or pleasure.

8. But, to sum up the argument, Mr. Lee defines instinct to be a compound of "sensation and perception." Then there must be various kinds of instinct; or,

1. A Geometrical instinct; for Bees are geometricians. Their cells are constructed as, with the least quantity of material, to have the largest size spaces, and least possible loss of interstice. So also is the Ant-lion; his funnel-shaped trap is exactly correct in its formation, as if it had been formed by the most skilful artist of our species, with the aid of the best instrument.

2. A Meteorological instinct; for the Mole is a Meteoralogist.

3. An Arithmetical instinct; for the bird called Ninekille is an arithmetician; so is the Crow, the wild turkey, and some other birds.

4. An Electrical instinct; because the Torpedo, the ray, and the electric eel, are electricians.

5. A Navagatorial instinct; for the Nautilus is a navigator. He sets and lowers his sails, casts and weighs anchor, and performs the other nautical evolutions.

6. A Musical instinct; for whole tribes of birds are Musicians.

7. An Architectural instinct; the beaver is an architect, builder, and wood-cutter. He cuts down timber and builds houses and dams.

8. A Civil-engineering instinct; for such is the character of the Marmot: he not only builds houses, but constructs aqueducts to keep them dry.

9. A military instinct; for the white ants maintain a regular army of soldiers.

10. An Horticultural instinct; the East India ants raise mushrooms, upon which they feed their young.

11. A Mechancal instinct; wasps are paper manufacturers; caterpillars are silk-spinners; ploceus texter is a weaver—he weaves a web to make his nest; the prime is a tailor—he sews the leaves together to make his nest. The squirrel is a ferry-man. With a chip or piece of bark for a boat and his tail for a sail, he crosses a stream. Dogs, wolves, and jackalls are hunters. The black bear and heron are fishermen. The ants have regular days of labor; and the monkey is an expert rope-dancer.

12. An instinct for government. Beavers present us a model of a Republic; bees with a monarchy; the Indian antelope of a patriarchial; elephants of an aristocracy of elders; wild horses have a leader; and sheep are under the control of a military chief ram!

Now, If Mr. Lee can reconcile all these powers with his theory, let him do it; or, otherwise, let him yield his position as utterly unworthy of being defended. But, if he can harmonize these facts with his view, he will do more than any other author has ever been able to do. HOMO.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT NO NOVELTY.

"The doctrine of the witness of the Spirit, as implying a direct testimony," observes the Rev. Charles Prest, in one of his very able papers on this subject, in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for 1848, "has frequently been termed a novel one, devoid of the sanctions of ecclesiastical antiquity, and pronounced to be nothing more than a peculiarity of Methodism. This deserves attention, as novelties in religion are suspicious, if not invariably false. Few things more powerful can be brought against any professed interpretation of truth, than the proof of its being new; though it does not follow that every ancient interpretation is correct. We have, however, no difficulty in removing this imputation, and in demonstrating to every candid inquirer, most unequivocally, that it was not, as has been asserted, the invention of Mr. Wesley and his coadjutors; and that by a reference to the writings of the different ages of the Christian church. By some of the Fathers the doctrine was unquestionably thus held and expounded; or, passing by remote antiquity, in order to meet the objection on the ground on which it is usually based, the Reformers, the English Martyrs, the fathers and early dignitaries of the National Church, and many of the Puritans and Non-conformist divines thus interpreted it."

Subjoining are some quotations, fully establishing Mr. Prest's statements. Novatian, A. D. 250, speaks very distinctly of the Holy Ghost as the author of regeneration; the pledge of the promised inheritance, and, as it were, the hand-writing of eternal salvation.

Chrysostom, A. D. 398, teaches that the testimony declared Romans viii. 16, "is not the voice of the gift of grace which is conferred upon us, but of the comforting Spirit, inwardly assuring us that we are the sons of God."

Bernard, A. D. 1115, in Sermon V., "That which lieth hid concerning us in the heart of the Father, may by his Spirit be revealed unto us; and the same Spirit testifying unto us, may persuade our spirits that we are the sons of God"

Calvin, A. D. 1539, on Romans viii. 16, says: "St. Paul means that the Spirit of God gives such a testimony to us, that he being our guide and teacher, our spirit perceives our adoption of God to be certain. For our own mind, of itself, independent of the preceding testimony of the Spirit, could not produce this persuasion in us. For whilst the Spirit witnesses that we are the sons of God, he at the same time inspires this confidence into our minds, that we are bold to call God our Father." And again, in Galatians iv. 6: "The Fathers, under the old testament, were certain of their adoption. This adoption is the cause, and must have preceded the testimony of adoption given by the Holy Spirit, which is the effect. In venturing to call God Father, you have the advice and direction of the Spirit of Christ: therefore it is certain that you are the sons of God. (2 Cor. i. 22; v. 5.) It is not what the persons themselves, in the foolish judgment of the flesh, may venture to believe, but what God declares in their hearts by his Spirit. Let it be observed that Paul ascribes this universally to all Christians; for, where this pledge of Divine love toward us is wanting, there is assuredly no faith."

Melancthon, A. D. 1540, in one place, says: "The Holy Spirit is sent into the hearts of believers, that he may kindle new light, righteousness, and life eternal: he witnesses, bears testimony within us, that we are received into favor." And in another work: "Let converted persons therefore retain their assurance, nor yield to doubts, which produce profaneness and despair; let them conclude that they have both the reconciliation," (atonement,) "and the Holy Spirit as a pledge or earnest."

Archbishop Cranmer, A. D. 1540, in his Catechism, says: "The same Holy Ghost doth also assure and warrant us that our sins be forgiven, and that our pardon is signed with God's seal. For, when we believe in Christ, and are baptized, then we are born again, and are made the children of God. And when we be his children, then he giveth the Holy Ghost into our hearts, as St. Paul testifieth, writing thus: 'Forasmuch as you be now the children of God, therefore God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, which crieth Abba, Father.' And when we have received the Holy Ghost, he doth kindle in our hearts true love toward God."

Bradford: "Endue us with thy Holy Spirit, according to thy covenant and mercy, as well to assure us of pardon, and that thou dost accept us into thy favor as thy dear children in Christ, and for his sake, as to write thy law upon our hearts.... I pray thee to be merciful unto me, that I may feel indeed thy sweet mercy as thy child."

Archbishop Abbott, A. D. 1600, in his "Lectures on Jonah," says: "What is it to my soul that Christ died for others, unless I be assured that my part is therein? There is joy of the Spirit when men come to that measure."

Bishop Abbot, A. D. 1615, says: "When, therefore, God doth send forth his Spirit into our hearts, crying, and making us to cry, Abba, Father, the same is a witness to our spirit that we are the sons of God; because for no other reason doth God send forth his Spirit into our hearts, but because we are sons. When God giveth to us this light and feeling that he is our Father, there followeth necessarily a certificate that we are his children, because these, as relatives mutually depend one upon another. For neither the spirit of man himself, nor any other spirit, can give him that spiritual eye of the inner man, whereby to look upon God as a Father, that sincere, and single, and pure affection, and invocation, wherewith the faithful soul tendereth itself unto God, but only the Spirit of God himself. It is no way incident unto us to have in heart and conscience that familiar and lovely access unto the throne of grace, but upon conscience of the Spirit dwelling in us, as St. Hierome speaketh."

Bishop Davenant, A. D. 1629, in his book on Colossians, observes: "The Holy Spirit specially seals each particular believer, and makes him sure of his adoption, by a certain wonderful and secret testimony: for he is given to every believer as a pledge of divine love; and he, finally, pronounces in the hearts of the ungodly that they are in favor with God; which testimony they may and ought to believe. Therefore, they do believe in particular, that they are in the grace of God, and that their sins are remitted them. The authorities from which all this is proved are well known. (Romans viii. 16; Galatians iv. 6; and Ephesians i. 13.) Nor is this testimony fallacious or conjectural, but certain and infallible in all in whom it is found. For the word is the ministration of the Spirit; (2 Corinthians iii.;) and faith conceived by the ministration of the word is always joined by the witness of the Spirit itself, which is a particular testimony in the heart of a particular man that he is in grace, and that he is a child."

Richard Hooker, A. D. 1680, in his sermon on the Certainty of Faith: "The Spirit of God hath given to us, to assure us that we are the sons of God, to embolden us to [call upon him as our Father." And in his sermon on Jude: "Unto you, because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, to the end ye might know that Christ hath built you upon a rock immovable, that he hath registered your names in the book of life." One of his dying utterances was: "God hath heard my daily petitions, for I am at peace with all men, and he is at peace with me; and from that blessed assurance I feel that inward joy, which the world can neither give nor take from me."

Perkins, A. D. 1626: "That which God's Spirit doth testify to the conscience, the conscience can again testify to us: but God's Spirit doth testify to the conscience of a man regenerate, that he is a child of God. Therefore, conscience also doth the same" And on Romans viii. 16, he says: "In these words are two testimonies of our adoption set down: the first is the Spirit of God dwelling in us, and testifying unto us that we are God's children. The Holy Ghost gives testimony, by applying the promise of the remission of sins, and life everlasting by Christ, to the heart. The second testimony of our adoption is our spirit, that is, our conscience sanctified and renewed by the Holy Ghost."

Thomas Goodwin, A. D. 1653: "And this Spirit is still in our preaching, and in your hearts, and persuades you of Christ's very love to this day."

Manton, A. D. 1678, in his sermon on Job xix. 25: "What have you to show that God is reconciled to you? This is not evident, till we have the pledge of our reconciliation with God, the gift of the Holy Spirit. This affords infallible assurance of God's favor."

Poole, A. D. 1700, in his Annotations: "The Holy Spirit witnesseth to our spirit by a distinct and separate testimony, and witnesseth with our spirit (so the word properly signifies) by a conjunctive and concurrent testimony."

Owen, A. D. 1657, on Communion with God: "The Spirit worketh joy in the hearts of believers immediately by himself, without the consideration of any other acts or works of his, or deductions, or conclusions. This does not arise from our reflex consideration of the love of God, but rather gives occasion thereunto. He so sheds abroad the love of God in our hearts, and fills them with gladness by an immediate act and operation." And again: "The Comforter comes; and by a word of promise, or otherwise, overpowers the heart with a comfortable persuasion, (and bears down all objections,) that he is a child of God."

Isaac Ambrose, A. D. 1662, in his "Middle Things:" "The Spirit gives a distinct witness of his own, which is his immediate work, and is in a way of peculiarity and trancendency called, 'the witness of the Spirit.' And this evidence is solitary, without reference to inherent graces; yet, however, it excludes them not."

In the Confession of Faith issued by the Assembly of Divines, under the article Assurance, in the third edition, 1688, we read; "This certainly is not a bare conjectural and probable persuasion, but an infallible assurance of faith, founded upon the testimony of the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirit that we are the children of God."

THE TWO POPES.

In the empire of the Roman Church, which comprises, it is said, 200,000,000 subjects, scattered over the face of the world, there are two kings. The one is visible to all, and is called the Pope. He is enthroned at the Vatican, with cardinals, chamberlains, prelates and guards, arrayed like stage dancers in a drama of the fifteenth century. The other is the real ruler. He is established at the Gesu, and is called the General of the Jesuits. He is at the head of an association, the most united, the most energetic, and the most powerful in the world.

The first of these potentates is addressed as his Holiness, the second as his Reverence. Should you ever be presented to the Pope, you will meet him in the antechamber of the apartment where the Vicar of Christ will offer you his ring and his toe to kiss, and before entering which you will be required to make three successive genuflexions—four or five young bishops in violet soutanes with rochets plated in small folds, enlivening by a quit chat the tedium of court ceremonies. When you have crossed the threshold of the Gesu, and are about to present yourself to the General of the Jesuits, you pass through a room where forty secretaries may be seen writing in every known language, and eventually you find yourself in the presence of a man entrusted with stupendous powers, who will invite you to be seated, and enter into familiar conversation with you. He is the Richelieu of Catholicism, the other is its Louis XIII.

There is more real work done here in a few days than is achieved in all the assemblies presided over by cardinals, or even by the pope himself, in an entire year. The Papacy represents the old economy of the church in the middle ages with its jog-trot ways, its good nature, its genial fashions, whilst Jesuitism is administered with all the skill of that system of centralization in which lies the strength of modern institutions. The Vatican is a great feudal castle, and home of domestic life. The Gesu, is an office where each finds on his arrival, morning after morning, his appointed task, and works under the stern eye of a president, who holds the interest of the world in his hands.

The Pope is prodigal of his gifts and blessings: representing Him who multiplied the five loaves of the desert feast, he imagines the treasury of the sovereigns of the Roman States is inexhaustible for a like miraculous reason. No case of suffering or indigence, we might truly add no pious scheme, is ever handed to him without his giving a handsome subscription.

The very reverend General of the Jesuits, on the other hand administers an exchequer larger than that of twenty minor potentates, such as the kings of Bavaria and Portugal, and Greece. Yet every farthing that he spends is entered with the most rigid exactness. The Papacy receives yearly from, the offerings of the faithful, from the proceeds of dispensations, gigantic sums, of which it reserves not a farthing for itself. Say there is some old Madonna of dark wood, like that of Chartres or Notre-Dame-des-Victories, should the Pope send it a crown, the diadem will be of gold, inlaid with precious stones, and will have cost 80,000 francs. The Papacy, like an exhausted fountain, is ever yielding. The Society of Jesus is a deep abyss, which would engulph through successive generations the hard-earned gold of preacher and professor, the inheritance so long and so patiently waited for, did not the terrible law of periodical revolutions fulfil itself from time to time, and transfer the gold of Delphi to the plunderer's sack.

The Popes are painfully conscious of the pressure of that rival power, which, under the pretext of defending them, insinuates itself quietly in their place. Clement XIV. summoned courage at length after great hesitation and many tears to raise his hand against the encroaching tribe by disbanding his Janissaries. After the terrible convulsions of the revolution, the Papacy, now at its last extremity, flung itself once more into their arms. Very soon their influence was painfully felt. They became the vehement opponents of Pius IX. in his political reforms; and now they support him only because they have thoroughly humbled his power, and reduced it to that state of utter prostration, the precursor of its dying struggles.

Over and over again has Pius IX. sought to withdraw himself from this tyranny. On one occasion he fished out of the Vatican the authentic documents of their expulsion under Clement XIV., and directed Father Theiner to publish them under the title of "The Life of Clement XIV." The book proved to be the most formidable ever issued against the Society since its contents had first been fulminated by the same authority. The Jesuits, pliant in the midst of their strength, bent their heads to the storm, and rose from it more vigorous than ever. Thus the Jesuits' Vatican has got the upper hand of the Papal; the true Pontiff sees himself surrounded with the real power of the church, while the other is free to give state audiences to the ambassadors of kings and emperors, to shower hosts of medals, rosaries, and "agnuses;" to send the golden rose to empresses and queens, and satisfy the general appetite for benedictions, which the populace of Rome is for ever manifesting.

The War News.

There was a hard fought battle last week, in which Gen. Grant extended the left line of his fortifications some four or five miles to the southwest of Petersburg, Va., much to the disquiet of the rebel Gen. Lee. The rebel leaders seem in a terrible rage, at Richmond, by their lack of success in war and diplomacy. Pharaoh like, their hearts seem to be hardened more and more: so we have expected it would be. God's day of judgment on the wicked institution of slavery has overtaken them; and they seem to be "gnawing their tongues for pain."

The point of most interest, at present, in the war movements, is in the South, by Gen. Sherman. He seems to be moving almost unopposed in the midst of the birthplaces of the rebellion. The following summary of Gen. Sherman's operations and the results, we copy from the New York Herald of Monday.

"The Richmond papers tell us that a portion of General Sherman's troops, probably Kilpatrick's cavalry, have occupied two or three points along the railroads connecting Charleston, Richmond and Augusta, and there were reports that Branchville, South Carolina was in our possession; and their silence as to any battle at that point, is a sufficiently clear intimation that he met with no resistance. Indeed, such was the condition of the rebels, that Wheeler states he was compelled to burn the bridge at Holmes or Edisto Post Office, thus severing the railroad communication between Augusta and Richmond, as well as between Augusta and Charleston. But Branchville is the most important point to the enemy in the whole State of South Carolina. Its possession by Sherman controls the railroad communication between Virginia and Augusta, and entirely separates Georgia and the Gulf States from the rebel capital, though the Richmond papers intimate that there are means of communication which it would be unwise to mention. This is believed to be mere rebel bravado, since if the means actually existed, it would be much wiser to keep its existence a secret. The truth is, that not a pound of subsistance, nor a musket, a cannon, or a cartridge can, from this period, pass either one way or the other between Richmond and Augusta, the grand rebel arsenal; nor yet between Richmond and the broken down army lately under Hood. If there is still a communication of instruction it must be by roundabout ways. Sherman's presence at Branchville will also necessitate the evacuation of Charleston—inasmuch as a force at Branchville can isolate one at Charleston, and compel it either to stand a siege or surrender. As the force at Charleston was too small to fight and too large to lose, we may, no doubt, give full credit to the report that it has already abandoned the birthplace of the rebellion to the invincible Yankees.

"Such is the importance of Branchville, then, that it is not to be supposed that the enemy would have permitted it to fall into our hands without an effort to save it, if he could by any possibility have made such an effort. Here, then, we see all the recent assertions as to the strength the rebellion had left in the far South, tested in a very plain way by a hard fact.

There are now in the world about 7,000,000 Jews. About half that number are in Europe. Russia alone comprises 1,200,000. It is remarkable that in England, France, and Belgium, where the Jewish race is completely emancipated, the number is diminishing, while it is increasing elsewhere. At Frankfort-on-the-Maine there is one Jew to every sixteen Christians. In France there are 80,000 Jews, in England 42,000.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 15, 1865.

Newspaper Postage.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

Increase of Subscribers.

We seldom make any appeals for an increase of subscribers; yet if the friends of the HERALD OF LIFE think their paper worth sustaining, and intend to sustain it, it is desirable that they should do something beyond donations, or the mere paying for their own papers. Others make mighty efforts to increase their circulation. Shall we make less to circulate the paper that has come into existence by the liberality of a few friends, and which is set to promulgate and defend the grand crowning doctrine of the Gospel—"NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST"? Without this foundation stone, the Gospel lacks clearness in the minds of men, and can not withstand, successfully, the assaults of its mistaken friends or its open enemies. Once let in the element of a future-life torment, for perishing men, and the torrent that follows is irresistible. Whoever looks at the ground taken, at the present time, by the opponents of literal death as the wages of sin, will find that the admission of a future life, or a life after death to the wicked, is the strong point on which the doctrine of endless torment is made to hinge. When the point is established of no life out of Christ, and hence no life after death to such as die out of Him, the foundation and superstructure of the endless torment theorists fall together, and their system is remedilessly overthrown. Thus is God honored, Christ exalted, his work vindicated, and the Gospel shown to be what its very name imports—GOOD NEWS.

Without this view, the atonement itself is obscured, its nature and real merit beclouded, and all attempts to explain it are bewildering and unsatisfactory. With it, all is plain, clear, harmonious and glorious; calculated to inspire confidence in God and his Anointed.

Shall the only paper in the world (so far as known) which advocates these views of God's government, of the work of Christ and the destiny of men, be sustained by a wider circulation, and a more earnest support by its friends? There can be but one response in all our hearts. Let every one who reads these remarks be resolved to increase the number of subscribers at least one. TRY. Now is the time. Do not delay a day. Look about and see if you can not procure one or more to aid in this blessed work of enlightening a dark world in the way of life, and the glories connected with this scheme of mercy devised in heaven and revealed to men for their encouragement and salvation; that they may have eternal life through Jesus the LIFE-GIVER.

Return of Jacob's Posterity.

To us it is incomprehensible how any believer in the literal destruction of the wicked can doubt the literal return of Jacob's posterity. The principle of interpretation is the same in both cases; at least, so it seems to us. Drive us from this principle, and we should find no difficulty in going over to spiritualism in regard to the return and reign of Christ, and kindred subjects.

We have not space, at present, to remark on the words of James, Acts xv.; but by turning to the prophecy from which he quotes, it is evident that a clear distinction is made between those who are concerned in building the tabernacle of David, and the heathen that are called by the name of the Lord. It is found in Amos ix, and reads thus—"Behold, the eyes of the Lord are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth; saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord. For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall on the earth."...."In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old: that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen that are called by my name, saith the Lord that doeth this."...."And I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them;".... "and I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land, which I have given them, saith the Lord God."

It seems to us, no unprejudiced mind can question that this is clearly a prophecy, the latter part of which is to be as literally fulfilled as we know the former part has been; and any transferring the promises, here made, to gentile christians, destroys the harmony of the word; for those gentile christians are distinguished from the "house of Israel" in these words of the Lord. They are expressly named as the "heathen upon whom MY NAME is called" in distinction from the "they," who are employed in raising up the tabernacle of David.

Probation in the Next Age.

In relation to our Lord's words, Luke xx., 'They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world"—aionos, that age, [i. e., of Messiah's reign] "AND the resurrection from the dead," &c., we say: the next age, or age of Messiah's personal-reign on the throne of his father David, will open with a resurrection of all the sleeping saints who have suffered with or for Christ in this or the previous ages: such "shall reign with him:" see Rom. viii. 17, 2 Tim. ii. 12, and Rev. iii. 21. These having suffered with Christ, and overcome the seductions to abandon his cause, will "together be made perfect" in body and mind. Compare Rom. viii. 23; Phil. iii. 20, 21; 1 Corth. xv. 23, 51—53; 1 Thess. iv. 13—17, with Heb. xi. 8—10, 13—16, 39, 40, and Heb. xii. 22—24, reading the 22d verse, Ye are to come; or, ye are coming; for, that is clearly the sense of the original word here; and it removes all obscurity from the text and makes it harmonise with the inspired testimony in the previous texts to which we have called attention.

That there will be more than two classes of men on the earth at the opening of the next age, or at the second advent of Christ, to us is clear. Those who have suffered tribulation for Christ, and those who have contributed to produce that tribulation, form two classes. These two classes have lived together: both have heard the gospel—one class has obeyed it; the other has not obeyed; and therefore know not God; and have been troublers of them that did know Him and obey the gospel. Such troublers of God's people shall, in the time of Christ's personal administration, "be punished with everlasting destruction:" for them there is no more trial, or probation. But there is a third class of men, viz.: Those "that have not heard God's fame, neither have seen his glory," &c. See Isa. lxvi. 18, 19. This class constitutes by far the largest part of the present inhabitants of the earth. If any object to this, that the gospel has been preached in all nations, we demand the proof. Even if it had, it has been done in so corrupted a form as to make it "another gospel" than "the gospel of Jesus Christ;" and it is those who have not obeyed "the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:" not the gospel of Plato, of Molock, of Papacy, even though under the improved name of Protestantism.

Who they are, and how many of the human family will be the subjects of trial under Messiah's personal reign, we do not pretend to determine; but one thing, to us, is clear, that none who have had the gospel in its purity will be of the number; and yet it is equally clear that there will be left of the nations," [Zech. xiv. 16] and that such will be in a state of trial, or probation. That violence is done to a large portion of the Old and New Testaments, by an opposite view, is to our mind apparent; and yet far be it from us to accuse any of intending to pervert the words of God; still we know from past experience that strong attachment to the theory of an entire new creation at the second advent of Christ, imperceptibly biases the mind and prevents its feeling the force of texts that would otherwise be conclusive and irresistible.

My Visit to Philadelphia.

BR. STORRS:—I have found encouragement in the labors of the gospel by my visit to this city. The interest at the Hall, corner of Ninth and Callowhill streets, is in its infancy, in some sense, but no longer an experiment. BR. WENDELL had been laboring with them for two weeks upon my arrival, Jan. 21st., and left the inquiring minds, who had concluded to enjoy liberty to seek for the knowledge of God in the harmonious testimony of scripture, eager for more instruction of the same kind.

The congregation is composed of old Adventists, and some few new comers, who believe first in the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ," with a friendly feeling to the views which we preach concerning the coming and kingdom of Christ. It is manifest that some more of the older meeting desire to fathom this inquiry, which is now beginning to occupy the thoughts of the Church of Christ. How soon, those who are willing to give attention to what we preach, commence the discovery of beauty in the platform which so fully exalts the power of the Son of God and abases all human goodness.

There is an interest to hear upon the subject of Life only in Christ which is being aided by the stand our brethren have taken, and which we hope will prove so far successful that the people of this vast city may listen to the grand culminating truth of revelation.

The audiences were better at the close of our labors than when we commenced. Prejudice was removed; some became satisfied who were before but partially convinced. A good feeling seemed to exist, notwithstanding some previous trial toward those from whom this meeting separated; and some of those belonging to the old place, very kindly, came to hear, as well as to show kindness; that, we assure them, was appreciated, while engaged in our labors and calls upon different families. Had a pleasant interview with Br. Stuart, long a preacher in Philadelphia, and who now, in very severe personal afflictions, possesses a strong interest in the Advent faith, expressing himself as happy to receive a call from a brother who so strongly advocates a view of the resurrection of the wicked opposite to his own. I wish for the comfort of some of our old fellow laborers, they could once behold the glories of this merciful plan, by which God's justice and mercy unite to exhibit his love, even to the poor lost subject of death.

I have no doubt that prosperity and success will attend this work, which it appears, was imposed on the brethren at Philadelphia, even against their will at first, but manifestly in God's order. I have formed most interesting acquaintances with many who have been long on this way; and whom I shall hope to meet in the final gathering of the pilgrims to the heavenly world of light.

I may add, that there seemed to be an appreciation, not only of the truth of our mission, but of the open and direct manner in which we endeavored to impress the subject upon the thought of the believer. There, as elsewhere, the heart appears involved—the doctrine appeals directly to the heart, and the heart believes. I was much pleased, and the people were all, apparently, pleased. My views of the harmony of divine inculcation improve, or I am much mistaken. How grand and perfect the whole immense, divine superstructure looks, as from this stand point we conceive of the great strength and utility, together with the crowning embellishments of the system of grace.

I availed myself of my time in the Quaker City, to visit various institutions, with friends who were anxious that I should lose no opportunity of hearing and seeing the efforts of men to improve, preserve, ornament, educate, and celebrate, whereby I might learn and become more ready for the labor assigned me in the great field. The Academy of Natural Sciences, the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, the U. S. Mint, the U. S. Hospital at Chestnut Hill, the Old State House, where, in Independence Hall, I saw the old bell, whose motto, cast in, is, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land; to all the inhabitants thereof," were among the objects of interest. I visited some others.

It was my privilege to attend the Third Anniversary of the Christian Commission, Jan. 31, at the Academy of Music; at the commencement of which the President received the announcement of the passage of the act amending the Constitution. I was particularly interested in the style of celebrating, for it was with prayers and speeches from ministers whose souls were full (then we could feast) and by addresses from Generals of the army (Gens. Fisk and Gregory) who, while speaking upon the great interests of the soldiers, stopped and called out for the whole vast concourse to join and sing "Old Hundred," and then, at another point, "Come Thou Fount of every Blessing." This was a new way; and it was good. I attended, at the same place again, when I heard that distinguished divine, Bishop Simpson, of the Methodist Church, in a patriotic speech that did my soul good.

The friends have my thanks for help after a godly sort. Thus I conclude "a blessing is in it"—morally, intellectually, and every way. I expect to return in a few weeks.

W. S. CAMPBELL.

God's Individual Plan.—No. 8.

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

The true theory of condemnation is the key to the Atonement, which now demands our attention. The necessity of atonement was declared through Moses to the children of Israel, but its full exposition was reserved unto the fulness of time." The first principle of the doctrine was set forth as follows: "The life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls." Lev. xvii. 11. As the flesh is condemned by the law of God, and as the penalty is death, the law claims the life of the flesh, and this life "is in the blood." Man shares this life with other animals. Hence the shedding of their blood, from Abel to Christ, was an acknowledgment of the law's claim. But notwithstanding this claim, God promised an everlasting life to all who would enter into a covenant with him, and keep their vow. And he instituted the sacrificial system as a sign of the covenant. "Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice." Ps. l. 5. The pouring out of the blood showed that the claim of the law was not to be set aside, and that the penalty would be executed. "There is no remission without shedding blood." Heb ix. 22. Whatever might be done to save man, the law would be thoroughly vindicated, and its "wrath" appeased. As the life was demanded, the life would be given; and although man might tremble at the proposition, yet he must accept it if he would have part in the great deliverance. From the highest heaven came the solemn and weighty announcement: "The blood, the blood, shall make atonement for the soul. The blood, the blood! shall expiate for sin. The blood, blood, the blood!"

But whose blood did the law demand? Whose, but the sinner's? "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins." Heb. x. 4. Man must pay down his own blood—must give up his own life. But how can this be? How can man surrender the only life he has, and yet live? This question was never answered until "the Logos was made flesh," until "God sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh," until, "as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also himself likewise took part of the same." John i. 14; Rom. viii. 3; Heb. ii. 14. Until the day of light should come, Israel would have to be content with the promise of salvation alone, and their faith in the promise would be indicated in the sacrifices of the ceremonial law. Strange indeed that the loss of life was to go hand in hand with the salvation! Strange, exceeding strange, that the law was to have its full claim, and the victim yet go free! Strange, that the soul was to be expiated by the sacrifice of its own life! But yet it had been said. YAHVEH had said—"The blood shall make atonement for the soul."

The question would also assume another shape. If God has condemned the whole race as not worthy of life, and if he has sown the seeds of corruption in the very compages of humanity; if in Adam all are condemned, and all die; how can He be just, in promising any child of man a future life? How can he be just in overlooking the sins of them who have covenanted with him by sacrifice? and how can he contract to save them?

At length the answer came. The veil was lifted. The cloud was withdrawn. The chosen messenger of the old dispensation pointed to "the Lamb of God which beareth the sin of the world." John i. 29. He came to open the book of God's purposes, and to loose the seals thereof. The two questions were given him: How can man give up the only life he has, and yet live forever? How can God be just, and justify the ungodly? To the first he said: "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me. In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure: Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God." Heb. x. 5–7. "By the which will," saith the epistler, "we are expiated, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ [not once a year] but once for all. And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: but this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God....For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are expiated." Heb. x. 10–14. The whole subject of atonement is solved by the fact that Jesus had two natures in their fulness. In him dwelt all the fulness of the Deity bodily, and yet he partook of flesh and blood. The heavenly and the earthy were blended. The animal and the spiritual dwelt together in the incarnated Logos. "Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, which was manifested in the flesh." 1 Tim. iii. 16. He laid down his blood life, and took up his spirit life. "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, having been put to death indeed in the flesh [his animal nature], but quickened in the spirit [his Divine nature]. 1 Pet. iii. 18.

Thus Jesus vindicated the word of YAHVEH, "The blood shall make atonement for the soul." The law claimed the blood, and Jesus gave it. But the law "was ordained to life" for every one that should agree with it. The spiritual nature of Jesus did agree with it—for the law is spiritual. Hence, it could interpose no obstacle to the revival of Jesus in the spirit. And "Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died by sin [tai hamartiai, Dative of instrument] once: but in that he liveth, he liveth by God." Rom. vi. 9, 10. Jesus died and rose again, to show how the law is magnified in the death of the sinful nature, and yet how the children of the covenant escape destruction by virtue of the spirit nature. The law claims our animal life and will have it; but we have a spirit life which is "hid with Christ in God; and when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory."

Thus the first question is answered. We must be begotten from above, begotten of the Spirit. We must have the incorruptible seed of the Logos implanted within us—in our essential being. We are then prepared for death. The law stretches forth its relentless arm, snatches our animal life, as it did that of Jesus. With him, we descend into death. With him we lie in death. The law is appeased. The blood has made "atonement for the soul." Our animal existence is ended. But although in sheol, we are not consumed there. We do not perish there. Although unconscious, we are not extinct. We sleep. Although in sheol, we are "with Christ," for not even death is able to pluck us out of his hand. John x. 28, 29. And when the morning comes, when the Sun arises with healing in his beams, when the Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, the Life-giving energy of the Divine nature will seize us, and we shall "be raised incorruptible." "O death, where is thy sting? O hades, where is thy victory?"

To the second question—How can God be just and give life to those who have already been condemned as unworthy to continue their existence?—Jesus answered by his chosen legate, Paul. "Whom God hath set forth a propitiation by his blood, through faith, for a manifestation of his righteousness, because of the pretermission of the sins before done, in the forbearance of God; for a manifestation of his righteousness in the present time: that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." Rom. iii. 25, 26. The pretermission or passing over of the sins of the children of the covenant throughout the ante-Christian ages needed an explanation, and the Apostle declares that God set forth Christ as a propitiation to manifest his (God's) righteousness in the matter, to vindicate his justice in thus contracting to save those who had already been condemned in Adam. The sacrifice of Christ discovered the Spirit-nature in which he revived from death, and as the salvation was, thus shown to be through a new life-principle, which was not subject to any claim on the part of the law, the Divine justice was fully sustained. God can be just in taking the forfeited life, and yet justify the believer to a life not forfeited—to a life which pertains to the nature in which the believer is begotten anew. As the justification was thus approved by propitiation of Christ, we are said to be "justified by his blood." And if so, "we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, [before the true propitiation was discovered] we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his [Spirit] life. And not only so, but we also joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation." Rom. v. 9–11. "For the love of Christ constraineth us [believers]; because we thus judge, that if one [Christ] died for all [as representing all who are united to him by the Spirit], then all died [2d Aorist] [in him as the representative—"our old man is crucified with him"—all have the condemned nature and will have to give it up]: and he died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves [unto the flesh; because by his one sacrifice he renounced, in their behalf, all sympathy for that nature], but unto him which died [in the flesh] for them, and rose again. Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: ["For the love of Christ constraineth us"—our sympathies are no longer fleshly, but spiritual]: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more. [As an animal man he has ceased to exist]. Therefore if any man be in Christ [if he has been baptized by one Spirit into the one body of Christ—which is the one seed of Abraham, a collective unity] he is a new creature [he is begotten from above]: old things [of the flesh] are passed away; behold, all things are become new. [The love of Christ constraineth him to live in the Spirit]. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ [Christ merely illustrated God's purposes] reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them [if they will believe]; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin [by his assumption of the flesh] for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God [by our reception of the Spirit] in him [our representative]. 2 Cor. v. 14–21.

The Encyclical.

This encyclial letter, which condemns all the progress of the last three centuries, is causing great trouble and perturbation in France. The Archbishop of Paris belongs to what is called the liberal branch of the Catholic church, and upon the appearance of this document, proving the imbecility of his Holiness at Rome, is said to have gone to the Minister of Public Worship and implored him to help French Catholicism out of the difficulty. The Minister responded by a decree prohibiting the reading of the "Encyclique" in the churches of France. This measure, or rather half measure, has had little effect. The Pope's letter was already known all over France, and the most obstinate church functionaries up to this time, to the number of twenty, have either protested against the right of the government to prohibit the promulgation of anything emanating from the Holy See, or have openly defied the government itself. The Bishop of Malines and the Archbishop of Besancon belong to the latter category, and have rendered themselves liable to be called before the Council of State for an abuse of ecclesiastical authority—comme d'abus. Everybody asks, What then? And the answer comes from everywhere, Why, nothing! These rebellious prelates will be simply told that they must do so no more. The law authorizes banishment in such cases of lese majeste, but if this measure should be resorted to, the cry of persecution would be raised. Indeed, the present government would not dare to proceed to so extreme a measure. Dim and distant perspectives of an entire separation of the Church from the State are presented to the disaffected, but I find, from conversations with several well-informed persons of very different religious views, that the opinion is very general that France is not yet ready for this great movement. It may be, however, as it has been with many of our people on the question of slavery, it will be necessary to free the people before it can be ascertained whether they are fit for a new condition—that is to say, make the experiment.

Some of the Paris papers have published statistics which make one shudder, to find how many people are put out of the pale of salvation by the encyclique, when it affirms that not one shall be saved who will not accept without reservation the dogmas proclaimed by ultramontane orthodoxy. This exclusiveness leaves out of the reach of all hope of divine mercy 150 millions of Mohamedans, 600 millions of Brahmins and Buddhists, 100 millions of pagans, 4 or 5 millions of Jews, leaving only 280 millions of Christians, from which must be taken the Anglican, Greek, and Chaldean churches, Unitarians, Lutherans, Calvinists, Presbyterians, Puritans, Quakers, Methodists. The Siecle publishes a paragraph from a Naples paper, which proves that Italy is not standing still with the papal court: "In the grand court of the university at Naples a statue has just been erected to Giordano Bruno, an ex-Dominican monk, and a friend of Theodore de Beze, (a French Protestant,) burned alive at Rome for being a heretic, and for having violated his religious vows. Last Saturday, at the foot of the statue, the students of the university burned the 'encyclique,' with its eighty annexed propositions. Liberty at last permits the lex talionis in Italy, after three centuries of interval, only in the former days they burned the man with his work."—The Paris Correspondent of The Methodist.

Demonism: alias Spiritualism.

The Holy Scriptures inform us that the seducing spirits will speak lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron.

This is another most striking and fearful characteristic. These few words of the holy Scriptures daguerrotype them to the life. We find, from Romans i., that the mark of a reprobate mind is not only to commit things worthy of death, but to "have pleasure in them that do them." This is just what these spirits do; and not only so, but they are utterly without any kind of compunction, and they deliberately speak and teach the greatest villanies, while at the same time they know, as well as can possibly be known, that what they say is the most barefaced lie. With them it is become a matter of cool and deliberate calculation how most successfully to ruin souls, and how to entice the greatest number. It is altogether an intellectual operation, with which circumstances and feelings have nothing whatever to do. Their consciences are seared with a hot iron. But, at the same time, they are too cunning to let their lies appear as such. Like their master when he is seen in heaven as the accuser of the saints, they are clothed in garments of light. They are masters of hypocrisy. They pretend to have the welfare of the human race at heart, as their great object. Hence they extol virtue, love wisdom, goodness, truth and justice, and pretend to base all their teachings on them. They laud the perfectibility of human nature to the skies; they say that man has long been held in bondage by the force of circumstances, and that all he needs is development, which by their aid he may obtain. They "promise him liberty," and repeat the old tactics which their master practiced in Eden. "Progress!" "Light!" is the cry. "Progression," "Reform," "Perfection," are the mottoes. They paint seraphic beauties, which inwardly are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness.

They deny every doctrine of the Bible; but at the same time, when it suits their purpose, these consummate masters of hypocrisy and lies, utterly dead to any compunction, just like their master, readily quote the Bible to fortify their teachings. They are ravening wolves in sheep's clothing. They look like lambs, but speak as dragons. Those who are skilled in heavenly truth detect their bad pronunciation, otherwise their craft is so consummate that the very elect might be deceived with the utterances they put forth from the secret chambers. Their publications afford a sample of their shameless lies in hypocrisy. Let all be warned....

The "spirits" are also adepts at another thing, mixing truth with falsehood, so as to render the lies undistinguishable, as poisonous drugs are sugar-coated to conceal their nauseous taste. Beware of these sugar-coated pills. Here and there, too, we find that their mouth-pieces handle certain abstruse subjects (such as sleep and death) with great ability, and perhaps present some psychological facts that have hitherto been overlooked or unknown. And all this makes the great latter-day snare more dangerous, by giving it more attractiveness and a scientific air.

But what does their boasted progress and light really amount to? Let some reclaimed votaries of the wicked system tell us.

Dr. Randolph, for eight years a medium and lecturer, and hence well acquainted with all its workings, in his renunciation of the system, makes the following confession: "A. J. Davis and his clique of Harmonialists say there are no evil spirits. I emphatically deny the statement. Five of my friends destroyed themselves, and I attempted it, by direct spirit influence. Every crime in the calendar has been committed by mortal movers of viewless beings. It has also broken up families, squandered fortunes, tempted and destroyed the weak. It has banished peace from families, separated husbands and wives, and shattered the intellects of thousands." "Look on this picture, and look on that." Dr. Hatch, another reformed "spiritualist," says: "The most damning iniquities are perpetrated in 'spiritual circles,' a very small percentage of which ever comes to public attention. I care not whether it be spiritual or mundane. The facts exist, and should demand the attention and condemnation of an intelligent community."

T. L. Harris, another prominent renouncer of "spiritualism," says: "Murder, adultery, suicide, and the most revolting blasphemies, may be traced directly to the communications and puttings forth of impure spirits, both in ancient and modern times. And so far as I am able to judge, the majority of such instances are traceable to the habit of attending seances. I earnestly call attention to this point. The man of iron nerves may say that he feels no change of state. He may laugh down the idea of peril. With him it is but a question of time. The vitriol that eats in a day through iron wire has but to continue the process to eat through the iron bar. 'It is slow, this poison, but sure.' If you do not wish to become yourselves demoniacs, shun the place and shun the occasion. To the pure, and to those who would remain pure, I can hint such reasons as, if uttered, would make every ear tingle."

Once more we say, let all men avoid "spiritualism," and its demon teachings and siren enticements, as they would the fire.

Our remarks under this head have had reference to the hypocritical teachings of "spiritualism," but it is also true that the demons, when consulted for advice, or an expression of opinion regarding the ordinary affairs and occurrences of life, very often (though not always) mislead the questioners, and occasionally make merry over their easy credulity. So, also, if, with a view to testing their character, they are asked questions respecting the Christian faith, they do not scruple to tell lies in hypocrisy.

We find the following, in a letter from a friend: "They are to speak lies in hypocrisy. They do this to my knowledge. The word hypocrisy can apply to nothing else but a pretence of religion. To deceive the religious this they will make; but none of them will stand the test of St. John's institutes. 'Try the spirits,' he says; if they confess not that Jesus is come in the flesh, they are Antichrist. This does not allude to their confession, historically made, that there is such a man, for they will confess that; but that which the name Jesus signifies, the Saviour,—the Saviour in the only way, that of shedding his blood for the remission of sins. A friend of mine was about being deceived by them, because they said they believed in the Saviour. I told her to try them as St. John did,—to ask the medium plainly if she believed that Jesus died for the sins of the world. It was a celebrated medium, who professed to be very pious when with pious people. She would talk about bearing the cross, and of suffering for her belief—all to deceive. This friend, who wanted to converse with her deceased daughter through the medium, was assured that she (the medium) was a believer in Jesus. I had tried to induce my friend not to go; but she promised me that, if she did, she would try the medium's faith in the Saviour, according to the test of St. John. She went, and had a satisfactory conversation with her daughter, as she supposed—for she said her very tone of voice was exactly imitated; she was also reminded of actual occurrences that had transpired, &c. The deception was so complete, and she was so anxious to believe that she had really communed with her daughter, that she did not want to be undeceived. But she had promised to make the test, and she did. At first the medium answered (or rather the spirit speaking through her), Oh yes, she believed in Jesus; she thought he was a lovely character,—and admitted that we ought to live like him. But when she was asked whether she believed that he died for our sins, and that we have remission of sins through faith in his blood, she became angry, and said she believed no such thing. She was asked whether she didn't believe what the Bible says on that subject? She said, No. That there were some very good things in the Bible, but there were a great many mistakes; and they didn't take it for their guide,—they had higher instruction from the spirits. This is but one instance out of several that I have known, where the spirits confessed nearly all the truths of the Gospel; pretending to be very pious, until questioned on the subject of the vicarious sufferings of Christ; and that moment they denied the faith, and the whole framework of their deception was manifested. But this will serve as a sample of their telling lies in hypocrisy."

France and the Pope.

The usual New Year's reception was held by the emperor, and it is remarked that in the reply to the felicitations offered by the papal nuncio in the name of all the diplomatic corps, as well as in that to the archbishops of Paris, in the name of the church, that no allusion is made to the Pope—an unusual omission. There is no doubt that the emperor is much embarrassed by this frank exposition of the views of the Holy See. France is still so entirely Catholic that his Majesty will find it very difficult to reconcile all the inharmonious elements which have been infused into its Catholicism by the Revolution.

M. Thiers, who is a member of the Catholic church, not long ago declared his intention of attacking the convention of the 15th of September; that is, of speaking in favor of the temporal power of the Pope. Since the publication of the "encyclique" this distinguished statesman is said to have told a friend that it would now be impossible to take the part he intended in the debates, as the Pope himself had snatched away from him all the arguments he intended to make use of.—The Methodist.

The Liberal Press of Paris.

The outcry of the liberal press of Paris for more liberty for the coming year is almost terrible. M. Eugene Pelletan, in the Courier du Dimanche, (one of the ablest liberal journals of France) utters a sort of savage wail over the liberties outraged during the past year in France, and takes comfort only in the prospect which is opening on the other side of the Atlantic. He says: "We (the French) must cross the ocean to be reconciled with Providence. There, at least, right seems to be getting the upper hand, and yet how many times in this impious struggle, in which a Cain raises his hand against his mother, big with a new world, we have said to ourselves, victory, after all, is not a matter of choice; should it fall to the lot of the South, we should put on mourning for all humanity. For America is not only America—a place and a nation— it is more than this, and, above all, it is the model school of liberty. If, by some impossible chance, it should perish, with it a great experiment would fail. But, thank God, the North now holds the South in an iron grasp which is gradually tightening....Thus, consolation at a distance, sadness at home. This is the dying year—let it die, and never more be remembered.—The Methodist.

The Missionary's Protege.

A few years ago as a missionary to the Jews, employed by the New York City Mission Society, was passing along the street, his attention was attracted by the cry, so frequently heard, "glass put in." The utterer proved to be a boy of his own nation miserably clad and ill kept, but of fine open face and noble bearing. Accosting him he found that not even the Scribes and Pharisees of our Saviour's time were more bound up in their bigoted belief than this boy. He took him home and opening his heart by every possible kindness strove to teach him the truth. But it was long before he could make any impression. At length, however, he was rejoiced to have his protege make a profession of religion, and enter the church. A place in a store was secured for him, but the promise that the missionary had read in the eye and bearing of the lad was not a false one. He spent all his leisure in study, and at length left business to prepare himself for the ministry. He was ordained, and went to China as a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal church.

Recent advices from that dark empire say that he is the interpreter of the American embassy at the court of Pekin, a man of great influence with both Chinese and foreigners, and of great value to this country. With another missionary, he is also engaged in making a translation of the Bible into the higher colloquial or Mandarin language of China. This is the spoken language of the court, of all official persons, and of the better educated classes in China. These facts were stated at a recent meeting, by the missionary who years before roused the boy from his bigotry and darkness, and he naturally dwelt with pleasure upon the eminent position of his former pupil, and with thankfulness upon the useful and consecrated life he had been instrumental in evoking from wretched poverty and ignorance. The name of the missionary interpreter is Schereschewsky; and of the missionary to the Jews, who still pursues his labors among the people whom God has called his own, is Gideon Robert Lederer.

Light in Darkness,

OR THE WOUNDED SOLDIER OF GETTYSBURG.

Can this be Charley Putnam? This is the question old friends ask on seeing the wounded soldier. About two years ago he went to the war, full of health, hope, courage; in the first flush of manhood. "Oh, how proud he he stood before" his weeping and admiring mother "in his suit of blue" the morning he left.

Charley had passed through many battles uninjured, but that of Gettysburg proved too much for him. Poor fellow, he is stone blind, and his blindness is hopeless. He will never again see the face of a friend, or behold the light of the sun. He has also lost the sense of taste. His sympathizing friends need not send him delicacies to tempt his appetite, for one thing to him has as much relish as another. His sense of smell is also paralyzed. You need not give him that beautiful bouquet of flowers; it will be lost upon him. Preserve it for some wounded soldier who can enjoy it better. Poor Charley Putnam! Yet he says he was never so happy in his life as he is now. Let us ask him about it.

You say you are happy, Charley; but it seems to us that you are in a wretched condition. We feel for you. You have given your country your choicest and your best, and you can have no compensation for what you have lost. If our glorious old flag should float to-morrow through the length and breadth of the land, your eyes could not see it. You must find comfort only in the reflection that you have done your duty.

Do not pity me, says Charley. This is the year of jubilee to me. Oh, I am more than compensated for all my losses. I have found what I would not exchange for the whole world.

What is it?

I have found the pearl of great price; I have found my Saviour. If he had not led me through the dark valley of sorrow and blindness, I should never have seen him. When I went to the war, I was without God; I did not feel my need of a Saviour; I felt brave and strong, and though given to many wicked courses, I thought I was good enough, at least as good as other people. But thanks be to God, the eyes of my heart have been opened, and I have been led to see wondrous things out of God's law, and out of his gospel too. When given up to die in the hospital, the precious things of the good books given me when in health returned, like ministering angels, to comfort me in my hour of need, and point the way to heaven.

This is Charley Putnam's testimony. Let the good books be given to all the soldiers. The Bible, the tract, the single sentence, revealing Christ ready to save to the uttermost, will become friends in need. An abundant harvest of redeemed souls shall be the reward of those who engage in this good work.—Selected.

Good Use of a Sermon.

Mr. Nott, a missionary to one of the islands in the Ppacific Ocean, preached a sermon one day on the words, "Let him that stole steal no more." In the sermon he said it was a duty to return things that had formerly been stolen.

The next morning, when he opened his door, he saw a number of natives sitting on the ground around his house. He was surprised to see them there so early, and asked why they had come. "We have not been able to sleep all night," they said. "We were at chapel yesterday, and heard you say from the word of God that Jehovah commanded us not to steal; whereas we used to worship a god who we thought would protect thieves. We have stolen. All these things that we have brought with us are stolen goods." Then one of the men held up a saw, saying, "I stole this from the carpenter of such a ship." Others held up knives and various tools.

"Why have you brought them to me?" asked Mr. Nott. "Take them home, and wait till the ships from which you stole them come again, and then return them, with a present besides." Still the people begged Mr. Nott to keep the things until they could find the owners. One man who had stolen from a missionary then being on another island, took a voyage of seventy miles to restore the goods.

That is the true way to improve by preaching—doing what it says. A great many people form good resolutions when they hear a sermon which touches the heart and instructs the conscience, but good rosolutions are worth nothing unless they are set to action. That clinches the feelings, and makes them of value.

Obey Your Captain.

"What is my great duty?" asked an ingenuous youth when volunteering for the defence of his country's flag. "Obey your captain," said his anxious mother. This was the true answer. The first, second, and third duty of the soldier is obedience—prompt, unhesitating, universal obedience. However difficult the duty, how perilous soever the undertaking, the soldier must obey his captain when the command is given. Without obedience, courage, endurance, military knowledge, and skill are little worth; with it, the feeblest soldier may become a hero.

Soldier, you have a higher Captain. Do you obey Jesus, the Captain of your salvation? He requires prompt, unhesitating, universal obedience. "My son, give me thy heart," is his command to you. Have you yielded obedience? If not hitherto, brother, yield; and whatever shall befall you in this earthly campaign, he will bring you off more than a conqueror in the end. Soldier, obey your Captain.

It is not enough to believe what you maintain, you must maintain what you believe; and maintain it because you believe it.—Bishop Whately.

A Word to Correspondents.

When we were publishing the Bible Examiner one of our rules was the following:

"Each writer is required to state his own views on the topic he takes up, without a direct personal controversy with any other writer in our columns. This course does not restrict liberty of expression, but will save personal feelings."

This rule we found to be of great service in conducting that Magazine; and we were disposed to adopt it when we entered on our duties as Editor of the Herald of Life, but were over persuaded not to insist upon it. Our mind is unchanged on the subject, and we shall hereafter adhere to this rule. Brethren may differ, and express their own views without such direct personalities just as well as with; and what they say will be better received by our readers; for, when there is the appearance of an attempt to harass another who writes for the same paper, such articles become disagreeable to a portion of readers. State your own positions strong and clear as possible; but refrain from a direct attack on other correspondents. We believe the rule above is both wise and just; and we hope all our friends will see it in the same light. By it, we shall be saved from personal irritations, which the opposite course is liable to engender, and the truth will be more likely to be promoted. This rule does not interfere with any review of articles in other papers: it applies, as it is distinctly expressed, to "other writers in our columns."

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of Dodworth's Hall, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening; afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That Leonard C. Thorne act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "Life and Advent Union," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

The following named persons were elected officers for the ensuing year:

George Storrs, President.
George K. Carroll, Vice President.
Richard Martin, Treasurer.
Leonard C. Thorne, Corresponding Secretary.
William H. Thorne, Recording Secretary.

John Spiers,
George K. Carroll,
Charles A. Righter,
A. W. McDonald,
George Kemp,
} Committee on Finances.

William Roworth,
Joseph Cherry,
William H. Hanford,
James E. Sebring,
Philo Richardson,
} Committee on Sunday Meetings.

That the proceedings of the meeting be published in the Herald of Life.

That the meeting do now adjourn, which was carried.

Richard Martin,
Secretary Protem.

[Remarks by the Editor.—It will be seen, by the foregoing, that our friends in this vicinity are taking hold in earnest to sustain a prominent place in this city for the promulgation of the Life views. The expenses of this enterprise, of occupying Dodworth's Hall on Broadway, will be heavy, and we trust all in the city and vicinity, whose circumstances will permit, will take hold in earnest to help forward this meeting. Come up, brethren and friends, with a fixed and determined purpose to push on the truth triumphantly, under God's blessing. Remember "The liberal soul deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand," saith the Lord. This is not the only enterprise on the hands of our friends here. The Herald of Life is largely sustained by them; and soon, we trust, a Mission will be established to the "Freedmen," whose yoke of bondage is now being broken from off their neck. The field of usefulness expands before us continually. Who is desirous to aid in this glorious work? Let all remember, that treasures laid up on earth may soon take wings and fly away; but that which is expended to serve God, his cause, and promote his truth for the eternal life of dying men, can never be lost, because "laid up in heaven;" and our blessed Life-giver will not forget "the widow's mite," given from love to Him and to promote his kind designs to our dying race.

APPOINTMENTS.

J. T. Curry will preach in Philadelphia, Feb. 19th and 26th, at such place as shall be designated by David W. White.

S. W. Bishop will preach in,

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance Bible vs. Tradition, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the Herald of Life, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Note.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—Ed. of Her.

Diptheria.

I am happy to announce to the readers of the Herald of Life, that I am in the possession of a remedy that is a sure cure of Diptheria. I have used it for at least ten years in the treatment of this terrible disease, and have treated scores of cases (some of which had been given up by other Physicians) with entire success, not having lost a single case.

It cures the most malignant cases as certainly as the simplest forms of the disease. It is also purely Homeopathic.

Now I propose, for the sum of $1, to send to any who may desire it, a vial of this medicine, containing sufficient, at least, to cure half a dozen cases, with full directions for its use. The medicine can be sent by mail to any part of the country, and will keep any length of time without deteriorating in any latitude.

Address, Dr. A. Decker,
Newark, N. J.

P. S.—In all cases where the medicine fails to cure, the money will be refunded by notifying me of the fact. To the poor, who are not able to pay, free. A. D.

Note by the Editor.—Dr. Decker is a responsible Physician, and we do not believe he would practice imposition on any one. We have therefore given place to his advertisement.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with [illegible] egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Bible Examiner Tracts.

No. 1. Earth, not heaven, is to be the inheritance of the saints. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs.—Price 5 cents.

No. 4. The Soul Saved or Lost. A Sermon by Geo. Storrs.—Price 5 cents.

"Geo. Storrs,
Box 4658, New York."

Scriptures daguerrotype them to the life. We find, from Romans i., that the mark of a reprobate mind is not only to commit things worthy of death, but to "have pleasure in them that do them." This is just what these spirits do; and not only so, but they are utterly without any kind of compunction, and they deliberately speak and teach the greatest villanies, while at the same time they know, as well as can possibly be known, that what they say is the most barefaced lie. With them it is become a matter of cool and deliberate calculation how most successfully to ruin souls, and how to entice the greatest number. It is altogether an intellectual operation, with which circumstances and feelings have nothing whatever to do. Their consciences are seared with a hot iron. But, at the same time, they are too cunning to let their lies appear as such. Like their master when he is seen in heaven as the accuser of the saints, they are clothed in garments of light. They are masters of hypocrisy. They pretend to have the welfare of the human race at heart, as their great object. Hence they extol virtue, love wisdom, goodness, truth and justice, and pretend to base all their teachings on them. They laud the perfectibility of human nature to the skies; they say that man has long been held in bondage by the force of circumstances, and that all he needs is development, which by their aid he may obtain. They "promise him liberty," and repeat the old tactics which their master practiced in Eden. "Progress!" "Light!" is the cry. "Progression," "Reform," "Perfection," are the mottoes. They paint seraphic beauties, which inwardly are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness.

They deny every doctrine of the Bible; but at the same time, when it suits their purpose, these consummate masters of hypocrisy and lies, utterly dead to any compunction, just like their master, readily quote the Bible to fortify their teachings. They are ravening wolves in sheep's clothing. They look like lambs, but speak as dragons. Those who are skilled in heavenly truth detect their bad pronunciation, otherwise their craft is so consummate that the very elect might be deceived with the utterances they put forth from the secret chambers. Their publications afford a sample of their shameless lies in hypocrisy. Let all be warned.

The "spirits" are also adepts at another thing, mixing truth with falsehood, so as to render the lies undistinguishable, as poisonous drugs are sugar-coated to conceal their nauseous taste. Beware of these sugar-coated pills. Here and there, too, we find that their mouth-pieces handle certain abstruse subjects (such as sleep and death) with great ability, and perhaps present some psychological facts that have hitherto been overlooked or unknown. And all this makes the great latter-day snare more dangerous, by giving it more attractiveness and a scientific air.

But what does their boasted progress and light really amount to? Let some reclaimed votaries of the wicked system tell us.

Dr. Randolph, for eight years a medium and lecturer, and hence well acquainted with all its workings, in his renunciation of the system, makes the following confession: "A. J. Davis and his clique of Harmonialists say there are no evil spirits. I emphatically deny the statement. Five of my friends destroyed themselves, and I attempted it, by direct spirit influence. Every crime in the calendar has been committed by mortal movers of viewless beings. It has also broken up families, squandered fortunes, tempted and destroyed the weak. It has banished peace from families, separated husbands and wives, and shattered the intellects of thousands." "Look on this picture, and look on that." Dr. Hatch, another reformed "spiritualist," says: "The most damning iniquities are perpetrated in 'spiritual circles,' a very small percentage of which ever comes to public attention. I care not whether it be spiritual or mundane. The facts exist, and should demand the attention and condemnation of an intelligent community."

T. L. Harris, another prominent renouncer of "spiritualism," says: "Murder, adultery, suicide, and the most revolting blasphemies, may be traced directly to the communications and puttings forth of impure spirits, both in ancient and modern times. And so far as I am able to judge, the majority of such instances are traceable to the habit of attending seances. I earnestly call attention to this point. The man of iron nerves may say that he feels no change of state. He may laugh down the idea of peril. With him it is but a question of time. The vitriol that eats in a day through iron wire has but to continue the process to eat through the iron bar. 'It is slow, this poison, but sure.' If you do not wish to become yourselves demoniacs, shun the place and shun the occasion. To the pure, and to those who would remain pure, I can hint such reasons as, if uttered, would make every ear tingle."

Once more we say, let all men avoid "spiritualism," and its demon teachings and siren enticements, as they would the fire.

Our remarks under this head have had reference to the hypocritical teachings of "spiritualism," but it is also true that the demons, when consulted for advice, or an expression of opinion regarding the ordinary affairs and occurrences of life, very often (though not always) mislead the questioners, and occasionally make merry over their easy credulity. So, also, if, with a view to testing their character, they are asked questions respecting the Christian faith, they do not scruple to tell lies in hypocrisy.

We find the following, in a letter from a friend: "They are to speak lies in hypocricy. They do this to my knowledge. The word hypocrisy can apply to nothing else but a pretence of religion. To deceive the religious this they will make; but none of them will stand the test of St. John's institutes. 'Try the spirits,' he says; if they confess not that Jesus is come in the flesh, they are Antichrist. This does not allude to their confession, historically made, that there is such a man, for they will confess that; but that which the name Jesus signifies, the Saviour,—the Saviour in the only way, that of shedding his blood for the remission of sins. A friend of mine was about being deceived by them, because they said they believed in the Saviour. I told her to try them as St. John did,—to ask the medium plainly if she believed that Jesus died for the sins of the world. It was a celebrated medium, who professed to be very pious when with pious people. She would talk about bearing the cross, and of suffering for her belief—all to deceive. This friend, who wanted to converse with her deceased daughter through the medium, was assured that she (the medium) was a believer in Jesus. I had tried to induce my friend not to go; but she promised me that, if she did, she would try the medium's faith in the Saviour, according to the test of St. John. She went, and had a satisfactory conversation with her daughter, as she supposed—for she said her very tone of voice was exactly imitated; she was also reminded of actual occurrences that had transpired, &c. The deception was so complete, and she was so anxious to believe that she had really communed with her daughter, that she did not want to be undeceived. But she had promised to make the test, and she did. At first the medium answered (or rather the spirit speaking through her), Oh yes, she believed in Jesus; she thought he was a lovely character,—and admitted that we ought to live like him. But when she was asked whether she believed that he died for our sins, and that we have remission of sins through faith in his blood, she became angry, and said she believed no such thing. She was asked whether she didn't believe what the Bible says on that subject? She said, No. That there were some very good things in the Bible, but there were a great many mistakes; and they didn't take it for their guide,—they had higher instruction from the spirits. This is but one instance out of several that I have known, where the spirits confessed nearly all the truths of the Gospel; pretending to be very pious, until questioned on the subject of the vicarious sufferings of Christ; and that moment they denied the faith, and the whole framework of their deception was manifested. But this will serve as a sample of their telling lies in hypocrisy."

France and the Pope.

The usual New Year's reception was held by the emperor, and it is remarked that in the reply to the felicitations offered by the papal nuncio in the name of all the diplomatic corps, as well as in that to the archbishops of Paris, in the name of the church, that no allusion is made to the Pope—an unusual omission. There is no doubt that the emperor is much embarrassed by this frank exposition of the views of the Holy See. France is still so entirely Catholic that his Majesty will find it very difficult to reconcile all the inharmonious elements which have been infused into its Catholicism by the Revolution.

M. Thiers, who is a member of the Catholic church, not long ago declared his intention of attacking the convention of the 15th of September; that is, of speaking in favor of the temporal power of the Pope. Since the publication of the "encyclique" this distinguished statesman is said to have told a friend that it would now be impossible to take the part he intended in the debates, as the Pope himself had snatched away from him all the arguments he intended to make use of.—The Methodist.

The Liberal Press of Paris.

The outcry of the liberal press of Paris for more liberty for the coming year is almost terrible. M. Eugene Pelletan, in the Courier du Dimanche, (one of the ablest liberal journals of France) utters a sort of savage wail over the liberties outraged during the past year in France, and takes comfort only in the prospect which is opening on the other side of the Atlantic. He says: "We (the French) must cross the ocean to be reconciled with Providence. There, at least, right seems to be getting the upper hand, and yet how many times in this impious struggle, in which a Cain raises his hand against his mother, big with a new world, we have said to ourselves, victory, after all, is not a matter of choice; should it fall to the lot of the South, we should put on mourning for all humanity. For America is not only America—a place and a nation—it is more than this, and, above all, it is the model school of liberty. If, by some impossible chance, it should perish, with it a great experiment would fail. But, thank God, the North now holds the South in an iron grasp which is gradually tightening....Thus, consolation at a distance, sadness at home. This is the dying year—let it die, and never more be remembered.—The Methodist.

The Missionary's Protege.

A few years ago as a missionary to the Jews, employed by the New York City Mission Society, was passing along the street, his attention was attracted by the cry, so frequently heard, "glass put in." The utterer proved to be a boy of his own nation miserably clad and ill kept, but of fine open face and noble bearing. Accosting him he found that not even the Scribes and Pharisees of our Saviour's time were more bound up in their bigoted belief than this boy. He took him home and opening his heart by every possible kindness strove to teach him the truth. But it was long before he could make any impression. At length, however, he was rejoiced to have his protege make a profession of religion, and enter the church. A place in a store was secured for him, but the promise that the missionary had read in the eye and bearing of the lad was not a false one. He spent all his leisure in study, and at length left business to prepare himself for the ministry. He was ordained, and went to China as a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal church.

Recent advices from that dark empire say that he is the interpreter of the American embassy at the court of Pekin, a man of great influence with both Chinese and foreigners, and of great value to this country. With another missionary, he is also engaged in making a translation of the Bible into the higher colloquial or Mandarin language of China. This is the spoken language of the court, of all official persons, and of the better educated classes in China. These facts were stated at a recent meeting, by the missionary who years before roused the boy from his bigotry and darkness, and he naturally dwelt with pleasure upon the eminent position of his former pupil, and with thankfulness upon the useful and consecrated life he had been instrumental in evoking from wretched poverty and ignorance. The name of the missionary interpreter is Schereschewsky; and of the missionary to the Jews, who still pursues his labors among the people whom God has called his own, is GIDEON ROBERT LEDERER.

Light in Darkness,

OR THE WOUNDED SOLDIER OF GETTYSBURG.

Can this be Charley Putnam? This is the question old friends ask on seeing the wounded soldier. About two years ago he went to the war, full of health, hope, courage; in the first flush of manhood. "Oh, how proud he he stood before" his weeping and admiring mother "in his suit of blue" the morning he left.

Charley had passed through many battles uninjured, but that of Gettysburg proved too much for him. Poor fellow, he is stone blind, and his blindness is hopeless. He will never again see the face of a friend, or behold the light of the sun. He has also lost the sense of taste. His sympathizing friends need not send him delicacies to tempt his appetite, for one thing to him has as much relish as another. His sense of smell is also paralyzed. You need not give him that beautiful bouquet of flowers; it will be lost upon him. Preserve it for some wounded soldier who can enjoy it better. Poor Charley Putnam! Yet he says he was never so happy in his life as he is now. Let us ask him about it.

You say you are happy, Charley; but it seems to us that you are in a wretched condition. We feel for you. You have given your country your choicest and your best, and you can have no compensation for what you have lost. If our glorious old flag should float to-morrow through the length and breadth of the land, your eyes could not see it. You must find comfort only in the reflection that you have done your duty.

Do not pity me, says Charley. This is the year of jubilee to me. Oh, I am more than compensated for all my losses. I have found what I would not exchange for the whole world.

What is it?

I have found the pearl of great price; I have found my Saviour. If he had not led me through the dark valley of sorrow and blindness, I should never have seen him. When I went to the war, I was without God; I did not feel my need of a Saviour; I felt brave and strong, and though given to many wicked courses, I thought I was good enough, at least as good as other people. But thanks be to God, the eyes of my heart have been opened, and I have been led to see wondrous things out of God's law, and out of his gospel too. When given up to die in the hospital, the precious things of the good books given me when in health returned, like ministering angels, to comfort me in my hour of need, and point the way to heaven.

This is Charley Putnam's testimony. Let the good books be given to all the soldiers. The Bible, the tract, the single sentence, revealing Christ ready to save to the uttermost, will become friends in need. An abundant harvest of redeemed souls shall be the reward of those who engage in this good work.—Selected.

Good Use of a Sermon.

Mr. Nott, a missionary to one of the islands in the Ppacific Ocean, preached a sermon one day on the words, "Let him that stole steal no more." In the sermon he said it was a duty to return things that had formerly been stolen.

The next morning, when he opened his door, he saw a number of natives sitting on the ground around his house. He was surprised to see them there so early, and asked why they had come. "We have not been able to sleep all night," they said. "We were at chapel yesterday, and heard you say from the word of God that Jehovah commanded us not to steal; whereas we used to worship a god who we thought would protect thieves. We have stolen. All these things that we have brought with us are stolen goods." Then one of the men held up a saw, saying, "I stole this from the carpenter of such a ship." Others held up knives and various tools.

"Why have you brought them to me?" asked Mr. Nott. "Take them home, and wait till the ships from which you stole them come again, and then return them, with a present besides." Still the people begged Mr. Nott to keep the things until they could find the owners. One man who had stolen from a missionary then being on another island, took a voyage of seventy miles to restore the goods.

That is the true way to improve by preaching—doing what it says. A great many people form good resolutions when they hear a sermon which touches the heart and instructs the conscience, but good resolutions are worth nothing unless they are set to action. That clinches the feelings, and makes them of value.

Obey Your Captain.

"What is my great duty?" asked an ingenuous youth when volunteering for the defence of his country's flag. "Obey your captain," said his anxious mother. This was the true answer. The first, second, and third duty of the soldier is obedience—prompt, unhesitating, universal obedience. However difficult the duty, how perilous soever the undertaking, the soldier must obey his captain when the command is given. Without obedience, courage, endurance, military knowledge, and skill are little worth; with it, the feeblest soldier may become a hero.

Soldier, you have a higher Captain. Do you obey Jesus, the Captain of your salvation? He requires prompt, unhesitating, universal obedience. "My son, give me thy heart," is his command to you. Have you yielded obedience? If not hitherto, brother, yield; and whatever shall befall you in this earthly campaign, he will bring you off more than a conqueror in the end. Soldier, obey your Captain.

It is not enough to believe what you maintain, you must maintain what you believe; and maintain it because you believe it.—Bishop Whately.

A Word to Correspondents.

When we were publishing the Bible Examiner one of our rules was the following:

"Each writer is required to state his own views on the topic he takes up, without a direct personal controversy with any other writer in our columns. This course does not restrict liberty of expression, but will save personal feelings."

This rule we found to be of great service in conducting that Magazine; and we were disposed to adopt it when we entered on our duties as Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE, but were over persuaded not to insist upon it. Our mind is unchanged on the subject, and we shall hereafter adhere to this rule. Brethren may differ, and express their own views without such direct personalities just as well as with; and what they say will be better received by our readers; for, when there is the appearance of an attempt to harass another who writes for the same paper, such articles become disagreeable to a portion of readers. State your own positions strong and clear as possible; but refrain from a direct attack on other correspondents. We believe the rule above is both wise and just; and we hope all our friends will see it in the same light. By it, we shall be saved from personal irritations, which the opposite course is liable to engender, and the truth will be more likely to be promoted. This rule does not interfere with any review of articles in other papers: it applies, as it is distinctly expressed, to "other writers in our columns."

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening; afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That LEONARD C. THORNE act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

The following named persons were elected officers for the ensuing year:

GEORGE STORRS, President.
GEORGE K. CARROLL, Vice President.
RICHARD MARTIN, Treasurer.
LEONARD C. THORNE, Corresponding Secretary.
WILLIAM H. THORNE, Recording Secretary.

JOHN KEMP,
JOHN SPIERS,
GEORGE K. CARROLL,
CHARLES A. RIGHTER,
A. W. McDONALD,
GEORGE KEMP, } Committee on Finances.

WILLIAM ROWORTH,
JOSEPH CHERRY,
WILLIAM H. HANFORD,
JAMES E. SEBRING,
PHILO RICHARDSON, } Committee on Sunday Meetings.

That the proceedings of the meeting be published in the Herald of Life.

That the meeting do now adjourn, which was carried.

RICHARD MARTIN,
Secretary Protem.

[REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—It will be seen, by the foregoing, that our friends in this vicinity are taking hold in earnest to sustain a prominent place in this city for the promulgation of the Life views. The expenses of this enterprise, of occupying Dodworth's Hall on Broadway, will be heavy, and we trust all in the city and vicinity, whose circumstances will permit, will take hold in earnest to help forward this meeting. Come up, brethren and friends, with a fixed and determined purpose to push on the truth triumphantly, under God's blessing. Remember "'The liberal soul deviseth liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand," saith the LORD. This is not the only enterprise on the hands of our friends here. The Herald of Life is largely sustained by them; and soon, we trust, a Mission will be established to the "Freedmen," whose yoke of bondage is now being broken from off their neck. The field of usefulness expands before us continually. Who is desirous to aid in this glorious work? Let all remember, that treasures laid up on earth may soon take wings and fly away; but that which is expended to serve God, his cause, and promote his truth for the eternal life of dying men, can never be lost, because "laid up in heaven;" and our blessed LIFE-GIVER will not forget "the widow's mite," given from love to Him and to promote his kind designs to our dying race.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

Diptheria.

I am happy to announce to the readers of the Herald of Life, that I am in the possession of a remedy that is a sure cure of Diptheria. I have used it for at least ten years in the treatment of this terrible disease, and have treated scores of cases (some of which had been given up by other Physicians) with entire success, not having lost a single case.

It cures the most malignant cases as certainly as the simplest forms of the disease. It is also purely Homeopathic.

Now I propose, for the sum of $1, to send to any who may desire it, a vial of this medicine, containing sufficient, at least, to cure half a dozen cases, with full directions for its use. The medicine can be sent by mail to any part of the country, and will keep any length of time without deteriorating in any latitude.

Address, DR. A. DECKER,
Newark, N. J.

P. S.—In all cases where the medicine fails to cure, the money will be refunded by notifying me of the fact. To the poor, who are not able to pay, free. A. D.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Dr. Decker is a responsible Physician, and we do not believe he would practice imposition on any one. We have therefore given place to his advertisement.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with out egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

DARE TO BE RIGHT.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
You have a work which no other can do.
Do it so kindly, so bravely, so well
As to gladden all heaven and silence all hell.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Cowards and bigots dread every thing new.
If you can't stand at your post in a storm,
How can you fight in the ranks of reform.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Foes may be many and friends may be few:
Truth and her champions oft are disowned—
Stand by her banner although you're alone.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Other men's failures can never save you
Stand by your conscience, your honor, your faith;
Stand like a hero, and battle till death.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Keep the great Judgment Seat always in view;
Look at your work as you'll look at it then,
Scanned by Jehovah, and angels, and men.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Love may deny you its sunshine and dew;
Let the dew fail, for showers shall be given,—
Dew is from earth, but the showers are from heaven.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
God who created you cares for you too:
Bottles the tears that his striving ones shed,
Counts and protects every hair of your head.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Cannot Omnipotence carry you through?
City, and mansion, and throne all in sight,
Can you not dare to be true and be right?

MISSION OF THE KINGDOM.

The kingdom to be set up by the God of Heaven has a mission to break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and stand for ever. In the symbol they are reduced to the lightness of chaff, which the wind carries away, so that no place is found for them. Rev. xx. 11, have the same thing taught. "I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heavens fled away. And there was found no place for them."

Chapter xxi. 1, "I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea." In the first of these texts, we read no place was found for worldly powers; for the "stone becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth." "And the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." In the second, the same thought. "And there was no more sea." Not that there will be no more oceans. Where would the rivers flow, if there were no oceans? but no more seas such as the beasts of Daniel and John came up out of.

I think the true theory of this whole matter is something like this:

First: There is a prescribed time fixed for Gentile rule, in what is called "the kingdom of men." That time is said to be 2300 years; which number must be understood in the whole of its meaning and use, when the time of the end comes. Not that the wise should be subjected to a guessing process for twenty years or more.

Second: When this number ends, the trial of all earthly powers, civil and ecclesiastical, comes off, involving time. "When the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, then shall all nations be gathered before him." See Rev. vi. 12–17. The 17th reads, For the great day of his wrath is come. Rev. xvi. 14, 20, 21. Compare with the parables of the wheat and the tares, and the net and fishes, Matt. xiii. 24, and v. 47.

This is called, perhaps, "The dispensation of the fulness of times;" prophetic times; (why not?) See Eph. i. 8–11. This is also what Paul calls his times: "Which in his times, he shall show who is the blessed, and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords." See, also, in this connection, the account of the war between the Lamb and the beast and false prophet, &c., Rev. xix. 19: also, chap. xvii. 14.

In these times, all rule, and all authority and power are put down, and dissolved. Not a thing of power, or thing of validity left. Power and institutions are in chaos. All forms are put in pie. As our Apostle expresses it: "This shaking signifies the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which can not be shaken may remain." Heb. xii. 27. This is preparatory to the establishment of the kingdom. "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which can not be moved, let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and Godly fear, for our God is a consuming fire."

Third: All things dissolved—there is a new formation, a new construction. Hear our Lord from his throne. "Behold I make all things new." The new Jerusalem is that new thing. In this interim matters come off supposed to belong to what is called, the future age. Here is the place for Jacob to achieve certain triumphs, and serve as the Lord's battle-axe. Here the remnant are like a torch in a sheaf among the Gentiles, and like a lion among them, &c.

If the above be the true state of the case, then the 2300 days do not bring the advent. What shall we do? "Look up, lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh"—"Know that the kingdom is at the door."

The number 1335, say some, will surely reveal the Son of man. Quite willing they should: will be most happy to have it so; but do not really see it. It is a blessing to come to this period—to its beginning, through its period, or to the end of it. It is a blessing. In what respect? What do you think? Of doubt—a time "neither clear nor dark: a mist morning and evening—night and day—lights and shadows; alternate hopes and fears; dying, suffering, and sickness; fearfulness and fainting? Do they bring you to the time of mutation, such as you have had already a large experience? I hope not

"Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh, to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." Blessed in what? To what extent? Blessed! God gives you a blank with his signature at the bottom. It is for you to be bold and confiding; fill it up to your heart's content. Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it, saith the Lord.

But it is insisted that the Advent will be sudden, even abrupt, the very instant that the times of the Gentiles are out; as soon as the term of service of our Saviour expires, at the right hand of God, he makes his appearance on earth! Alas, for us, if this were true. Who are prepared for such an event? The Adventist of course! They are in a most amiable situation for that blessed time. All standing ready for the first occasion for division! Questions evolved by inevitable logic sunder us as quick as a thunder bolt. The forces prevailing are repulsive. The sudden advent would find us in an awkward plight. We would find it difficult to adjust ourselves to the requisite condition, namely, of affinity and attraction, till we all come into the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

God knows how to graduate the advent of his dear Son; and we ought to know how to understand the programme, and believe, and perform our part in the series. Then we will pass from grace to grace, and glory to glory. As it is written, "We all, as with open face, behold as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." 2 Cor. iii. 18. B. M.

HAS THE PROMISE BEEN FULFILLED?

BY JACOB GRIM.

If others cannot see two promises referred to in the article of Herald No. 9, I cannot help it, but it does refer to them both, and couples them together as one. We said, the first is contained in Gen. xii. 1–3, and promises to make of Abraham a great nation; and David, in his confession before God, declares the fact, and I believe him. The second promise refers to Abraham and his seed; and relates to the land; and Paul, who was a good logician, says, this seed did not refer to the many, but to one seed; and that one seed was Christ; and I believe Paul. We have not said in our article the land belonged to the nation, and was fulfilled in it. We only said, that God had fulfilled his one promise to Abraham and made of him a great nation; and that fact would be true if there was never another Jew on the earth; and we then distinctly said, that God made another promise to Abraham, and gave him and his seed, Christ, the land, and described the boundaries; and our argument has been all the way through the "Title to the Land." If others cannot see two promises in God's words to Abraham, I cannot help it. Our object has been the Inheritor of the land, and we have never said the promise of, or concerning the land has been fulfilled.

Some speak of conditional prophecies as being an absurdity. We have been speaking of conditional promises; and the fact was admitted. It is said, "The God who has predicted the restoration of Israel in the flesh, has also predicted that the conditions will be complied with." Do such believe predictions are prophecies? If so, then they say the conditions will be complied with.

It is a great mistake to suppose that our position is based on promises made under the law, Deut. xxix. 1. The first words in the chapter begin with the covenant with the children of Israel.

It is maintained by some, that "those who inherit the land AS SUBJECTS will be in Christ; but they are none the less Abraham's natural seed." Where is it taught that any one in Christ will be a subject? Paul says, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and HEIRS according to the promise." In Christ, and a subject, and not an heir! I am very glad those who hold such a view are so particular in calling our attention to what they have stated elsewhere.

It is said, that "a kingly dynasty has been established to get clear of the difficulties of the age to come doctrine. We must say, that this is a very cool thrust at the rights of David and his house." Not at all; but in the language of him who spake as never man spake, he said unto the Jews, that after the husbandman had sent his servants to receive of the fruits due him, and they beat and ill treated them, and then, last of all, He sent his Son, the heir, they said, Come let us kill him (the heir) and seize on HIS inheritance, (thereby acknowledging that the inheritance belonged to him, Christ); and Jesus said, Therefore I say unto you, The kingdom of God SHALL be taken from you, and given to a NATION bringing forth the fruit thereof.

Now, in order to get away from the force of the Lord's remarks, all that I have read on the future age, or Israel in the flesh kingdom, say, this is a nation of priests or rulers; but Jesus says, they shall have the inheritance, and they will bring forth the fruits thereof. This is no thrust at David and his house. Paul says in Heb. iii., Moses was faithful over his house as a servant; [that was the house of the Jews] but Christ as a Son over his own house, whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end. Think you it is no thrust to say, that those in Christ, and of his house, are subjects in the land?

"He thinks it is better to annihilate them." We only indorse the language of themselves. "They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men. And Jesus said, did ye never read in scripture, the stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner....but on whomsoever it [this stone] shall fall it will grind him to powder ....and they perceived that he spake of them." Isaiah, Amos, and other prophets speak of the sinners being destroyed. We have nothing to say: we only quote what we understand the prophets and our Lord to say.

It is said, "Some are afraid that ungodly persons will posses the inheritance. Never fear, the same word....says, the people will be all righteous." Can a man be righteous without being in Christ? Can he be in Christ without being a new creature? and can he be a new creature without being like Christ and the rest of his brethren?

"'For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ, shall all be made alive.' We were particular in saying, that those who inherit the land AS subjects will be in Christ." Well then, Paul says they shall be made alive, and we believe him; "But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming: then cometh the end, [when?] when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God....when he shall put down all rule, and all authority and power, for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet; the last enemy shall be destroyed, DEATH." Now, this does not mean conversion; for Jesus does not put his people, when converted, under his feet. "Now this I say brethren, that flesh and blood (the natural man) cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." What does Paul refer to as incorruption? "We shall not all sleep, but we shall ALL be changed. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, THEN shall have been brought to pass the saying that is written, death is is swallowed up in victory." The last enemy, death, is destroyed; and Paul says, this is the end.

SELFISHNESS.

Selfishness is the very essence of human depravity. It has existed in all ages of the world, and has been the chief cause of all sin. It first showed itself on the earth in the garden of Eden, and was the cause of our first parent's being ejected from that beautiful place; because they indulged in self-gratification, rather than obedience to their maker; therefore God drove them out. It was the ruling spirit in Pharaoh, and resulted in his untimely death in the Red sea. And so down through to the present time, you will find, upon examination, that selfishness has been the moving element in all the list of crimes that have been committed, and has always been severely punished by God. This is the one, and only cause of the present bloody war in our land. What but selfishness ever held four millions of human beings in bondage? And what causes the war to drag on year after year, filling the land with mourning from butchered fathers, sons, and brothers? Is it love to God? Is it in accordance with the life, and spirit of Christ? No, the demon selfishness is the cause of all.

This principle is the opposite of christian principle, and must be entirely crucified before one can hope for a home in Christ's kingdom. It must all be cast out before one can love his neighbor as himself.

Paul marks it as being a striking feature of the last days, "For men shall be lovers of their own selves....having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." Now look around you, and see how many there are even among those having a form of godliness, that are not actuated by selfish motives in all business transactions. We would suppose that this principle would not be found to any great extent among those looking for the speedy coming of that being who gave his life a ransom for us; yet even among them we find it. Christ says, "Lay not up treasures on earth." Selfishness says, Lay up all you can on earth. The Spirit of Christ says, Sell that ye have and give alms. The spirit of self says, Sell nothing unless you get a good profit.

Dear reader, you profess to believe the word of God, and that soon his Son is coming from heaven to receive his prepared Bride, the waiting Church. Now God is making a dividing line, so that all can see who is for God, and who for Mammon. Selfishness will be the standard on one side, and love for the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus on the other. God commands you, as he did Lot, to flee from coming judgments. Will you do it? or are you wedded to your houses and lands in such a manner, and has the god of the world blinded your minds, so that you can not see the truth in this matter? Examine yourselves and see if every trace of selfishness is rooted from your hearts, and your wills wholly swallowed up in God's will.

I would not be understood as teaching a following after a "lo here, or lo there," for Jesus says, Go not after them. But I mean our affections should be brought under and kept in subjection to the will of God, and placed on things eternal. The wheat and tares must grow together till the harvest, when the angels (not man) will do the gathering. Then if we are found devoid of selfishnes, looking for Jesus, an abundant entrance will be administered to us unto God's kingdom.

HOLINESS.

This most blessed theme ought to be uppermost in the minds of all true Christians, and exhibited in every act of their lives. Especially those who profess to love the appearing of Jesus, and to believe it is near even at the door, ought to be practically affected by this heaven-inspiring reality. We are expressly commanded to be holy by the Almighty; "Be ye holy, for I am holy." I understand holiness to be harmony with the mind and will of God in our faith and practice; and an entire consecration to God of our lives and all we possess. This I firmly believe is the position we should occupy; and, blessed be God, I believe it is attainable; indeed, how can we be saved without it? for the apostle exhorts us to follow holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. O that there might be a waking up on this subject among God's dear saints; for, bear in mind, Paul says, "Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."

What a spotless character is here brought to view! I bless God that his grace is all-sufficient to perfect this blessed work in our lives and character if we will only yield our members servants to righteousness unto holiness. Surely we ought not to possess any thing that we are unwilling to sacrifice in obedience to the Lord who has accomplished so great a work for us, and is yet to perform such glorious things for us in the world to come! O that we might at once yield ourselves servants to obey the Lord in every respect, from henceforth till the warfare is ended; and not lower the standard of christianity by a life of sinfulness, but let us raise the standard on high by attaining the position spoken of by Paul in his epistle to the Romans. "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness;" and it will most surely end in eternal life.

Time is short; the Lord is at hand; wicked men and seducers are waxing worse and worse; scoffers are mocking; sinners are cursing; evil servants are smiting; and satan is working with great power to deceive if possible the very elect; but, thanks be to God he is our hiding place from the present evil, and our refuge from the coming storm. O that the "Lord would make us to increase and abound in love one toward another, to the end he may establish our hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints," is the prayer of your unworthy brother,

A JOYFUL DISCOVERY.

A poor old woman who has read her Bible and loved it for forty years, came the other day, looking for some help to bring her to see her only child—a married man—before she should die. We gave her some assistance and instruction. She then asked us if we knew that the Lord Jesus Christ was to come to this earth again?

We said, "To be sure; that is the joy of his waiting Church."

"Did you ever hear," she said, "that if we are alive when he comes, we'll be lifted up without dying, to meet him in the air?"

We said "Yes."

"Well, dear, that's the joyfullest thing I ever heard—the pleasantest news I ever read, except salvations, joyful sound," said the old creature.

"Long as I'm reading the word of God, I never read that sweet news before; and sure the world does not know it."

We said, "No, nor does the world care about it."

"Well, dear, I just want to see if my son and grandchildren is livin', and be ready to meet the Lord when he comes again, for he may come any minute; and oh! it would be a great mistake to have the notice of his coming before our eyes all our lives, and yet be taken unawares."

Reader, do you believe that Christ is coming? And if you believe it, are you ready to meet him.—Selected.

FORTUNES OF WAR.

A friend contributes to the American Agriculturist the following incident, which recently occurred in Brooklyn, New York. Several military gentlemen who had served during the present war, happened to meet, and were recounting their experiences. One of them was formerly a Union citizen of Texas, but he had been forced into the rebel army, made prisoner, and afterward released on taking the oath of allegiance. He was asked, "Where were you captured?"

"At the battle of Spottsylvania, near the Court House," was the reply.

"I was there," remarked the Colonel; "and I, also," said a captain; "and I, too," said a third, a lieutenant.

The Texas gentleman continued: "During the battle General Lee rode near us and asked, 'What regiment is that?' and was told, 'The —th Mississippi.' 'Just the one I want,' exclaimed Lee, and gave orders for them to retake an earthwork from which your Union forces had driven us and posted artillery. We started across an open field through a storm of death, arrived in a hollow in front of the work, where we were sheltered from its fire, and formed ranks. There were only 267 men remaining. We carried the earthwork, but it availed little, for soon from your infantry, which must have been arrayed in four lines of battle, came a perfect sheet of minie balls across the top of the parapet, cutting down every man who showed his head above it. A ball struck the bow of my spectacles, grazing my temple, carrying away a lock of hair, as you see (showing a small scar). A tree twenty two inches in diameter, near which I stood, was literally chipped in two by a storm of balls, and fell, killing two men. Out of that 267 men, only two beside myself escaped unharmed."

"I can corroborate your story," remarked the Colonel. "I was in command of the infantry who made that attack. We were in four lines, and after the action I measured the tree you mentioned."

"When you were taken, did you not wear a haversack bearing a masonic emblem?" asked the Lieutenant.

"Yes," was the reply.

"And I am the man who made you a prisoner," said the former speaker. "Your countenance seemed familiar, but I could not at once recall where we had met before."

Strange as is this account, it may be fully relied on in all its details: and it forms a most striking illustration of the curious chances of war.

Children's Department.

A YOUNG GIDEON.

A boy belonging to one of the schools established by the missionaries in the South Seas, had heard so much of the sin and folly of idolatry, that his confidence in idols was shaken, and he longed to know for a certainty whether the images he had been accustomed to worship were really possessed of power or not. One day his father and mother went out, and left him at home alone. He had spent some time in reading his tasks, and thinking over what he had been taught at the school the day before. At last the idea came into his mind that it would be a good thing to burn the idols. He was, however, afraid, partly on account of his parents, and partly from the dread he had of offending the gods, and bringing down upon him swift destruction. In this difficulty he knelt down, and entreated the God of the Christians to take care of him, and help him. He then rose, and, taking up one of the smallest idols, he put it on the fire; the flames kindled about it and in a short time not a vestige of it remained. The terrified child looked on with astonishment; but no sooner was the first consumed than he threw on another, and another, and another, till, like Gideon of old, he had thoroughly cleansed his father's house. When, however, the flames had subsided, and all was over, the boy became alarmed at his own temerity. He had no more fear of the gods of wood and of stone, but he trembled at the thought of what his father might say, and he was half inclined to repent of his rashness.

In this extremity he shut up the dwelling, and went into the woods; and there, in the best way he could, he devoted himself to God, promising that if God would befriend him and be his God, he would serve him all the days of his life. While he was there, his father and mother returned, and missing at once the idols and the boy, they feared some spirit had come and taken them away together. As soon as they could recover themselves a little, they went to the missionary and asked him if he knew any thing about their son. He said he did not; but suspecting what had been done, he offered to accompany them and find him out. After going in various directions, they bent their steps to the wood, and there, at some distance, under the shadow of a large tree, they saw the lad kneeling before God. The parents were so thankful to see him again, and to find that not a hair of his head was hurt, that they forgot their rebukes, were persuaded to renounce their heathenish customs, and henceforth gave themselves up to the study of the Holy Scriptures. The boy, encouraged by the Divine goodness, was confirmed in his resolution to be the Lord's, and afterwards became a zealous teacher in the schools, and a preacher of the Gospel among his brethren.

WE MUST ALL MIND SOMEBODY.

Annie and Nettie, Mrs. Gray's twin children, lay snugly tucked in their little bed, where their mother had just left them. They had said their evening prayers at her knee in the sweet summer twilight, and she had been speaking with them about the past day's conduct. They kept talking after she had left them.

Annie was the larger and stronger of the two, and took the lead in every thing. "Dear me, Nettie, said she, "don't you wish it was mamma's duty to mind us, instead of our's to mind her? I would let her go visiting every day, and she should wear her best dresses all the time."

"Then what could we have her wear Sundays?" asked Nettie.

"Oh!" said Annie. "Well, then, perhaps she better not. But now, Nettie! it isn't a bit pleasant to mind, is it? Every body is always saying, 'Annie, don't do this; Annie, don't do that.' The more I want to, the more I can't. How nice it would be to have papa and mamma ask if they might go to spend the day at grandma's instead of our having to ask them. I'd always let 'em go!"

"But then you know, Annie," replied Nettie, "they would not ask to go if it wasen't best. They would always know. Don't you remember how you cried because you couldn't go to Lottie Frost's that afternoon when there was such an awful storm? Mamma thought it was coming, and it did, and how scared we were. I we had gone, we should have been all wet through, and perhaps the thunder would have struck us on the road."

"Don't let us talk any more," said Annie; "I'm going to sleep."

"Wait a minute, Annie," said their mother, who had been sitting in the next chamber, and had overheard them. "Let me sit by you a little longer and talk about this tiresome minding. Do you suppose, dear, that you children are the only ones that have to mind? Why, we must all mind some one."

"Now, mamma!" began Annie. "Why, mamma! you know you can do just any thing you want to. You could buy all the candy in Mr. Brown's store, and you could go to ride all the time. I wish I was grown up."

"But if you were grown up," said Mrs. Gray, "you would have to obey your conscience, and that is harder than obeying me. You would have to think, and think. You would have to say, 'Is this right? Is it best? Will it wrong others?' You could easily decide then about buying candy, but there would be much harder questions to settle. You would have more difficult 'minding' to do, and I want you to get a good habit of it now, so as to make it easier then."

"But who shall I have to mind, mamma? Who do you?"

"It is our heavenly Father, Annie. He speaks to me in the Bible, and in my conscience, and when I obey him I am happy. But if I don't mind directly, every thing goes wrong, and I am miserable. We are all God's children, and he is training us here to live with him in his kingdom. And as we are ignorant, and do not know what is best for us, he wants us to obey what he tells us."—Congregationalist.

"I'M GOOD FOR SOMETHING."

A young man, whose bluntness was such that every effort to turn him to account in a dry-goods store was found to be unavailing, received the customary notice from his employer that he did not suit and must go.

"But I'm good for some thing," remonstrated the poor fellow, loth to be turned into the street.

"You are good for nothing as a salesman anyhow," retorted the principal, regarding him from a business point of view.

"I am sure I can be useful," repeated the young man.

"How? Tell me how."

"I don't know, sir; I don't know."

"Nor do I," and the principal laughed as he saw the eagerness the lad displayed.

"Only don't put me away, sir; don't put me away. Try me at some thing else besides selling; I can not sell. I know that I can not sell."

"I know that too; that is what there is wrong."

"But I can make myself useful somehow, I know I can."

The blunt boy who could not be turned into a salesman, and whose manner was so little captivating that he was nearly sent about his business, was accordingly tried at some thing else. He was placed in the counting-house, where his aptitude for figures soon showed itself, and in a few years he became not only the chief cashier in the concern, but eminent as an accountant throughout the country.

Boys, be sure and be "good for some thing."

FREDDY'S PRAYER.

A bright eyed boy of four years was saying his prayers the other night to his mother, and with his hands folded and eyes closed he said:

"Now I lay me down to sleep
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take
God bless papa, mamma, and—"

He stopped all at once, opened his eyes and exclaimed:

"Mother, mother, what shall I say if I have been a bad boy?"

"You should not stop to ask questions, my son, while you are saying your prayers," replied his mother.

"But, mother, I have been bad; what shall I say?"

"Ask God to forgive you; but you should say your prayers all through, when you begin, without stopping."

His question answered, he reverently folded his hands and closing his eyes, continued:

"And will God forgive me for killing a hop-toad with a big stick, and throwing it down a big hole? Amen."

Children of larger growth will do well to copy.

Poetry.

DARE TO BE RIGHT.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
You have a work which no other can do.
Do it so kindly, so bravely, so well
As to gladden all heaven and silence all hell.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Cowards and bigots dread every thing new.
If you can't stand at your post in a storm,
How can you fight in the ranks of reform.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Foes may be many and friends may be few:
Truth and her champions oft are disowned—
Stand by her banner although you're alone.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Other men's failures can never save you
Stand by your conscience, your honor, your faith;
Stand like a hero, and battle till death.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Keep the great Judgment Seat always in view;
Look at your work as you'll look at it then,
Scanned by Jehovah, and angels, and men.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Love may deny you its sunshine and dew;
Let the dew fail, for showers shall be given,—
Dew is from earth, but the showers are from heaven.

Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
God who created you cares for you too:
Bottles the tears that his striving ones shed,
Counts and protects every hair of your head.
Dare to be right! Dare to be true!
Cannot Omnipotence carry you through?
City, and mansion, and throne all in sight,
Can you not dare to be true and be right?

MISSION OF THE KINGDOM.

The kingdom to be set up by the God of Heaven has a mission to break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and stand for ever. In the symbol they are reduced to the lightness of chaff, which the wind carries away, so that no place is found for them. Rev. xx. 11, have the same thing taught. "I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heavens fled away. And there was found no place for them."

Chapter xxi. 1, "I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea." In the first of these texts, we read no place was found for worldly powers; for the "stone becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth." "And the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." In the second, the same thought. "And there was no more sea." Not that there will be no more oceans. Where would the rivers flow, if there were no oceans? but no more seas such as the beasts of Daniel and John came up out of.

I think the true theory of this whole matter is something like this:

First: There is a prescribed time fixed for Gentile rule, in what is called "the kingdom of men." That time is said to be 2300 years; which number must be understood in the whole of its meaning and use, when the time of the end comes. Not that the wise should be subjected to a guessing process for twenty years or more.

Second: When this number ends, the trial of all earthly powers, civil and ecclesiastical, comes off, involving time. "When the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, then shall all nations be gathered before him." See Rev. vi. 12–17. The 17th reads, For the great day of his wrath is come. Rev. xvi. 14, 20, 21. Compare with the parables of the wheat and the tares, and the net and fishes, Matt. xiii. 24, and v. 47.

This is called, perhaps, "The dispensation of the fulness of times;" prophetic times; (why not?) See Eph. i. 8–11. This is also what Paul calls his times: "Which in his times, he shall show who is the blessed, and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords." See, also, in this connection, the account of the war between the Lamb and the beast and false prophet, &c., Rev. xix. 19: also, chap. xvii. 14.

In these times, all rule, and all authority and power are put down, and dissolved. Not a thing of power, or thing of validity left. Power and institutions are in chaos. All forms are put in pie. As our Apostle expresses it: "This shaking signifies the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which can not be shaken may remain." Heb. xii. 27. This is preparatory to the establishment of the kingdom. "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which can not be moved, let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and Godly fear, for our God is a consuming fire."

Third: All things dissolved—there is a new formation, a new construction. Hear our Lord from his throne. "Behold I make all things new." The new Jerusalem is that new thing. In this interim matters come off supposed to belong to what is called, the future age. Here is the place for Jacob to achieve certain triumphs, and serve as the Lord's battle-axe. Here the remnant are like a torch in a sheaf among the Gentiles, and like a lion among them, &c.

If, the above be the true state of the case, then the 2300 days do not bring the advent. What shall we do? "Look up, lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh"—"Know that the kingdom is at the door."

The number 1335, say some, will surely reveal the Son of man. Quite willing they should: will be most happy to have it so; but do not really see it. It is a blessing to come to this period—to its beginning, through its period, or to the end of it. It is a blessing. In what respect? What do you think? Of doubt—a time "neither clear nor dark: a mist morning and evening—night and day—lights and shadows; alternate hopes and fears; dying, suffering, and sickness; fearfulness and fainting? Do they bring you to the time of mutation, such as you have had already a large experience? I hope not

"Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh, to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." Blessed in what? To what extent? Blessed! God gives you a blank with his signature at the bottom. It is for you to be bold and confiding; fill it up to your heart's content. Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it, saith the Lord.

But it is insisted that the Advent will be sudden, even abrupt, the very instant that the times of the Gentiles are out; as soon as the term of service of our Saviour expires, at the right hand of God, he makes his appearance on earth! Alas, for us, if this were true. Who are prepared for such an event? The Adventist of course! They are in a most amiable situation for that blessed time. All standing ready for the first occasion for division! Questions evolved by inevitable logic sunder us as quick as a thunder bolt. The forces prevailing are repulsive. The sudden advent would find us in an awkward plight. We would find it difficult to adjust ourselves to the requisite condition, namely, of affinity and attraction, till we all come into the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

God knows how to graduate the advent of his dear Son; and we ought to know how to understand the programme, and believe, and perform our part in the series. Then we will pass from grace to grace, and glory to glory. As it is written, "We all, as with open face, behold as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." 2 Cor. iii. 18. B. HAS THE PROMISE BEEN FULFILLED?

BY JACOB GRIM.

If others cannot see two promises referred to in the article of Herald No. 9, I cannot help it, but it does refer to them both, and couples them together as one. We said, the first is contained in Gen. xii. 1–3, and promises to make of Abraham a great nation; and David, in his confession before God, declares the fact, and I believe him. The second promise refers to Abraham and his seed; and relates to the land; and Paul, who was a good logician, says, this seed did not refer to the many, but to one seed; and that one seed was Christ; and I believe Paul. We have not said in our article the land belonged to the nation, and was fulfilled in it. We only said, that God had fulfilled his one promise to Abraham and made of him a great nation; and that fact would be true if there was never another Jew on the earth; and we then distinctly said, that God made another promise to Abraham, and gave him and his seed, Christ, the land, and described the boundaries; and our argument has been all the way through the "Title to the Land." If others cannot see two promises in God's words to Abraham, I cannot help it. Our object has been the Inheritor of the land, and we have never said the promise of, or concerning the land has been fulfilled.

Some speak of conditional prophecies as being an absurdity. We have been speaking of conditional promises; and the fact was admitted. It is said, "The God who has predicted the restoration of Israel in the flesh, has also predicted that the conditions will be complied with." Do such believe predictions are prophecies? If so, then they say the conditions will be complied with.

It is a great mistake to suppose that our position is based on promises made under the law, Deut. xxix. 1. The first words in the chapter begin with the covenant with the children of Israel.

It is maintained by some, that "those who inherit the land AS SUBJECTS will be in Christ; but they are none the less Abraham's natural seed." Where is it taught that any one in Christ will be a subject? Paul says, "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and HEIRS according to the promise." In Christ, and a subject, and not an heir! I am very glad those who hold such a view are so particular in calling our attention to what they have stated elsewhere.

It is said, that "a kingly dynasty has been established to get clear of the difficulties of the age to come doctrine. We must say, that this is a very cool thrust at the rights of David and his house." Not at all; but in the language of him who spake as never man spake, he said unto the Jews, that after the husbandman had sent his servants to receive of the fruits due him, and they beat and ill treated them, and then, last of all, He sent his Son, the heir, they said, Come let us kill him (the heir) and seize on HIS inheritance, (thereby acknowledging that the inheritance belonged to him, Christ); and Jesus said, Therefore I say unto you, The kingdom of God SHALL be taken from you, and given to a NATION bringing forth the fruit thereof.

Now, in order to get away from the force of the Lord's remarks, all that I have read on the future age, or Israel in the flesh kingdom, say, this is a nation of priests or rulers; but Jesus says, they shall have the inheritance, and they will bring forth the fruits thereof. This is no thrust at David and his house. Paul says in Heb. iii., Moses was faithful over his house as a servant; [that was the house of the Jews] but Christ as a Son over his own house, whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end. Think you it is no thrust to say, that those in Christ, and of his house, are subjects in the land?

"He thinks it is better to annihilate them." We only indorse the language of themselves. "They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those wicked men. And Jesus said, did ye never read in scripture, the stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner....but on whomsoever it [this stone] shall fall it will grind him to powder ....and they perceived that he spake of them." Isaiah, Amos, and other prophets speak of the sinners being destroyed. We have nothing to say: we only quote what we understand the prophets and our Lord to say.

It is said, "Some are afraid that ungodly persons will posses the inheritance. Never fear, the same word....says, the people will be all righteous." Can a man be righteous without being in Christ? Can he be in Christ without being a new creature? and can he be a new creature without being like Christ and the rest of his brethren?

"'For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ, shall all be made alive.' We were particular in saying, that those who inherit the land AS subjects will be in Christ." Well then, Paul says they shall be made alive, and we believe him; "But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming: then cometh the end, [when?] when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God....when he shall put down all rule, and all authority and power, for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet; the last enemy shall be destroyed, DEATH." Now, this does not mean conversion; for Jesus does not put his people, when converted, under his feet. "Now this I say brethren, that flesh and blood (the natural man) cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." What does Paul refer to as incorruption? "We shall not all sleep, but we shall ALL be changed. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, THEN shall have been brought to pass the saying that is written, death is is swallowed up in victory." The last enemy, death, is destroyed; and Paul says, this is the end.

SELFISHNESS.

Selfishness is the very essence of human depravity. It has existed in all ages of the world, and has been the chief cause of all sin. It first showed itself on the earth in the garden of Eden, and was the cause of our first parent's being ejected from that beautiful place; because they indulged in self-gratification, rather than obedience to their maker; therefore God drove them out. It was the ruling spirit in Pharaoh, and resulted in his untimely death in the Red sea. And so down through to the present time, you will find, upon examination, that selfishness has been the moving element in all the list of crimes that have been committed, and has always been severely punished by God. This is the one, and only cause of the present bloody war in our land. What but selfishness ever held four millions of human beings in bondage? And what causes the war to drag on year after year, filling the land with mourning from butchered fathers, sons, and brothers? Is it love to God? Is it in accordance with the life, and spirit of Christ? No, the demon selfishness is the cause of all.

This principle is the opposite of christian principle, and must be entirely crucified before one can hope for a home in Christ's kingdom. It must all be cast out before one can love his neighbor as himself.

Paul marks it as being a striking feature of the last days, "For men shall be lovers of their own selves....having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." Now look around you, and see how many there are even among those having a form of godliness, that are not actuated by selfish motives in all business transactions. We would suppose that this principle would not be found to any great extent among those looking for the speedy coming of that being who gave his life a ransom for us; yet even among them we find it. Christ says, "Lay not up treasures on earth." Selfishness says, Lay up all you can on earth. The Spirit of Christ says, Sell that ye have and give alms. The spirit of self says, Sell nothing unless you get a good profit.

Dear reader, you profess to believe the word of God, and that soon his Son is coming from heaven to receive his prepared Bride, the waiting Church. Now God is making a dividing line, so that all can see who is for God, and who for Mammon. Selfishness will be the standard on one side, and love for the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus on the other. God commands you, as he did Lot, to flee from coming judgments. Will you do it? or are you wedded to your houses and lands in such a manner, and has the god of the world blinded your minds, so that you can not see the truth in this matter? Examine yourselves and see if every trace of selfishness is rooted from your hearts, and your wills wholly swallowed up in God's will.

I would not be understood as teaching a following after a "lo here, or lo there," for Jesus says, Go not after them. But I mean our affections should be brought under and kept in subjection to the will of God, and placed on things eternal. The wheat and tares must grow together till the harvest, when the angels (not man) will do the gathering. Then if we are found devoid of selfishnes, looking for Jesus, an abundant entrance will be administered to us unto God's kingdom.

HOLINESS.

This most blessed theme ought to be uppermost in the minds of all true Christians, and exhibited in every act of their lives. Especially those who profess to love the appearing of Jesus, and to believe it is near even at the door, ought to be practically affected by this heaven-inspiring reality. We are expressly commanded to be holy by the Almighty; "Be ye holy, for I am holy." I understand holiness to be harmony with the mind and will of God in our faith and practice; and an entire consecration to God of our lives and all we possess. This I firmly believe is the position we should occupy; and, blessed be God, I believe it is attainable; indeed, how can we be saved without it? for the apostle exhorts us to follow holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. O that there might be a waking up on this subject among God's dear saints; for, bear in mind, Paul says, "Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."

What a spotless character is here brought to view! I bless God that his grace is all-sufficient to perfect this blessed work in our lives and character if we will only yield our members servants to righteousness unto holiness. Surely we ought not to possess any thing that we are unwilling to sacrifice in obedience to the Lord who has accomplished so great a work for us, and is yet to perform such glorious things for us in the world to come! O that we might at once yield ourselves servants to obey the Lord in every respect, from henceforth till the warfare is ended; and not lower the standard of christianity by a life of sinfulness, but let us raise the standard on high by attaining the position spoken of by Paul in his epistle to the Romans. "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness;" and it will most surely end in eternal life.

Time is short; the Lord is at hand; wicked men and seducers are waxing worse and worse; scoffers are mocking; sinners are cursing; evil servants are smiting; and satan is working with great power to deceive if possible the very elect; but, thanks be to God he is our hiding place from the present evil, and our refuge from the coming storm. O that the "Lord would make us to increase and abound in love one toward another, to the end he may establish our hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints," is the prayer of your unworthy brother,

A JOYFUL DISCOVERY.

A poor old woman who has read her Bible and loved it for forty years, came the other day, looking for some help to bring her to see her only child—a married man—before she should die. We gave her some assistance and instruction. She then asked us if we knew that the Lord Jesus Christ was to come to this earth again?

We said, "To be sure; that is the joy of his waiting Church."

"Did you ever hear," she said, "that if we are alive when he comes, we'll be lifted up without dying, to meet him in the air?"

We said "Yes."

"Well, dear, that's the joyfullest thing I ever heard—the pleasantest news I ever read, except salvations, joyful sound," said the old creature.

"Long as I'm reading the word of God, I never read that sweet news before; and sure the world does not know it."

We said, "No, nor does the world care about it."

"Well, dear, I just want to see if my son and grandchildren is livin', and be ready to meet the Lord when he comes again, for he may come any minute; and oh! it would be a great mistake to have the notice of his coming before our eyes all our lives, and yet be taken unawares."

Reader, do you believe that Christ is coming? And if you believe it, are you ready to meet him.—Selected.

FORTUNES OF WAR.

A friend contributes to the American Agriculturist the following incident, which recently occurred in Brooklyn, New York. Several military gentlemen who had served during the present war, happened to meet, and were recounting their experiences. One of them was formerly a Union citizen of Texas, but he had been forced into the rebel army, made prisoner, and afterward released on taking the oath of allegiance. He was asked, "Where were you captured?"

"At the battle of Spottsylvania, near the Court House," was the reply.

"I was there," remarked the Colonel; "and I, also," said a captain; "and I, too," said a third, a lieutenant.

The Texas gentleman continued: "During the battle General Lee rode near us and asked, 'What regiment is that?' and was told, 'The —th Mississippi.' 'Just the one I want,' exclaimed Lee, and gave orders for them to retake an earthwork from which your Union forces had driven us and posted artillery. We started across an open field through a storm of death, arrived in a hollow in front of the work, where we were sheltered from its fire, and formed ranks. There were only 267 men remaining. We carried the earthwork, but it availed little, for soon from your infantry, which must have been arrayed in four lines of battle, came a perfect sheet of minie balls across the top of the parapet, cutting down every man who showed his head above it. A ball struck the bow of my spectacles, grazing my temple, carrying away a lock of hair, as you see (showing a small scar). A tree twenty two inches in diameter, near which I stood, was literally chipped in two by a storm of balls, and fell, killing two men. Out of that 267 men, only two beside myself escaped unharmed."

"I can corroborate your story," remarked the Colonel. "I was in command of the infantry who made that attack. We were in four lines, and after the action I measured the tree you mentioned."

"When you were taken, did you not wear a haversack bearing a masonic emblem?" asked the Lieutenant.

"Yes," was the reply.

"And I am the man who made you a prisoner," said the former speaker. "Your countenance seemed familiar, but I could not at once recall where we had met before."

Strange as is this account, it may be fully relied on in all its details: and it forms a most striking illustration of the curious chances of war.

Children's Department.

A YOUNG GIDEON.

A boy belonging to one of the schools established by the missionaries in the South Seas, had heard so much of the sin and folly of idolatry, that his confidence in idols was shaken, and he longed to know for a certainty whether the images he had been accustomed to worship were really possessed of power or not. One day his father and mother went out, and left him at home alone. He had spent some time in reading his tasks, and thinking over what he had been taught at the school the day before. At last the idea came into his mind that it would be a good thing to burn the idols. He was, however, afraid, partly on account of his parents, and partly from the dread he had of offending the gods, and bringing down upon him swift destruction. In this difficulty he knelt down, and entreated the God of the Christians to take care of him, and help him. He then rose, and, taking up one of the smallest idols, he put it on the fire; the flames kindled about it and in a short time not a vestige of it remained. The terrified child looked on with astonishment; but no sooner was the first consumed than he threw on another, and another, and another, till, like Gideon of old, he had thoroughly cleansed his father's house. When, however, the flames had subsided, and all was over, the boy became alarmed at his own temerity. He had no more fear of the gods of wood and of stone, but he trembled at the thought of what his father might say, and he was half inclined to repent of his rashness.

In this extremity he shut up the dwelling, and went into the woods; and there, in the best way he could, he devoted himself to God, promising that if God would befriend him and be his God, he would serve him all the days of his life. While he was there, his father and mother returned, and missing at once the idols and the boy, they feared some spirit had come and taken them away together. As soon as they could recover themselves a little, they went to the missionary and asked him if he knew any thing about their son. He said he did not; but suspecting what had been done, he offered to accompany them and find him out. After going in various directions, they bent their steps to the wood, and there, at some distance, under the shadow of a large tree, they saw the lad kneeling before God. The parents were so thankful to see him again, and to find that not a hair of his head was hurt, that they forgot their rebukes, were persuaded to renounce their heathenish customs, and henceforth gave themselves up to the study of the Holy Scriptures. The boy, encouraged by the Divine goodness, was confirmed in his resolution to be the Lord's, and afterwards became a zealous teacher in the schools, and a preacher of the Gospel among his brethren.

WE MUST ALL MIND SOMEBODY.

Annie and Nettie, Mrs. Gray's twin children, lay snugly tucked in their little bed, where their mother had just left them. They had said their evening prayers at her knee in the sweet summer twilight, and she had been speaking with them about the past day's conduct. They kept talking after she had left them.

Annie was the larger and stronger of the two, and took the lead in every thing. "Dear me, Nettie, said she, "don't you wish it was mamma's duty to mind us, instead of our's to mind her? I would let her go visiting every day, and she should wear her best dresses all the time."

"Then what could we have her wear Sundays?" asked Nettie.

"Oh!" said Annie. "Well, then, perhaps she better not. But now, Nettie! it isn't a bit pleasant to mind, is it? Every body is always saying, 'Annie, don't do this; Annie, don't do that.' The more I want to, the more I can't. How nice it would be to have papa and mamma ask if they might go to spend the day at grandma's instead of our having to ask them. I'd always let 'em go!"

"But then you know, Annie," replied Nettie, "they would not ask to go if it wasen't best. They would always know. Don't you remember how you cried because you couldn't go to Lottie Frost's that afternoon when there was such an awful storm? Mamma thought it was coming, and it did, and how scared we were. I we had gone, we should have been all wet through, and perhaps the thunder would have struck us on the road."

"Don't let us talk any more," said Annie; "I'm going to sleep."

"Wait a minute, Annie," said their mother, who had been sitting in the next chamber, and had overheard them. "Let me sit by you a little longer and talk about this tiresome minding. Do you suppose, dear, that you children are the only ones that have to mind? Why, we must all mind some one."

"Now, mamma!" began Annie. "Why, mamma! you know you can do just any thing you want to. You could buy all the candy in Mr. Brown's store, and you could go to ride all the time. I wish I was grown up."

"But if you were grown up," said Mrs. Gray, "you would have to obey your conscience, and that is harder than obeying me. You would have to think, and think. You would have to say, 'Is this right? Is it best? Will it wrong others?' You could easily decide then about buying candy, but there would be much harder questions to settle. You would have more difficult 'minding' to do, and I want you to get a good habit of it now, so as to make it easier then."

"But who shall I have to mind, mamma? Who do you?"

"It is our heavenly Father, Annie. He speaks to me in the Bible, and in my conscience, and when I obey him I am happy. But if I don't mind directly, every thing goes wrong, and I am miserable. We are all God's children, and he is training us here to live with him in his kingdom. And as we are ignorant, and do not know what is best for us, he wants us to obey what he tells us."—Congregationalist.

"I'M GOOD FOR SOMETHING."

A young man, whose bluntness was such that every effort to turn him to account in a dry-goods store was found to be unavailing, received the customary notice from his employer that he did not suit and must go.

"But I'm good for some thing," remonstrated the poor fellow, loth to be turned into the street.

"You are good for nothing as a salesman anyhow," retorted the principal, regarding him from a business point of view.

"I am sure I can be useful," repeated the young man.

"How? Tell me how."

"I don't know, sir; I don't know."

"Nor do I," and the principal laughed as he saw the eagerness the lad displayed.

"Only don't put me away, sir; don't put me away. Try me at some thing else besides selling; I can not sell. I know that I can not sell."

"I know that too; that is what there is wrong."

"But I can make myself useful somehow, I know I can."

The blunt boy who could not be turned into a salesman, and whose manner was so little captivating that he was nearly sent about his business, was accordingly tried at some thing else. He was placed in the counting-house, where his aptitude for figures soon showed itself, and in a few years he became not only the chief cashier in the concern, but eminent as an accountant throughout the country.

Boys, be sure and be "good for some thing."

FREDDY'S PRAYER.

A bright eyed boy of four years was saying his prayers the other night to his mother, and with his hands folded and eyes closed he said:

"Now I lay me down to sleep
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take
God bless papa, mamma, and—"

He stopped all at once, opened his eyes and exclaimed:

"Mother, mother, what shall I say if I have been a bad boy?"

"You should not stop to ask questions, my son, while you are saying your prayers," replied his mother.

"But, mother, I have been bad; what shall I say?"

"Ask God to forgive you; but you should say your prayers all through, when you begin, without stopping."

His question answered, he reverently folded his hands and closing his eyes, continued:

"And will God forgive me for killing a hop-toad with a big stick, and throwing it down a big hole? Amen."

Children of larger growth will do well to copy.

WITNESS TO THE TRUTH.

BY CHARLES FITCH.

"He being dead yet speaketh." Heb. xi. 4.

The following letter, though published in the Bible Examiner, years ago, is so valuable, and at this time important, that we republish it; hoping it may quicken some, and carry conviction to others, who, having seen light, have apostatized from it, or refused to follow it, through shame, or some other cause. Br. Fitch was an able Minister in the Congregational Church for some years; much loved and esteemed for his devotion to Christ. He became a Preacher of the Advent faith in 1841 or 2, and fell asleep in Jesus in the fall of 1844. He was a lovely man, and many listened to his ministry with intense interest and great profit. Had he lived, we doubt not he would have been with us in proclaiming, "No life out of Christ." This letter will show how his mind was led. It was written only a few months before his death.—Editor.

Philadelphia, July 3d, 1844.

Dear Br. Storrs:—You remember that our blessed and adorable Lord and Master said, at the bar of Pilate, "for this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." He having left the world, it is now the business of all his followers, who hope for eternal life through him, to walk in his steps, and like him to feel and act on the admission that the end of their present life is to "bear witness to the truth." For bearing witness to the truth our glorious Lord was crucified by wicked men who hated the truth, and would not bear its light. For bearing witness to the truth, fifty or sixty millions of his followers have sacrificed their lives, sealing their testimony with their blood. It is still as truly as it ever was, the sole business of Christ's followers to bear witness to the truth, and still there are conflicts to be sustained, and sacrifices to be made, and trials to be endured, by those who will be faithful witnesses for Christ. It is true that such are not now called to a martyr's death, and yet I fully believe that the faithful witness for truth in this day, will find himself in the midst of conflicts and trials, from unbelieving men, who hate the truth, which will make him feel sometimes that it would be a relief and a privilege, to be permitted to seal his testimony with his blood, and thus end the struggle. It may be said, doubtless with truth, that such may not know how they would feel if really brought to the test; yet, in the midst of their struggles the feeling will come over them at times with great power, that it would be gain to die for the truth and sleep in Jesus till the resurrection.

It has often been a great pleasure to me, to learn from those who have come out from preconceived opinion, and prejudice, and hatred of truth, to stand up fearlessly in its defence, and meet the scorn and derision and hatred and contempt of those professing godliness, who were yet haters of truth, the trials and conflicts through which they passed, and the convictions and feelings and facts, which have led them to their present position. It has also been a sweet relief and consolation to my own mind, in the midst of such conflicts as I have passed through for the truth's sake, to be permitted to relate to others the dealings of the Lord with me, and the process of mind through which I have been led to see, embrace and defend truth, for which truth's sake I have been scorned and set at nought, by those professed friends of Christ who hate it.

I know that with many who claim to be Christ's, and who make high pretensions to an unusual acquaintance with spiritual things; fanatic, fool, maniac, and knave, are epithets sufficiently kind, to be applied to those who will sacrifice all for truth that is unpopular; and that to say they are dupes of designing men and under the influence of the devil, is a common thing, and those who say these cruel things are righteous in their own eyes for having done so, and feel that they ought on account of them to stand higher than before in the estimation of God.

But, thanks be to God, there are hearts in the world who have in them enough of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, to appreciate the feelings of those who are willing to sacrifice all for truth; and to listen with candor and kindness to what they say in its defence. It is for such hearts that I write, and should I be the means of leading such, to clearer and more consistent views of any precious truth of God than they have hitherto entertained, to God be all the praise.

END OF THE WICKED—FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

It is now several years since, as I was crossing the ferry from Jersey city to New York, some one placed in my hands your first pamphlet on the final destruction of the wicked. I can hardly express to you the aversion, the loathing, with which I turned from it. I do not know what could, at that time, have been a sufficient inducement for me to enter upon the examination of such a subject, as one that might with any possibility be true. I regarded it in the light of something totally, eternally, and necessarily false, and in the highest degree pernicious. I should think it was eight or nine months afterwards, that for the first time in my life I met with an individual who avowed his belief in it, and urged it upon me as a truth. I revolted from it and kicked against it, as Saul of Tarsus did against the truth that Jesus of Nazareth was the true Messiah. I was at that time delivering a course of lectures on the coming of the Lord; and having been told that report in the place accused me of holding to the annihilation of the wicked, I had taken good care to shield my reputation from such a stain, by a public disavowal of belief in any such sentiment, and a strong asseveration of my full and firm adherence to the opposite opinion. The day after the subject had been presented, as I was riding, my thoughts were again turned to the subject. In connection with the coming of the Lord, I had been preaching holiness of heart and life as the indispensable preparation for such an event; telling the people that without a perfect readiness in all things to do the will of Christ, without any reserve or stipulation, and that at the expense of any sacrifice or suffering, even to the laying down of life for the truth's sake, they could not be saved; as He had said, "He that saveth his life shall lose it." The thought now rushed upon my mind, would I be willing to preach the destruction of the wicked for Christ's sake, should I find it true? I shrank from answering the question more than I can express. I hoped that it was not true: I felt ashamed of such a sentiment, and most ardently desired that I might never be called to the extreme mortification of avowing my belief therein. A few scriptural facts, however, at that time were fastened upon my mind, which, together constituted an argument which I could not meet, and never has been met, to my knowledge; and I am fully persuaded never can be.

PROCESS OF CONVICTION.

They were the following:—1 Tim. vi. 16, "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in light which no man hath seen or can see."

I now saw that if God only hath immortality, it does not belong to man. It is of no use to say that man's body does not possess immortality, while his soul does, for it is expressly declared that none but the invisible God, "dwelling in light which no man hath seen or can see," hath immortality. It is therefore true only of God as a Spirit; and now to say that the spirit of man has immortality is to rob God of this perfection and give it to fallen man, whom God has declared is dust, and to dust must return. God did not say to man, thy body is dust and thy soul immortal. Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return. The current philosophy teaches that the body is not the man, but a mere appendage, and that when that is dropped the man is more alive and active than ever. According to this philosophy, it is not true that man is dust and to dust returns; for this notion ascribes to man an immortality in spirit, which the Bible declares to be possessed by none but the invisible God.

In 2 Tim. i. 10, we are taught that our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. I was led to inquire at once, if immortality comes through the gospel, how are those to gain it who reject the gospel? This question was also to me unanswerable, and is equally so to all the world. In the 2d chapter of Romans we read that at the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, he will render eternal life to those who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor, and immortality. Again I enquired, why should man, who is declared by the current philosophy to be immortal, be enjoined in the Scriptures to seek immortality by patient continuance in well doing, if he possess it already? All these Scriptures I found to be wholly irreconcileable to the common notion that man is immortal, and produced a strong conviction in my mind, that the philosophy which taught the immortality of all mankind might prove false. It is perfectly idle here to divide man into parts, and say that some part of man is mortal, and some immortal; for if part of man is immortal, it is not true that God only hath immortality.

Being entirely unwilling, however, to embrace so unpopular a doctrine, as that "all the wicked God will destroy," I rested upon the declarations that the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, be tormented day and night for ever; and though at times I could not but admit that the destruction of the wicked might be true; yet so unwilling was I to embrace the sentiment, that I would go back again and rest on those same passages touching the duration of future punishment. In this state of mind I struggled onward, with many misgivings that I might be rejecting truth, because ashamed of it, until at Oberlin, last fall, reasoning with them concerning the kingdom of God.

To overthrow a position I had taken respecting the future inheritance of the saints in the earth, Pres. Mahan one evening went into a scriptural examination of the terms, everlasting, eternal, for ever and ever. He showed clearly from the scriptures that these terms were sometimes applied to objects that must have an end,—as the everlasting mountains, the everlasting priesthood of the Jews, and the land of Idumea, whose smoke is to ascend for ever;—and thus clearly established the position, that these terms could only mean the entire duration of the object to which they are applied. When applied to God, these terms mean, as long as God exists. When applied to the righteous, as long as the righteous exist: to the mountains, or Jewish priesthood, while they exist: and of course, I said, when applied to the wicked, they mean as long as the wicked exist.

I immediately told the audience that President Mahan had thrown light upon my mind, for he had fairly established the foregoing position from Scripture, and as an honest man I could not deny it. I now saw clearly that while the wicked exist, they will exist to suffer; but I was led at once to inquire how long will they exist? Have they any promise of immortality? or is there any thing in the Bible that proves them immortal? The terms everlasting, eternal, &c., applied to their punishment, do not prove them immortal, because these terms are applied to objects which do come to an end; and hence, notwithstanding these terms, the wicked may come to an end; and now I wish to ascertain from Scripture whether the wicked are to have an end. If they are immortal, then these terms when applied to their punishment, prove it endless; but if they are not immortal, then these terms prove that while they exist, they exist to suffer. Are they immortal?

President Mahan had a very curious way of attempting to get out of the difficulty into which he had brought himself, by the position which he had fully established touching the meaning of these terms. He said, when applied to the endless future, they expressed endless duration; and hence, as the punishment of the wicked had reference to the endless future, these terms expressed endless duration when applied to the punishment of the wicked.

But the point was this: Does the punishment of the wicked have reference to the endless future? The terms everlasting, for ever and ever, eternal, &c., are applied to objects which have an end. Will the wicked have an end? But, says the President, these terms, when applied to the interminable future, mean endless duration. This is admitted: but I am wishing to know what these terms mean when applied to the wicked: some objects to which these terms are applied have an end—will the wicked have an end! I now saw clearly that if I could prove the wicked immortal by other Scriptures, then I could prove by the foregoing terms that their sufferings were interminable; but if they were not immortal, then their sufferings would run parallel with their existence until they should be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his his power.

HIS CONVERSION.

Thus President Mahan completely demolished the last prop on which I had been leaning, to support the immortality of the wicked; for I knew full well, that the Bible contained nothing which began to promise immortality to the wicked, if these terms everlasting and eternal applied to their punishment did not. On the contrary, we are told that, "Yet a little and the wicked shall not be, yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be; as the whirlwind passeth so is the wicked no more; the wicked are overthrown, and are not; they are utterly consumed with terrors; they shall utterly perish in their own corruption; when the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever; they shall perish for ever as their own dung, they shall be chased away as a vision of the night; they shall be as though they had not been; the day that cometh shall burn them up, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch; thine hand shall find out all thine enemies, thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee; thou shalt make them a fiery oven in the time of thine anger; the Lord shall swallow them up in his wrath, and the fire shall devour them; their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth, and their seed from the children of men." All these I have found to be plain Scriptural declarations.

Now, as the wicked have not immortality, as the terms everlasting and eternal applied to them, do not necessarily imply endless duration, unless their immortality can first be established by other proof, and as the Bible does positively declare in repeated instances they shall not be, and shall be no more, and shall be as though they had not been, the argument is conclusive. They will be destroyed for ever. He that does not see and admit this conclusion is where I have been touching this very subject—ashamed to see and fully avow the truth.

Even after all this light was upon my mind, I had a severe struggle with myself before I could consent to become openly and fearlessly its advocate. I thought, or rather tried to think for a time, that it would be better to say nothing on the subject. But in that condition neither my own spirit nor the Spirit of God would give me any rest. I knew I had no right to be ashamed of God's truth any more than of himself, and that while professing to bear witness to the truth, I could not draw back from testifying to the whole truth, through shame or fear of man, without drawing back to perdition.

If such men as President Mahan can rest upon a mere quibble, a begging of the whole question, after admitting that these terms do not always imply endless duration, but claim that they do when applied to the wicked, because they do when applied to the interminable future, I must leave them with God. My Bible tells me that the wicked shall not be, and therefore the word everlasting, when applied to them, no more proves that they always will be, than it proves the same thing of other objects which have an end. Brother Miller also thinks that he has been preserved from great errors, by refusing to receive any thing for truth which has one plain text of Scripture against it. I admit the correctness of the principle, and therefore I cannot believe in the immortality of the wicked; for I am told that they shall be utterly consumed with terrors, and they shall not be—and I know that there are many very plain texts which do plainly teach the same thing. For the same reason I cannot believe that the wicked are to be taken to the moon or any other part of the universe to be punished: because the word of God plainly declares, "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." They must therefore receive their recompense in the earth, and that recompense is to be, "burned up, root and branch." These truths, through great trials and struggles, I was at length constrained by the fear of God to avow and defend. I cannot shrink from them without offending God, any more than our dear brethren can withhold truth on the coming of the Lord. I see Christ exalted to give life and immortality. I see man in the dust destitute of immortality, because of sin. This honors Christ and abases man. I must glorify Christ by presenting him as the giver of life. I must abase man by showing him that he is dust, and then encourage him by pointing him to Christ for life. May the Lord guide us all into his blessed truth, and bring us quickly to his glorious kingdom.

We now resume the question of the ultimate destiny of the wicked. And may God by his truth shine upon us, and illuminate our mind.

1. Mr. Lee admits that the punishment of sin is termed death; but denies that death involves the extinction, or cessation, of life. This amounts to this—that the punishment of sin is termed what it is not!

We do not "assume that death is the extinction of" life; for we have proved, in a previous article, that the punishment of sin is death in a literal sense of the word. We do not define death to be annihilation in the strict and philosophical sense of the term, and Mr. Lee evades a correct issue by the continued use of that term But let that pass. The question to be proved is, that death is the cessation, or extinction, of the functions of life.

2. Mr. Lee argues that because the term death is applied to both the righteous and the wicked, this is sufficient of itself to show the absurdity of relying upon the force of the word death, to prove what the punishment of sin is. It is absurd, then, to rely upon the words, or language, of a penalty, to determine what that penalty is! Mr. Lee certainly does not profess to be wiser than his Maker, for Jehovah has not left it to Mr. Lee, to me, nor to any other man, to infer what death is. God, himself, has defined it in the most explicit manner—"Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." This is death. The simple act of dying is not death. Dying is the process of entering into death. The dominion of death is the penalty of the divine law.

Mr. Lee quotes Heb. ix. 27.—"And as it is appointed to men once to die, but after this the judgment," as though this had anything to do with eternal torments. Death was appointed before the judgment; but Mr. Lee says men never die literally, and, upon the same principle of reasoning, he should do away with the judgment.

3. Mr. Lee affirms that, "there is nothing in the etymology, or common scriptural use of the word, to justify the assumption that it means annihilation." This word annihilation haunts Mr. Lee's brain like his faith in ghosts! But let us examine the etymology and scriptural use of the word, and see if the extinction of life is not found in it as the primary and radical meaning.

Mr. Lee quotes Rom. vi. 23.—"The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." The word here rendered death, is, in the Greek, thanatos, which Mr. Lee's authority thus defines—"Death, i. e., the extinction of life; exposure to danger of death, disease, pestilence, spiritual death," &c. The reader will observe, that the first, or primary, meaning of thanatos, is "extinction of life." This is the literal, unfigurative, common, scriptural, and etymological meaning of the word. Grove's Lexicon thus defines it: "To die, fall, perish, expire." Here, again, we get the full force of the word thanatos, which involves the idea of the extinction of life, or a cessation of the functions of life.

But, reader, what is Mr. Lee's comment? "From this it is seen that by going back to the original, we get no nearer the idea of"—what? Death? No, but "annihilation!" This really looks dishonest; however, I hope better things of Mr. Lee, though he writes thus.

Mr. Lee remarks—"In the text above quoted, it will not be denied that death and eternal life are opposed to each other, and by their different significations, make the difference in the destiny of the saved and lost.' This is true, the penalty, or wages of sin, and the gift of God, run parallel with each other. Death in its dominion, is the wages of sin—death eternal; and eternal life, unmixed with evil, disease, or death, the reward of the righteous.

Mr. Lee says thanatos denotes the death of the body; but, then, he has taught us, that the body of itself, being matter, has no life! How then can it die?

Again, he says, the word zoe "denotes natural life, the life which we now live." We shall notice this presently. He then professes to give two instances where thanatos denotes the death of the body, as though any theologian was so simple as to suppose it was not used in that sense! Truly, Mr. Lee must suppose his readers are very ignorant. The death of the body is the death of the man—the cessation of the functions of life, whether he apply it to men before, or after the resurrection.

Again, what student of the Scriptures does not know, that zoe is applied to the present life, and the eternal life of the righteous? But this does not alter the meaning of the word—it has the same primary meaning, whether we apply it to the life that now is, or to that which is to come. The difference between them is expressed by another word—eternal. Mr. Lee makes a smoke where there was none, and then presumes his readers will not see his gross blunders.

It may be true, as Mr. Lee says, that "there is not the least proof that death signifies annihilation;" but there is abundant proof that it signifies the extinction of life. And what if these terms are used in a "figurative sense;" does that do away with their literal sense? And will Mr. Lee tell me what words are not, sometimes, used in a figurative sense?

"The word death," says Mr. Lee, "is often used when loss of life must be meant. The first text he quotes proves this—"Follow me; and let the dead bury the dead." Here it is used both in a figurative and in a literal sense, and he cannot put any other construction upon it. Let the dead, in sin, bury the literally dead, Matt. viii. 22.

In Eph. v. 14, Mr. Lee gives us another example:—"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light." Here the words sleep, arise, and dead, are all used in a moral, or figurative, sense; but shall we thence conclude that they are never used in a literal sense? That men never literally sleep, arise, or are dead? What sophistry Mr. Lee displays!

When Mr. Lee applies thanatos to physical death, he says it means the death of the body i. e., of a part of the man. In what sense will he apply it, when he uses it morally? Will he say, that a man is half dead to God? Or half dead in sin? I apprehend here is a chasm he did not see through the smoke and fog he raised! I suppose when a man is dead in sin, that he is without the life of God—he has no moral, or spiritual life. The term thanatos, therefore, when used morally, must imply the absence, or extinction of spiritual life. So your foundation crumbles.

The Bible speaks of some who "are twice dead," and then "plucked up by the roots;" but Mr. Lee is so benevolent that he will not suffer himself to believe that any man is more than half dead!

Mr. Lee quotes Col. ii. 20; Eph. ii. 1; 1 Tim. v. 6; Rev. iii. 1; but as all these passages speak of death in the sense defined above, we shall not offer any comment upon them. Mr. Lee insists they do not teach annihilation, and in this we agree.

Mr. Lee's last argument on this point has reference to the "second death." He says there is no annihilation in it; and there certainly is no eternal misery in it; and here, for the present, we shall leave it.

Mr. Lee concludes his essay thus—"We trust we have shown that death does not signify annihilation." Very well, Mr. Lee, now prove it does not signify extinction of life!

This you have never done yet. Homo.

THE PASSIONS.

To ascertain what degree of influence the passions ought to have on the Christian character, is a subject of considerable importance, to all who—having the high privilege of membership in the Christian church—are desirous of perfecting their characters, and fitting themselves for the enjoyment of a future life. I am aware that to treat upon this subject fully and in all its details, would require much metaphysical knowledge; but I purpose only to submit a few brief and popular remarks, tending to shew the importance of a due regulation of the passions; and that those individuals who have become members of the Christian church, are imperatively called upon to subject their minds and dispositions to the control and influence of reason, and the principles of Christianity.

The Apostle Paul, in writing to the churches in Galatia, says "Now they that are of Christ (Christianity) have crucified the flesh with the passions and the desires thereof;" (Gal. v. 24, 25.) meaning that the Christian should hold his mind and body equally in subjection, and by the control and mastery of his passions, be enabled, if necessary, to offer himself up, as it were, a sacrifice devoted to the cause of truth. Not, indeed, that the passions should be annihilated; Christianity does not extinguish the legitimate use of any one feeling or faculty of the mind; it only furnishes the mind with a strong and influential motive to bring them under the government of reason and religious principle.

Let us, in order to ascertain their due degree of influence, consider the use of the passions. They were implanted in the human breast for the wisest and best purposes; they are powerful instruments in the formation of our characters; they operate as an impetus to exertion in the acquirement of knowledge, and in the attainment of excellence; and upon their judicious or injudicious application will depend whether we become wise or foolish—virtuous or vicious—exalted or debased in our characters. The feelings and the passions are, as it were, the springs of action, without whose influence we should become inert, and possess no excitement to labor or exertion; when enduring pain or affliction, we could never act with fortitude; in the hour of danger, or in the day of trial we should be devoid of courage and firmness; and when our minds were exposed to gloom and despair, or our hearts oppressed with grief and sorrow, we should be incapable of that serenity and satisfaction which hope never fails to inspire, under the most adverse circumstances; neither should we be capable of being aroused to the performance of noble, disinterested, or exalted and benevolent actions.

Thus, then, it will be seen, that the passions are necessary to empower man to fulfil the functions of his nature. It is only when they are indulged to excess—when they lead and govern, instead of being subservient to the voice of reason and nature, to the dictates of principle, and the spirit of Christianity, that they become prejudicial to our well-being, and injurious in their influence. They are, indeed, bad masters, but excellent servants. It is, when so indulged, that, instead of emulation, we practice and cherish envy; instead of love, we imbibe hatred; instead of hope, we are depressed by slavish fear and timidity; instead of forbearance and forgiveness, we are actuated with resentment and revenge; and instead of humility and true self-respect, we manifest pride, vanity, and egotism. Now, surely, no one will say that these ought to influence the Christian character:—he who is commanded to "render to no one evil for evil;" to "let all bitterness, and passion, and anger, and noise, and evil speaking, be removed from him;" he who is called upon to furnish his "belief with virtue; his virtue with knowledge; his knowledge with self-command; his self-command with patience; his patience with piety; his piety with brotherly affection; his brotherly affection with universal benevolence." And yet, if we look into what is falsely termed the Christian world, we shall too often see the Christian name associated with the existence of those feelings, and the gratification of those passions, which, in their uncontrolled indulgence, and excessive influence, most disgrace and most degrade our nature.

There are, however, feelings or passions apparently of a milder or a less important kind, though, perhaps, equally injurious in their consequences, which are considered light and venial, and, therefore, become more dangerous. How often, for instance, do we not see persons, calling themselves Christians, become angry, irritable, and dogmatical, the moment you attempt to differ with them, about matters of religion; not content to reason or discuss the difference of opinion. How many indulge their inclinations and appetites, and are guided solely by feeling, in all their actions. Now this is wholly incompatible with that high and dignified tone of character, which ought to distinguish the Christian; the humble follower of the wisest, the most virtuous and enlightened man that ever existed—Jesus of Nazareth, It was his recommendation that, if the hand or the foot were leading to sin, to cut it off, and cast it from us; that, if the eye were leading to sin, to pluck it out. Now this, in figurative language, is descriptive of that line of conduct which the Christian ought to pursue: he is not to temporize—nothing should induce him to swerve from principle and consistency, however alluring the bait;—no indulgence,

WITNESS TO THE TRUTH.

BY CHARLES FITCH.

"He being dead yet speaketh." Heb. xi. 4.

The following letter, though published in the Bible Examiner, years ago, is so valuable, and at this time important, that we republish it; hoping it may quicken some, and carry conviction to others, who, having seen light, have apostatized from it, or refused to follow it, through shame, or some other cause. Br. Fitch was an able Minister in the Congregational Church for some years; much loved and esteemed for his devotion to Christ. He became a Preacher of the Advent faith in 1841 or 2, and fell asleep in Jesus in the fall of 1844. He was a lovely man, and many listened to his ministry with intense interest and great profit. Had he lived, we doubt not he would have been with us in proclaiming, "No life out of Christ." This letter will show how his mind was led. It was written only a few months before his death.—EDITOR.

PHILADELPHIA, July 3d, 1844.

DEAR BR. STORRS:—You remember that our blessed and adorable Lord and Master said, at the bar of Pilate, "for this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." He having left the world, it is now the business of all his followers, who hope for eternal life through him, to walk in his steps, and like him to feel and act on the admission that the end of their present life is to "bear witness to the truth." For bearing witness to the truth our glorious Lord was crucified by wicked men who hated the truth, and would not bear its light. For bearing witness to the truth, fifty or sixty millions of his followers have sacrificed their lives, sealing their testimony with their blood. It is still as truly as it ever was, the sole business of Christ's followers to bear witness to the truth, and still there are conflicts to be sustained, and sacrifices to be made, and trials to be endured, by those who will be faithful witnesses for Christ. It is true that such are not now called to a martyr's death, and yet I fully believe that the faithful witness for truth in this day, will find himself in the midst of conflicts and trials, from unbelieving men, who hate the truth, which will make him feel sometimes that it would be a relief and a privilege, to be permitted to seal his testimony with his blood, and thus end the struggle. It may be said, doubtless with truth, that such may not know how they would feel if really brought to the test; yet, in the midst of their struggles the feeling will come over them at times with great power, that it would be gain to die for the truth and sleep in Jesus till the resurrection.

It has often been a great pleasure to me, to learn from those who have come out from preconceived opinion, and prejudice, and hatred of truth, to stand up fearlessly in its defence, and meet the scorn and derision and hatred and contempt of those professing godliness, who were yet haters of truth, the trials and conflicts through which they passed, and the convictions and feelings and facts, which have led them to their present position. It has also been a sweet relief and consolation to my own mind, in the midst of such conflicts as I have passed through for the truth's sake, to be permitted to relate to others the dealings of the Lord with me, and the process of mind through which I have been led to see, embrace and defend truth, for which truth's sake I have been scorned and set at nought, by those professed friends of Christ who hate it.

I know that with many who claim to be Christ's, and who make high pretensions to an unusual acquaintance with spiritual things; fanatic, fool, maniac, and knave, are epithets sufficiently kind, to be applied to those who will sacrifice all for truth that is unpopular; and that to say they are dupes of designing men and under the influence of the devil, is a common thing, and those who say these cruel things are righteous in their own eyes for having done so, and feel that they ought on account of them to stand higher than before in the estimation of God.

But, thanks be to God, there are hearts in the world who have in them enough of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, to appreciate the feelings of those who are willing to sacrifice all for truth; and to listen with candor and kindness to what they say in its defence. It is for such hearts that I write, and should I be the means of leading such, to clearer and more consistent views of any precious truth of God than they have hitherto entertained, to God be all the praise.

END OF THE WICKED—FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

It is now several years since, as I was crossing the ferry from Jersey city to New York, some one placed in my hands your first pamphlet on the final destruction of the wicked. I can hardly express to you the aversion, the loathing, with which I turned from it. I do not know what could, at that time, have been a sufficient inducement for me to enter upon the examination of such a subject, as one that might with any possibility be true. I regarded it in the light of something totally, eternally, and necessarily false, and in the highest degree pernicious. I should think it was eight or nine months afterwards, that for the first time in my life I met with an individual who avowed his belief in it, and urged it upon me as a truth. I revolted from it and kicked against it, as Saul of Tarsus did against the truth that Jesus of Nazareth was the true Messiah. I was at that time delivering a course of lectures on the coming of the Lord; and having been told that report in the place accused me of holding to the annihilation of the wicked, I had taken good care to shield my reputation from such a stain, by a public disavowal of belief in any such sentiment, and a strong asseveration of my full and firm adherence to the opposite opinion. The day after the subject had been presented, as I was riding, my thoughts were again turned to the subject. In connection with the coming of the Lord, I had been preaching holiness of heart and life as the indispensable preparation for such an event; telling the people that without a perfect readiness in all things to do the will of Christ, without any reserve or stipulation, and that at the expense of any sacrifice or suffering, even to the laying down of life for the truth's sake, they could not be saved; as He had said, "He that saveth his life shall lose it." The thought now rushed upon my mind, would I be willing to preach the destruction of the wicked for Christ's sake, should I find it true? I shrank from answering the question more than I can express. I hoped that it was not true: I felt ashamed of such a sentiment, and most ardently desired that I might never be called to the extreme mortification of avowing my belief therein. A few scriptural facts, however, at that time were fastened upon my mind, which, together constituted an argument which I could not meet, and never has been met, to my knowledge; and I am fully persuaded never can be.

PROCESS OF CONVICTION.

They were the following:—1 Tim. vi. 16, "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in light which no man hath seen or can see."

I now saw that if God only hath immortality, it does not belong to man. It is of no use to say that man's body does not possess immortality, while his soul does, for it is expressly declared that none but the invisible God, "dwelling in light which no man hath seen or can see," hath immortality. It is therefore true only of God as a Spirit; and now to say that the spirit of man has immortality is to rob God of this perfection and give it to fallen man, whom God has declared is dust, and to dust must return. God did not say to man, thy body is dust and thy soul immortal. Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return. The current philosophy teaches that the body is not the man, but a mere appendage, and that when that is dropped the man is more alive and active than ever. According to this philosophy, it is not true that man is dust and to dust returns; for this notion ascribes to man an immortality in spirit, which the Bible declares to be possessed by none but the invisible God.

In 2 Tim. i. 10, we are taught that our Saviour Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. I was led to inquire at once, if immortality comes through the gospel, how are those to gain it who reject the gospel? This question was also to me unanswerable, and is equally so to all the world. In the 2d chapter of Romans we read that at the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, he will render eternal life to those who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor, and immortality. Again I enquired, why should man, who is declared by the current philosophy to be immortal, be enjoined in the Scriptures to seek immortality by patient continuance in well doing, if he possess it already? All these Scriptures I found to be wholly irreconcileable to the common notion that man is immortal, and produced a strong conviction in my mind, that the philosophy which taught the immortality of all mankind might prove false. It is perfectly idle here to divide man into parts, and say that some part of man is mortal, and some immortal; for if part of man is immortal, it is not true that God only hath immortality.

Being entirely unwilling, however, to embrace so unpopular a doctrine, as that "all the wicked God will destroy," I rested upon the declarations that the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, be tormented day and night for ever; and though at times I could not but admit that the destruction of the wicked might be true; yet so unwilling was I to embrace the sentiment, that I would go back again and rest on those same passages touching the duration of future punishment. In this state of mind I struggled onward, with many misgivings that I might be rejecting truth, because ashamed of it, until at Oberlin, last fall, reasoning with them concerning the kingdom of God.

To overthrow a position I had taken respecting the future inheritance of the saints in the earth, Pres. Mahan one evening went into a scriptural examination of the terms, everlasting, eternal, for ever and ever. He showed clearly from the scriptures that these terms were sometimes applied to objects that must have an end,—as the everlasting mountains, the everlasting priesthood of the Jews, and the land of Idumea, whose smoke is to ascend for ever;—and thus clearly established the position, that these terms could only mean the entire duration of the object to which they are applied. When applied to God, these terms mean, as long as God exists. When applied to the righteous, as long as the righteous exist: to the mountains, or Jewish priesthood, while they exist: and of course, I said, when applied to the wicked, they mean as long as the wicked exist.

I immediately told the audience that President Mahan had thrown light upon my mind, for he had fairly established the foregoing position from Scripture, and as an honest man I could not deny it. I now saw clearly that while the wicked exist, they will exist to suffer; but I was led at once to inquire how long will they exist? Have they any promise of immortality? or is there any thing in the Bible that proves them immortal? The terms everlasting, eternal, &c., applied to their punishment, do not prove them immortal, because these terms are applied to objects which do come to an end; and hence, notwithstanding these terms, the wicked may come to an end; and now I wish to ascertain from Scripture whether the wicked are to have an end. If they are immortal, then these terms when applied to their punishment, prove it endless; but if they are not immortal, then these terms prove that while they exist, they exist to suffer. Are they immortal?

President Mahan had a very curious way of attempting to get out of the difficulty into which he had brought himself, by the position which he had fully established touching the meaning of these terms. He said, when applied to the endless future, they expressed endless duration; and hence, as the punishment of the wicked had reference to the endless future, these terms expressed endless duration when applied to the punishment of the wicked.

But the point was this: Does the punishment of the wicked have reference to the endless future? The terms everlasting, for ever and ever, eternal, &c., are applied to objects which have an end. Will the wicked have an end? But, says the President, these terms, when applied to the interminable future, mean endless duration. This is admitted: but I am wishing to know what these terms mean when applied to the wicked: some objects to which these terms are applied have an end—will the wicked have an end! I now saw clearly that if I could prove the wicked immortal by other Scriptures, then I could prove by the foregoing terms that their sufferings were interminable; but if they were not immortal, then their sufferings would run parallel with their existence until they should be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his his power.

HIS CONVERSION.

Thus President Mahan completely demolished the last prop on which I had been leaning, to support the immortality of the wicked; for I knew full well, that the Bible contained nothing which began to promise immortality to the wicked, if these terms everlasting and eternal applied to their punishment did not. On the contrary, we are told that, "Yet a little and the wicked shall not be, yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be; as the whirlwind passeth so is the wicked no more; the wicked are overthrown, and are not; they are utterly consumed with terrors; they shall utterly perish in their own corruption; when the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever; they shall perish for ever as their own dung, they shall be chased away as a vision of the night; they shall be as though they had not been; the day that cometh shall burn them up, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch; thine hand shall find out all thine enemies, thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee; thou shalt make them a fiery oven in the time of thine anger; the Lord shall swallow them up in his wrath, and the fire shall devour them; their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth, and their seed from the children of men." All these I have found to be plain Scriptural declarations.

Now, as the wicked have not immortality, as the terms everlasting and eternal applied to them, do not necessarily imply endless duration, unless their immortality can first be established by other proof, and as the Bible does positively declare in repeated instances they shall not be, and shall be no more, and shall be as though they had not been, the argument is conclusive. They will be destroyed for ever. He that does not see and admit this conclusion is where I have been touching this very subject—ashamed to see and fully avow the truth.

Even after all this light was upon my mind, I had a severe struggle with myself before I could consent to become openly and fearlessly its advocate. I thought, or rather tried to think for a time, that it would be better to say nothing on the subject. But in that condition neither my own spirit nor the Spirit of God would give me any rest. I knew I had no right to be ashamed of God's truth any more than of himself, and that while professing to bear witness to the truth, I could not draw back from testifying to the whole truth, through shame or fear of man, without drawing back to perdition.

If such men as President Mahan can rest upon a mere quibble, a begging of the whole question, after admitting that these terms do not always imply endless duration, but claim that they do when applied to the wicked, because they do when applied to the interminable future, I must leave them with God. My Bible tells me that the wicked shall not be, and therefore the word everlasting, when applied to them, no more proves that they always will be, than it proves the same thing of other objects which have an end. Brother Miller also thinks that he has been preserved from great errors, by refusing to receive any thing for truth which has one plain text of Scripture against it. I admit the correctness of the principle, and therefore I cannot believe in the immortality of the wicked; for I am told that they shall be utterly consumed with terrors, and they shall not be—and I know that there are many very plain texts which do plainly teach the same thing. For the same reason I cannot believe that the wicked are to be taken to the moon or any other part of the universe to be punished: because the word of God plainly declares, "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner." They must therefore receive their recompense in the earth, and that recompense is to be, "burned up, root and branch." These truths, through great trials and struggles, I was at length constrained by the fear of God to avow and defend. I cannot shrink from them without offending God, any more than our dear brethren can withhold truth on the coming of the Lord. I see Christ exalted to give life and immortality. I see man in the dust destitute of immortality, because of sin. This honors Christ and abases man. I must glorify Christ by presenting him as the giver of life. I must abase man by showing him that he is dust, and then encourage him by pointing him to Christ for life. May the Lord guide us all into his blessed truth, and bring us quickly to his glorious kingdom.

We now resume the question of the ultimate destiny of the wicked. And may God by his truth shine upon us, and illuminate our mind.

1. Mr. Lee admits that the punishment of sin is termed death; but denies that death involves the extinction, or cessation, of life. This amounts to this—that the punishment of sin is termed what it is not!

We do not "assume that death is the extinction of" life; for we have proved, in a previous article, that the punishment of sin is death in a literal sense of the word. We do not define death to be annihilation in the strict and philosophical sense of the term, and Mr. Lee evades a correct issue by the continued use of that term But let that pass. The question to be proved is, that death is the cessation, or extinction, of the functions of life.

2. Mr. Lee argues that because the term death is applied to both the righteous and the wicked, this is sufficient of itself to show the absurdity of relying upon the force of the word death, to prove what the punishment of sin is. It is absurd, then, to rely upon the words, or language, of a penalty, to determine what that penalty is! Mr. Lee certainly does not profess to be wiser than his Maker, for Jehovah has not left it to Mr. Lee, to me, nor to any other man, to infer what death is. God, himself, has defined it in the most explicit manner—"Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." This is death. The simple act of dying is not death. Dying is the process of entering into death. The dominion of death is the penalty of the divine law.

Mr. Lee quotes Heb. ix. 27.—"And as it is appointed to men once to die, but after this the judgment," as though this had anything to do with eternal torments. Death was appointed before the judgment; but Mr. Lee says men never die literally, and, upon the same principle of reasoning, he should do away with the judgment.

3. Mr. Lee affirms that, "there is nothing in the etymology, or common scriptural use of the word, to justify the assumption that it means annihilation." This word annihilation haunts Mr. Lee's brain like his faith in ghosts! But let us examine the etymology and scriptural use of the word, and see if the extinction of life is not found in it as the primary and radical meaning.

Mr. Lee quotes Rom. vi. 23.—"The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." The word here rendered death, is, in the Greek, thanatos, which Mr. Lee's authority thus defines—"Death, i. e., the extinction of life; exposure to danger of death, disease, pestilence, spiritual death," &c. The reader will observe, that the first, or primary, meaning of thanatos, is "extinction of life." This is the literal, unfigurative, common, scriptural, and etymological meaning of the word. Grove's Lexicon thus defines it: "To die, fall, perish, expire." Here, again, we get the full force of the word thanatos, which involves the idea of the extinction of life, or a cessation of the functions of life.

But, reader, what is Mr. Lee's comment? "From this it is seen that by going back to the original, we get no nearer the idea of"—what? Death? No, but "annihilation!" This really looks dishonest; however, I hope better things of Mr. Lee, though he writes thus.

Mr. Lee remarks—"In the text above quoted, it will not be denied that death and eternal life are opposed to each other, and by their different significations, make the difference in the destiny of the saved and lost." This is true, the penalty, or wages of sin, and the gift of God, run parallel with each other. Death in its dominion, is the wages of sin—death eternal; and eternal life, unmixed with evil, disease, or death, the reward of the righteous.

Mr. Lee says thanatos denotes the death of the body; but, then, he has taught us, that the body of itself, being matter, has no life! How then can it die?

Again, he says, the word zoe "denotes natural life, the life which we now live." We shall notice this presently. He then professes to give two instances where thanatos denotes the death of the body, as though any theologian was so simple as to suppose it was not used in that sense! Truly, Mr. Lee must suppose his readers are very ignorant. The death of the body is the death of the man—the cessation of the functions of life, whether he apply it to men before, or after the resurrection.

Again, what student of the Scriptures does not know, that zoe is applied to the present life, and the eternal life of the righteous? But this does not alter the meaning of the word—it has the same primary meaning, whether we apply it to the life that now is, or to that which is to come. The difference between them is expressed by another word—eternal. Mr. Lee makes a smoke where there was none, and then presumes his readers will not see his gross blunders.

It may be true, as Mr. Lee says, that "there is not the least proof that death signifies annihilation;" but there is abundant proof that it signifies the extinction of life. And what if these terms are used in a "figurative sense;" does that do away with their literal sense? And will Mr. Lee tell me what words are not, sometimes, used in a figurative sense?

"The word death," says Mr. Lee, "is often used when loss of life must be meant. The first text he quotes proves this—"Follow me; and let the dead bury the dead." Here it is used both in a figurative and in a literal sense, and he cannot put any other construction upon it. Let the dead, in sin, bury the literally dead, Matt. viii. 22.

In Eph. v. 14, Mr. Lee gives us another example:—"Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light." Here the words sleep, arise, and dead, are all used in a moral, or figurative, sense; but shall we thence conclude that they are never used in a literal sense? That men never literally sleep, arise, or are dead? What sophistry Mr. Lee displays!

When Mr. Lee applies thanatos to physical death, he says it means the death of the body i. e., of a part of the man. In what sense will he apply it, when he uses it morally? Will he say, that a man is half dead to God? Or half dead in sin? I apprehend here is a chasm he did not see through the smoke and fog he raised! I suppose when a man is dead in sin, that he is without the life of God—he has no moral, or spiritual life. The term thanatos, therefore, when used morally, must imply the absence, or extinction of spiritual life. So your foundation crumbles.

The Bible speaks of some who "are twice dead," and then "plucked up by the roots;" but Mr. Lee is so benevolent that he will not suffer himself to believe that any man is more than half dead!

Mr. Lee quotes Col. ii. 20; Eph. ii. 1; 1 Tim. v. 6; Rev. iii. 1; but as all these passages speak of death in the sense defined above, we shall not offer any comment upon them. Mr. Lee insists they do not teach annihilation, and in this we agree.

Mr. Lee's last argument on this point has reference to the "second death." He says there is no annihilation in it; and there certainly is no eternal misery in it; and here, for the present, we shall leave it.

Mr. Lee concludes his essay thus—"We trust we have shown that death does not signify annihilation." Very well, Mr. Lee, now prove it does not signify extinction of life!

This you have never done yet. HOMO.

THE PASSIONS.

To ascertain what degree of influence the passions ought to have on the Christian character, is a subject of considerable importance, to all who—having the high privilege of membership in the Christian church—are desirous of perfecting their characters, and fitting themselves for the enjoyment of a future life. I am aware that to treat upon this subject fully and in all its details, would require much metaphysical knowledge; but I purpose only to submit a few brief and popular remarks, tending to shew the importance of a due regulation of the passions; and that those individuals who have become members of the Christian church, are imperatively called upon to subject their minds and dispositions to the control and influence of reason, and the principles of Christianity.

The Apostle Paul, in writing to the churches in Galatia, says "Now they that are of Christ (Christianity) have crucified the flesh with the passions and the desires thereof;" (Gal. v. 24, 25.) meaning that the Christian should hold his mind and body equally in subjection, and by the control and mastery of his passions, be enabled, if necessary, to offer himself up, as it were, a sacrifice devoted to the cause of truth. Not, indeed, that the passions should be annihilated; Christianity does not extinguish the legitimate use of any one feeling or faculty of the mind; it only furnishes the mind with a strong and influential motive to bring them under the government of reason and religious principle.

Let us, in order to ascertain their due degree of influence, consider the use of the passions. They were implanted in the human breast for the wisest and best purposes; they are powerful instruments in the formation of our characters; they operate as an impetus to exertion in the acquirement of knowledge, and in the attainment of excellence; and upon their judicious or injudicious application will depend whether we become wise or foolish—virtuous or vicious—exalted or debased in our characters. The feelings and the passions are, as it were, the springs of action, without whose influence we should become inert, and possess no excitement to labor or exertion; when enduring pain or affliction, we could never act with fortitude; in the hour of danger, or in the day of trial we should be devoid of courage and firmness; and when our minds were exposed to gloom and despair, or our hearts oppressed with grief and sorrow, we should be incapable of that serenity and satisfaction which hope never fails to inspire, under the most adverse circumstances; neither should we be capable of being aroused to the performance of noble, disinterested, or exalted and benevolent actions.

Thus, then, it will be seen, that the passions are necessary to empower man to fulfil the functions of his nature. It is only when they are indulged to excess—when they lead and govern, instead of being subservient to the voice of reason and nature, to the dictates of principle, and the spirit of Christianity, that they become prejudicial to our well-being, and injurious in their influence. They are, indeed, bad masters, but excellent servants. It is, when so indulged, that, instead of emulation, we practice and cherish envy; instead of love, we imbibe hatred; instead of hope, we are depressed by slavish fear and timidity; instead of forbearance and forgiveness, we are actuated with resentment and revenge; and instead of humility and true self-respect, we manifest pride, vanity, and egotism. Now, surely, no one will say that these ought to influence the Christian character:—he who is commanded to "render to no one evil for evil;" to "let all bitterness, and passion, and anger, and noise, and evil speaking, be removed from him;" he who is called upon to furnish his "belief with virtue; his virtue with knowledge; his knowledge with self-command; his self-command with patience; his patience with piety; his piety with brotherly affection; his brotherly affection with universal benevolence." And yet, if we look into what is falsely termed the Christian world, we shall too often see the Christian name associated with the existence of those feelings, and the gratification of those passions, which, in their uncontrolled indulgence, and excessive influence, most disgrace and most degrade our nature.

There are, however, feelings or passions apparently of a milder or a less important kind, though, perhaps, equally injurious in their consequences, which are considered light and venial, and, therefore, become more dangerous. How often, for instance, do we not see persons, calling themselves Christians, become angry, irritable, and dogmatical, the moment you attempt to differ with them, about matters of religion; not content to reason or discuss the difference of opinion. How many indulge their inclinations and appetites, and are guided solely by feeling, in all their actions. Now this is wholly incompatible with that high and dignified tone of character, which ought to distinguish the Christian; the humble follower of the wisest, the most virtuous and enlightened man that ever existed—Jesus of Nazareth. It was his recommendation that, if the hand or the foot were leading to sin, to cut it off, and cast it from us; that, if the eye were leading to sin, to pluck it out. Now this, in figurative language, is descriptive of that line of conduct which the Christian ought to pursue: he is not to temporize—nothing should induce him to swerve from principle and consistency, however alluring the bait;—no indulgence, however tempting—no habit, however long it may have been practiced—no feeling, however acute or sensitive, should be continued, or at all influence the conduct, unless they can bear the test of truth, and the scrutinizing eye of reason and religion. If they will not pass through this rigid ordeal of the judgment, then we should pluck them out—cut them off—and cast them from us.

This language of Jesus shews that we are imperatively called upon to annihilate such bad feelings from our minds—to emancipate ourselves from their slavery; and if we do not, we must pronounce our own condemnation, and the consequences will be upon our own heads. But what can be the cause of this irregularity in the passions, and the abuses to which they are liable? As Cogan, in his Ethical Treatise on the Passions, asks, "Is it the irrevocable law of our constitution, that we shall be incited to pursue what we are never to attain? Has some evil being blinded our eyes—perverted our judgment—destroyed our power—and blasted all our fairest hopes? Or, are we ourselves the culpable causes of so much misery, while, apparently, surrounded by so many means of happiness?" He then says, "No one has ever denied the existence of the following causes: ignorance, the influence of present objects, and of inordinate self-love." And, after considering briefly the influence of each of these causes, in rendering affections irregular, and the passions excessive, he says, "since each of these causes above mentioned produces separate effects, so inimical to human welfare—since each has its own characteristic perversion of the passions and affections, and is chargable with the correspondent evils, what misery may not be diffused by their union? What can be conceived more fatal to the welfare of mankind than the darkest ignorance—the presence of subjects, either exciting desire or aversion—and ungovernable self-love, united in the persons of those who possess the power to accomplish every purpose of their hearts? This dire assemblage constitutes the perfection of tyranny, with all its baneful consequences. It diffuses the agonizing sensations of fear, dread, consternation, grief, anguish, and horror, in every direction, and fills those regions of the earth with misery, which become subject to its wretched empire."

Here, then, we have the causes and consequences of an irregular influence of the passions, on the character and conduct of man. That they exist to the extent pointed out, is certain; and that they are injurious and destructive to the best interests of the human character, is equally certain. The Christian, I have shown, is particularly called upon to free himself from their trammels.

"Man know thyself: all wisdom centers

is a maxim which the Christian can not too often attend to; for, if he would let his passions have their due influence, and would guard against their improper bias, he must practice self-examination, and with it, private prayer; he must endeavor to attain that purity of character which Paul recommends, when he says, in his epistle to the Romans, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by these compassionate kindnesses of God, to present your bodies for a living sacrifice, and holy, well pleasing unto God; that religious service of reason, which ye owe; and conform not yourselves to the present manner, but transform yourselves by the renewal of your minds, that ye may shew in yourselves what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." War News.

The war news is briefly told. Gen. Sherman has marched from Savannah, Ga., into South Carolina; and, almost unopposed, has marched his army nearly across that State, destroying railroads, capturing the principal towns, seized on Columbia, the Capitol of the State, compelled the evacuation of Charleston, the nest and hot-bed of this wicked rebellion; thus manifesting God's righteous judgments on the instigators and upholders of rebellion against lawful authority: a rebellion to uphold and perpetuate human slavery, the vilest system "that ever saw the sun;" teaching all men who disregard and trample underfoot the "inalienable rights" of men "to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," that though God may bear long with such iniquity, his "justice will not sleep forever." The righteous judgments of God are seen in the present war, and are a warning to all men, the world over, to beware of framing "iniquity by law," as has been done in this nation in upholding slavery heretofore. Now that God's judgments are abroad in the land, let "the inhabitants thereof learn righteousness;" lest a worse thing come upon us. Let the nation accept the punishment of our sins, and do works meet for repentance, so that judgment shall not need to rise up the second time on the land. Honestly "undo the heavy burdens, let the oppressed go free, and break every yoke." Truly, the punishment for the sin of slaveholding is heavy on the land; but it has been provoked and challenged by those who have upheld this wickedness. The end of it we trust has come. May YAHVEH speed its overthrow.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 22, 1865.

The Wages of Sin.

Moses said—"I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death. . . . Therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live." Acts iii. 22 23—"For Moses truly said unto the fathers, a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you; . . . and it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hear [obey] that prophet [Christ] shall be destroyed from among his people." In the first place he sets life and death before them, and advises them to choose life. He then declares the penalty. None were judged or destroyed at the first advent, hence this destruction is yet future.

So writes a correspondent in the Voice of the West. His premise is correct. Is his conclusion equally so? Were none judged and destroyed at the first advent? and is their destruction yet future? Did not Jesus behold Jerusalem and weep over it, saying, "If thou hadst known....in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace; but now [about to be] hid from thine eyes: for the days shall come upon thee that thine enimies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee," &c. Lk. xix. 41–44? And did he not further say, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed about with armies, then know the desolation thereof is nigh....for these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled?" Lk. xxi. 20–22.

Is here not abundant evidence that that people [the Jews] "were judged" at that time, and the "penalty," executed? or, those who did not obey the voice of Christ were destroyed? If their "destruction is yet future" the words of our Lord must have failed. But they did not fail, and the vengeance written, or the penalty, was executed, having been first judged by the things "written" by Moses.

The writer in the Voice well says:

"You will notice, the penalty is the same with God for sin the in days of Moses as in the days of Adam. It is one and the same through all the dispensations of this world."

That is so: and death to the animal man, unbroken by a revival into life, is the penalty. The penalty is not revival from the dead and another death after resurrection. No such doctrine is found in the word of God; it exists only in the traditions of men. Death's dominion over the Adamic nature is the consummation of the penalty of God's law. This writer in the Voice says many very good things, but struggles hard by being entangled in the tradition of a reliving of the wicked dead to get the wages of sin. In combatting the doctrine of eternal torment, he says:

"Whatever may be the penalty for man's sins, if Christ offered himself for man, and in his stead, then he must have suffered the whole penalty of the law. If the penalty was suffering in a lake of fire and brimstone to all eternity, then Christ will endure this."

Very true: but if the penalty is death after resurrection, "then Christ will endure this." But he has not yet done it? Is that "yet future?" Alas, for the theory of death after resurrection, "Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." So our friend of the Voice will find himself without a redeeming sacrifice as truly as the endless misery believers. The fact is, Christ died to rescue men from the dominion of death, if they would believe in him, or take hold of his divine life. He was "put to death in the flesh;" thus condemning the fleshly or animal nature as unfit for an endless life, and the life by blood is extinguished forever; but Christ was "quickened by the Spirit;" and so are all others that ever revive from the dead "at the last day;" hence, "neither can they die any more;" but they are "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Our friend when he has studied the subject more will see that all attempts to revive the wicked dead are as vain as attempts to find inherent immortal souls or endless misery in the book of God. The resurrection is a conditional event. He that "believeth in Christ shall not perish."

The Jubilees.

In the discussion of the question of chronology, by Messrs. Stevenson and Thurman, each of the disputants laid great stress on the Sabbatic years and jubilees. Mr. Thurman's position was, that the jubilee year embraced the last half of every forty-ninth year, and the first half of the fiftieth year, which was the first year of the next week of years. If this is so, then there is no such thing as a jubilee year. The jubilee, according to this theory, was half of it a Sabbatic year, and half a secular year. But the law of the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 11) made it as much a year of rest as the Sabbatic year. Here it is, "A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you. Ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself." According to Mr. Thurman, the Sabbatic year began with the new moon nearest the vernal equinox, and lasted till that moon again. Then commenced a new series of six secular years. But if Mr. Thurman is correct, they must not reap even that which grew of itself in the first half of the first of the six years. But the law expressly provided that "six years thou shalt sow thy field; six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof." This, of itself, settles the question, with Mr. Thurman's theory, that it is baseless. But it is only a part of its inconsistencies in the light of the law of the jubilee.

When questioned in reference to the sowing and reaping for six consecutive years, he said "Yes, they might sow in the fall of the sixth year, if they could sow anything which ripened before the Sabbath or seventh year came in." We did not think this ingenuous, for he very well knew that even the barley harvest which first ripened in Judea, was not ripe till after the middle of the first month. Whereas, the law providing that the sixth year preceding the forty-ninth year and jubilee should "bring forth fruit for three years." The Sabbatic year, the 7th; the jubilee, the 8th; and they should sow in the 9th year, and eat the old store in the ninth year till the new came in, which was not till after the Passover, at the full moon of the month Abib. But if the jubilee was half the 7th year and half the 8th, they could sow and reap in the 8th year; nay, they were commanded to do so. Mr. Thurman is in error.

Mr. Stevenson's theory is, that the series or cycles of sevens began in the fall, at the sounding of the trumpet at the new moon of the 7th month. Their sowing time was in the fall; their harvest in spring and early summer. They could then sow and reap six consecutive years and not infringe on the Sabbatic year. The jubilee year began in the fall at the close of the forty ninth year, and ended the next fall, when at its close, at the opening of the secular year, a new week of years they were prepared to sow in the fall and reap the next spring. With this theory every item of the law of the Sabbaths and jubilees agrees.

Mr. Thurman's main or strongest argument for his theory, is, that taking a separate year for the jubilee, destroys the harmony of the cycles of sevens. But he should remember that the Bible points out no such series. It calls for continuous cycles of fifties; seven Sabbaths of years, and the fiftieth year a jubilee. Then another forty-nine years and a jubilee. The supposed cycles of seven is a creature of his own imagination.

But Mr. Thurman's chronological system is based to a considerable extent on his system of jubilees. And having lost as many years in his reckoning as there are fifties in the period from Joshua to us; nearly seventy years are thus lost. But we will allow him to gain forty-nine of them by introducing another jubilee; and still he has a loss of from seventeen to twenty years. We have not made an exact estimate. But if he errs seventeen years, his system is destroyed; for in breaking the links of his chain,

"Tenth or ten thousandth, Breaks the chain alike."

Mr. Thurman has truthfully said that his whole system is so interwoven that any part of it shown to be erroneous, destroys the whole.—Advent Herald.

God's Individual Plan.—No. 9.

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

As the condemnation by Adam introduces the Atonement and the reconciliation through the Atonement by Christ, so the reconciliation introduces the justification. Justification is the opposite of condemnation. This is the act of declaring anything unrighteous; while that is the act of declaring anything righteous. As condemnation carries us into death, it is evident that there can be no escape into life without the removal of condemnation, which is justification. Hence if there had been no redemptive plan, no justifying scheme, death would have been the eternal extinction of each individual of the entire Adamic genus. There is no salvation without justification. "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life—who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." Rom. v. 10, iv. 25.

The Apostle Paul presents the philosophy of condemnation and justification in parallels. "If by the offence of one [Adam] the many [in Adam] died, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto the many [in Christ]. And not as by one that sinned, is the gift; for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. For if by one man's [Adam's] offence death reigned by one; much more they who receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Therefore as by one offence judgment came upon all men [in Adam] to condemnation [to death]; even so by one righteousness the free gift came upon all men [in Christ] unto justification of life. For as by one man's [Adam's] disobedience the many [in Adam] were made sinners, so by the obedience of one [Jesus Christ] shall the many [in Christ] be made righteous. Moreover, law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; that as sin hath reigned unto death [by Adam unto all in Adam], even so might grace reign through righteousness, unto eternal life, [to all in Christ] by Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. v. 15–21.

Still further to elaborate the Apostle's argument, we offer seven parallels which involve the whole matter. 1. The condemnation is on the animal nature. So the justification is on the spiritual nature. The actions of individuals cannot affect the case on either side. It is a question of nature alone. The law, being spiritual, condemns everything that is not spiritual, and justifies everything that is spiritual. "Great is the mystery of godliness, which was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit." 1 Tim. iii. 16. "But ye are washed but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God," 1 Cor. vi. 11.

2. Adam, as the representative of the animal, was condemned; so Jesus, the last Adam, as the representative of the spiritual, was justified. "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. iii. 17. He "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Heb. iv. 15. "For such an high priest became us, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, ...who is perfected for evermore." vii. 26–28. "We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." 1 John ii. 1.

3. The condemnation is on every one that has the animal nature—hence all men are condemned: so the justification is on every one who has the spiritual nature. Here is the ground of our denial of universal, and affirmation of conditional, justification.

4. Those who have the animal nature get it from the first Adam by animal generation: so those who have the spiritual nature get it from the last Adam by spiritual generation. Here we see the importance of being begotten from above of incorruptible seed by the ever-living Logos of God. "That which is begotten of the flesh is flesh"—fleshly generation produces a fleshly nature—"that which is begotten of the Spirit is spirit—spiritual generation produces a spiritual nature. John iii. This great revelation extinguishes water-fleshology—a word roughly compounded, quite unclassical, but easily interpreted. Let him that readeth understand. "The Logos of God is living, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividassunder of soul and spirit [so that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, although the soul—the animal identity—being separated from the newly begotten child of God, may perish]. Heb. iv. 12. This doctrine of the new nature—the new man—begotten from above of incorruptible seed, we call Samuel. The doctrine of the salvation of the animal nature, we call Agag. Without pretending to the gift of prophecy, we predict that the Logos-sword of Samuel will hew Agag in pieces.

5. We, as animal men, were condemned in our representative, the first Adam, before we were naturally begotten: so, we as spiritual men, were justified in our representative, the last Adam, before we were spiritually begotten. The latter member of this parallel, however, only applies to those who have received the Spirit since the first Advent. Men were begotten again before Christ, just as they have been since, but the mystery was not explained until Christ brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel. Our parallel throws light on Rom. v. 8. "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." So it might be said that while we were yet non-existent, Adam sinned for us.

6. We were condemned in the first Adam, with reference to our condition after natural birth: so we were justified in the last Adam, with reference to our condition after spiritual birth. The first part of this parallel is merely a setting for the second. It is true in itself, but of no importance; whereas the second part is both true and important. It shows the working of justification by faith. The child of God is not born until the resurrection. He is begotten now, "his seed remaineth in him," a new nature is begun, but he is not perfected until Christ, his life, shall appear. As he is now in his embryonic state, he does not know what he shall be, but he waits until the appearance of his Saviour, that he may be like him, and see him as he is. While in this life we are connected with the condemned nature—"the body is dead because of sin;" hence we fail of that absolute perfection which is required by the law. Owing to our imperfect state we groan, waiting for complete redemption. If it were not for the fact that we shall be perfect, the curse of the law would rest upon us. We are not, then, justified at present in ourselves, for the law allows not the slightest imperfection. And here the advocacy of Christ obtains. The spiritual nature of Christ Jesus was put on trial, and found spotless, and he represented us as we shall be after birth. Until then, Christ intercedes for us. "He is able to save evermore all that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." Heb. vii. 25. "If any man sin [through the weakness of the flesh], we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." It is a great error that Christ intercedes for all men; he only intercedes for those who are begotten from above for the future and incorruptible inheritance. Our connection with the spiritual through Christ is the only ground of our present justification—we are justified by faith. Hereafter we shall be justified in fact. Our doctrine gives no encouragement to sin, for "every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." 1 John iii. 3.

7. The death of our animal representative, the first Adam, indicated the lot of all the animal race: so the resurrection of our spiritual representative, the last Adam, indicated the lot of all the spiritual race. In the light of this parallel, 1 Cor. xv. 20–22 must be interpreted. By our connection with both Adams, we both die and live; but all those who, being in Adam, fail to be in Christ also, are as certainly doomed to remain in death as they are to die. "Affliction shall not rise up a second time," but in one stroke, God's executioner—unrelenting death—will destroy them forever. "But God will redeem my soul from the power of sheol, for he shall take me out of it." "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Ps. xlix., 1 Cor. xv.

The Holy Spirit.

"Behold what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us" that he should give unto us the Holy Spirit. For this purpose it was needful that Christ should go away, for if he went not away, the Comforter would not come; so he must leave that little band of brethren to whom he was attached by the strongest ties of love, and whose affections in turn were all swallowed up in him. Yes, the most lovely of all loving circles, that ever this earth witnessed, must be severed in order that the Spirit might come to us. And, O, how important that we should have it. Without it, we should not be reproved of sin, neither could we learn righteousness, or understand the judgments of God. Without it, we could not be baptized into one body; aye, without it, we are miserable indeed; we can do nothing as we ought; know nothing as we ought, or be anything that we ought; for we are left without it to the fickle influence of human reason and wisdom, which is foolishness to him who is truly wise.

By the Spirit the Lord raised Jesus Christ, and will raise us up also, at the last day. By it, the people of God are builded together in a compact body; and time would fail to speak of all its wondrous benefits; and how sadly true that men will turn away from its holy influences and be guided by human influence, even after they have seen their folly. But so it is. They not only disregard its movings upon their own hearts, but, being prepared by this, they go on to do and teach contrary to it, until at last they are prepared to deny it of its most glorious work, even the raising of the dead. And somewhere in their wisdom (or where they are "foaming out their own shame") dam up the inexhaustible fountain of its waters, even "the river of water of life," and conclude that it will cease to flow with the present dispensation, which they fondly anticipate will be accomplished in their own short life; so they are gratified with the thought, that they shall witness not only the besom of destruction that shall destroy the enemies of God, but also the final stop off of all benefits floating from God to man on the river of life.

It is frequently asked, What good does the doctrine of life in Christ do? and I have often felt that I wished to tell some of the good that it did me; it is this: It opened my mind to see the plan of redemption, which God had so wisely devised, carried forward until the Redeemed family—instead of being a "little flock"—"a remnant"—"a few"—shall be a gathering from the four winds, from one part under heaven to the other part under heaven, as recognized by the scriptures, at the setting up of the kingdom. They shall be as the stars of heaven for multitude, and as the sand by the sea shore is innumerable. The goodness of the Lord God of hosts shall perform this. O, my soul does magnify his name, and say, Bless the Lord forever more. This will be done by his Holy Spirit. Amen, even so let it be, good Lord; for so it seemeth good in thy sight.

The denial of the utility of the Holy Spirit was fairly illustrated in the city of M., about a year ago, by one who is held up by the organ of his party (a religious periodical) as a faithful laborer and efficient minister. After preaching a discourse, the intent of which was to persuade his audiance of the benefit of organization, he seemed to think he could bring the thing a little nearer by exhortation, in which he engaged with apparent zeal, and gave utterance to the following very plain expression in reference to former times. After speaking of the humility and power, and love of the church he said:

"As long as we kept humble, and kept the Spirit of God, we got along well enough; but experience has taught us since, that in order to prosper, it is necessary to have some kind of a system." He then cited a number of cases where after they systematised they flourished and increased in numbers. O my soul, my preaching brethren, there is something to be done besides counting noses, if we have stars in the crown of our rejoicing. I could forbear no longer. I thought it a propitious moment to speak a word in vindication of God's insulted Spirit. I did so, to the blessing of my poor soul.

This opens the whole matter of human organization. It is as much (in my mind) as to say, Farewell to the Holy Spirit; if it does not deign to stop with us we will let it know that we can get along quite as well without it; for we can organise and regulate all our members by our articles of organization, and prosper inasmuch as we can increase in numbers; "and so they wrap it up."

It is no marvel with me that men who go with such an influence are prepared to take up the weapons that they once laid down, even the scourge of proscription from which their own backs have smarted. No wonder that Peter, when he saw, in the prophetic glass "many following their pernicious ways," compared them to the loathsomeness of the canine species, and to the filthy habit of the swine.

It is not strange to me that men under such tutors are prepared to meet the argument of the Spirit's quickening the dead, by assumptions like this: "Now, nothing can be farther from the truth than this."

Having lost the spirit of truth, by which (if they ever had it) they were united to Christ, they have become severed from him, and by receiving the spirit of the age, which is selfishness, they have become the members of an harlot, inasmuch as they follow in the steps of their predecessors; and some of them claim the action of churches, which they in former times have repudiated, as a precedent to justify their present position. Alas, I weep for their folly, and my heart-felt prayer is, Lord have mercy. And now, dear brethren, although I wish to say much more, lest I am tedious, allow me to close with Peter's exhortation;

"Beware lest being led away by the error of the wicked, ye fall from your own steadfastness." DANIEL.

Letters and Extracts.

Tidings from Philadelphia.

BR. STORRS:—A new era has occurred in our goodly city of Penn, since the opening of the present year (1865) commencing with the first of January.

The children of "the light" and of "Life in Christ only," have, for the past five years, as you well know, in Philadelphia, been in a scattered condition, because they were shut out by their brethren who differed with them at their former place of worship. But now, after patiently waiting these long years for a change of feeling and action in them to occur, to weld the broken fragments, the good providence of our Heavenly Father has opened the way for us to have a new meeting for the friends of "truth" at one of your old localities, N. E. Corner of 9th and Callowhill Sts., where you often held forth in 1850–51, now fourteen years ago.

Br. Rufus Wendell was with us the first Sunday in January, and inaugurated the meetings, and gave us four good and convincing discourses on the life theme, besides one during the week. Next Sunday after, Br. Charles H. Sutton gave us two discourses. Three following Sundays, W. S. Campbell lucidly magnified the Law of life in Jesus Christ. And now, for the past two Sundays, Br. Joseph T. Curry has continued the theme of "the way, the truth, and the life," in Christ Jesus. It is, as I remarked, a new era for the "scattered flock" in Philadelphia, to have "the truth as it is in Jesus"—as the one only source of a future life—thus freely and fully portrayed, untrammelled by reluctant dissenters, who would permit you—as an old friend, personally,—occasionally to visit them and recall their attention to an unwelcome theme. But now, thank the good Lord, the truth can be made freely and clearly by an unbroken line of representatives of it, speaking of it in all its applications and far reaching conclusions. The working result of which is, a constantly increasing interest and larger attendance of hearers—many of whom are entire strangers; but who are noticed to come again and again. So that we have good reason to hope that soon we shall be necessitated to procure a larger hall, in which to hold meetings as the spring advances: "for the truth is mighty, and it will prevail." All glory be to GOD and the Lamb!

Br. Storrs, you will pardon me, I trust, here, in connection with this hall where we now meet, in alluding to an incidental remark, made by a now sleeping sister in Christ, who, in 1851, after listening to one of your discourses on the "Destruction of the wicked," said, "Br. Storrs will be compelled, by the legitimate following out of his present views, to come to the conclusion, that the wicked dead will have no resurrection; for they, having no interest in Christ, can not be raised, because his Spirit did not dwell in them when they lived." And I could not but recall the prediction; and while our Br. Joseph was speaking, thinking also, that not only Br. Storrs and ourself were now so believing and preaching, but it had so many able co-adjutors, and eager listeners on the precious word of life—eternal life—in the future, only for the righteous, by a resurrection from the dead. Br. George, by the grace of God we move; and, through his blessed Spirit, the world will be moved—does even now move—onward into truth. GOD speed it!

Your brother in Christ's life, JAMES.

From Thos. W. Smith.

WEBSTER CITY, IOWA, Feb. 7, 1865.

Some folks in this mundane sphere think that a woman has no right to preach. But why not, if they are capable of expounding the word of life? The negative on this question must go somewhere beside the book of books to negate the truth that woman's sphere is, wherever she can labor as usefully, and as acceptably as man. There has been a general conversion to the belief in "woman's right to preach," in this section, during the past few weeks; for Sister HENRY, of Bunker Hill, Ill., has been with us dispensing the word of truth to crowded houses.

Woman's no right to preach? In the name of reason, what are such talents as Sr. Henry's for? To bury in drear silence, to waste in story-writing, or lecturing on free-lovism; because some unreflecting souls think Paul forbids their preaching, when he says, "Let your women keep silence in the Churches?" Friend, read on, and reflect; don't draw inferences too hastily.

Not many years ago, somewhere in the East, a female preacher was introduced as "an effectual laborer in the West," and who has helped amazingly in "putting down the non-resurrectionists in the West." Well, this was'nt Sr. Henry. But permit me to introduce her to the readers of the Herald, as one of the most able and successful preachers of the word of life in the West, and who is worthy of the confidence and love of all who look for the soon coming of Jesus, and can convert a hundred to the view of no future life for the ungodly, to one that our giant opposers overthrow.

Sr. Henry reached Alden, Iowa, Sunday, Jan. 22; having been invited by numerous friends. She spoke to crowded houses from Sunday till Thursday night; when, on account of the inclement weather, the meeting was postponed till Saturday morning. Sunday the house was claimed by the Methodists, Congregationalits, and Baptists. Finding that no time could be conveniently obtained, it was put to a vote, whether the house of a friend, that was kindly, offered, should be used, or have no meeting; when the unanimous desire of the people was shown, that the meeting must go on.

The "Alden House" was turned to a Church; four rooms were crowded with attentive listeners; while not more than twenty-five attended the other meetings. The people generally assisted Sr. H. with "material aid."

Sunday night, she spoke on this "present war in the light of scripture." And truly, it was made apparent, that this war is neither "useless or causeless." Many eyes were moist, as our sister in words of touching eloquence, and with graphic clearness, pictured the scenes of cruelty and outraged innocence that came under her observation, and in fact formed part of her own experience in Southern Missouri.

Ah, none but those who have realized the brutalizing power of slavery, and have lost home and friends in defence of freedom, and have been forced to witness scenes that would make angels weep, and powerless to help the injured ones, can paint the system in its proper diabolical colors.

Monday we went to Oakland—but on account of the selfishness of some, who were holding uninteresting meetings, the house in the village could not be obtained; so we had to go to another, about two miles, where a house full of curious hearers was found. Next night the Lyceum had the house at Oakland. Sr. H. was invited to take part, which she agreed to do, and would take the negative of the question, "Is this present war anti-christian?"

After singing, and the reading of the journal, and a speech of ten minutes by a gentleman on the affirmative, Sr. H. spoke amid much applause. As she was about to sit down, the gentleman to follow gave her his time, and a half hour more was spent in able arguments to show that the war is not anti-christian—or against christianity. "Voted her the question."

After preaching once more, we returned to Alden, where Sr. H. spoke twice; and on Sunday we left, in company with Br. Maffit, for Webster City. Here we found the large Hall well filled; and last night many could find no room to sit. Thus far we have been greatly edified, and much benefitted, and think the cause at Alden, and elsewhere, has been greatly strengthened. Many have heard the truth who would not come to hear us, men; and have thereby been warned of the coming of the Son of Man, and the "doom of the ungodly."

There is a class of people who can be reached by female preaching, who cannot be induced to listen to us. True, many come from curiosity; but if they get within shooting distance, there is some chance of hitting some of them. Well, we have written enough this time. Sr. H. has other places to visit in this section yet. She preaches here till Sunday next, then to Fort Dodge.

Yours in hope of life.

From Elizabeth Smith.

Lyons, Iowa, Feb. 12, 1865.

Father Storrs:—It has been a long time since I last wrote to you, but in all that time you have not been forgotten by poor unworthy me. You indeed seem like a father to me; although I never saw your face, except the photograph you so generously sent me.

This world looks very hard on those who have given all for the truth. How little they know how to sympatize with all your sorrows, because you have stood like a rock and steeled your heart against the flatteries of men. They forget in their prejudice that you are but mortal, and that you are still capable of appreciating christian sympathy as you ever were. Never mind, dear father; although those around, for whom you may be laboring and for whom your warm heart may often have gone out in prayer, to your Father, that they might receive the truth which God has revealed in his word, although they, so often may have returned cold looks and harsh treatment, for your earnest endeavors, which may have caused you many an hour of sadness and repelled and withered the tenderest, warmest feelings of your soul, still there is one whose sympathy you have, which is dearer than the whole world. He looks down on you with the greatest love, and is ever ready to strengthen and cheer, all along life's weary pilgrimage; for, He once was a pilgrim, and for our sakes bore the scorn of this wicked world, was forgotten of men, went about doing good, and was once heard to exclaim, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death."

He was a sweet Saviour, was he not? and he loves us all just as tenderly, and feels for all of our infirmities. What a long and blessed rest he has in store for you; how happy we all shall be when we get home; how we shall enjoy one another's company with the Saviour in our midst. It will be a meek and holy throng.

May God bless your grey hairs, and ever give you peace and joy in him, in spite of all the enemy may do to prevent. The kingdom will be a great deal sweeter after giving up all for Christ in this world.

Note by the Editor.—We thank our youthful friend for her kind words. May the Lord preserve her unto life eternal, in Jesus Christ.

From Maria Mathews Weaver.

Br. Storrs;—At present we find our lot cast in Canada. Came here in December. Find the cause of Christ prospering in some places, and spirituality lacking in others. One church that boasts of having had nearly all the ablest advent preachers' labors among them, and of being "well instructed in doctrine," is, with a few exceptions, without life. Prayer meetings have gone down; and Sunday finds most of these intelligent professors at home! If your views of the resurrection had ever been introduced among them, no doubt the cry would be, "The non-resurrection has killed us."

We lost four or five of the November and December Heralds. I am studying on the subject of Redemption, with its intimate points, and hope to "hold fast that which is good."

As for Rev. xx. 5, there is nothing positive as to "the rest of the dead" being the wicked. This text does not fasten like Jno. v. 28, 29. And by the way, I would be gratified if you would explain, through the Herald, Numbers xxiv. 17. Husband procured you one subscriber in Canada, and his paper will probably be read by several to whom your views are new; and we would be glad to know your opinion of the text mentioned.

I await the forthcoming of a pamphlet on the subject of two resurrections, hoping to see all the scriptural arguments on both sides. If it is truth that there is no future life for the impenitent, it is solemn and important truth, and deserves prominence. I can conceive no gloomier condition than to be entirely overlooked by the searching eye of Omnipotence; forgotten like an insignificant blot, utterly exterminated!

I am sorry to see so much variance between those who are looking for the Lord. Am glad I went into the Boston tent last camp-meeting if I did feel as though the Non-resurrectionists would carry me off bodily. I was full of miserable prejudice, but ignorant of it, till listening to the warm exhortations of those whose "hobby" was the love of God. Doubtless some who hold your views are fanatical or extremists. We have them all about us. It is the temperament of the person, and not the doctrine he believes, that drives him too far either way.

The last Herald, Feb. 8th, has a gem in it. It is your sharp hit on tobacco. I do thank the Lord for it. Tobacco and rum in a christian's mouth, every time he feels faint! shame! Br. Gardener's article on conference meetings was right to the point. I can glean some precious things out of the Herald of Life. The Lord bless us with wisdom and grace sufficient for our day.

Danville, C. E., Feb. 14, 1865.

"I will point to Him, but not now; I bless him, but he draws not near; a star shall rise out of Jacob, a man shall spring out of Israel, and shall crush the princes of Moab, and shall spoil all the sons of Seth."

The first half of this verse, probably, points to the Messiah. The last half to some other ruler that should arise in Israel, who should put down the rulers or princes of Moab, and spoil the sons of Seth, or Sheth. This latter work, most likely, was accomplished long before the Christian era.

A Friend in Philadelphia, writes:—I send you one dollar, which I think I received in answer to prayer, and I felt to bless the Lord. I thought to send it to help buy "that horse," but do with it as you think best. May the Lord put in the hearts of them who can give to do so, till the horse is paid for.

[Remark by the Editor:—We have applied it as you desired. In a private letter from Br. Thos. W. Smith, he tells us he used to live in Philadelphia, and heard us preach there, years ago. He speaks of knowing David W. White and others there. We hope Philadelphia will feel free to help one of her sons in his western mission. New York has contributed between $30 and $40 already, and will do something more for him yet.

A. F. Cressy, Shelburn Falls, Mass., writes:—I feel to thank God for the Herald of Life. How it cheers my heart, after the toils of the day, to sit down and peruse its pages. My health is poor, but I am enabled, through the goodness of the Lord to support my little family. How blessed to feel the time is coming when the ills of life will be no more; when war shall cease. I had two brothers and a brother-in-law who went into the army two years ago; but they are all dead. Two of them died in hospitals, the other, my younger brother, fell, pierced with bullets, before Atlanta, Ga., the 24th of July last. Thus died my last and only brother. His dying words were, "Tell my wife, it is well with me." He had long been striving to serve the Lord; and took great pleasure in reading your works. I have afflictions, but sorrow not as those who have no hope.

David H. Baker, Italia, Kansas, writes:—Since my discharge from the army my health has been such as to prevent me from following any employment; and being poor I have not yet been able to send pay for Volume II. of the Herald of Life. If you see fit, you can discontinue it till I can pay for it, which I shall do as soon as possible. The paper is all I desire it to be; but I do not wish to be a bur. then to it. May our heavenly Father furnish us all with wisdom, food and raiment while our trial lasts, and then give us part in his kingdom for his Son's sake, is my prayer.

[Remark by Editor.—We continue your paper: pay when you can, or accept it from the Lord. He will provide. We have not yet done "knocking on" him.

Mrs. Lucy Ann Salter, Young America, Ill., writes:—Last Sept., while on a visit to some friends near you, I was at a meeting in New York City. I had heard something of the second advent views talked of in my own State, but not enough to convince me of the truthfulness of the doctrine of no life out of Christ, or the righteous only will live again. While at meeting in New York, by a friend's request, I subscribed for the Herald of Life for six months, as much out of curiosity, to see its arguments, as anything else; but must say, I am well pleased, and convinced of the truthfulness and force of its arguments with regard to what the Bible teaches, and with the spirited and high tone in which it is written; also with the beauty and harmony of its teachings; according so well with the word of God. Enclosed is $—. Please continue the paper.

A Lady in New Jersey sends money, and writes:—I want the book "Life only in Christ." The rest of the money is for the "Knocker's fund." I am a firm believer in the doctrine you advocate. Thanks to you, for leading me to the light. I see a beauty in the Scriptures now which I never saw before. I sometimes wonder that I did not see the truth sooner, it is so plain the wicked will be destroyed. I like the Herald very much. I should not know how to get along without it.

G. H. Danforth, Norwich, Conn., writes:—Mrs. D. and myself are all alone in this vicinity. I cannot hear of any one in this place that knows any thing about the doctrine; but I have prevailed with a Universalist to read "Bible vs. Tradition," and he is very much interested; and it is reported that he is so afraid of dying that he said, that he had rather go to hell than to be struck out of existence. I have lent my papers, and tried to get some to read; but there does not seem much interest to do it; yet I shall keep trying.

Remark by the Editor.—Those who think there is nothing alarming in the idea of no future life out of Christ, had better become firm believers in the matter first, and they will find there is a more rational and effective alarm in it than in temporary or eternal torment hereafter.

Dr. E. C. Balcom, Bishan, Ohio, writes:—I rejoice to learn that Life only in Christ is as extensive as it is. I had sought for such friends, yet found but few. Since I have read the Herald of Life I learn they are more numerous than I had any hope of. Yet I am here alone, with no one to help me in argument; no books to read, and too poor to buy; yet I must read. Please send me "Bible vs Tradition."

Mrs. R. W. Pierce, Milwaukee, Wis., writes:—There is a good deal being said in our our paper about the future of infants. As far as I can understand, I feel to say with David, "It is well with the child." I think as they do not know what sin is, they must be in harmony with Christ, so that it will be impossible for the grave to keep them; for they have not known sin. If we are to become as little children, in order to be subjects of the kingdom of heaven, we shall meet the little children there. God is just and doeth all things well.

E. M. Kingsbury, Mass., writes:—I am pleased with the Herald of Life; though I have not had the privilege of examining the subject much till I heard Br. Bishop, when he had a discussion with Br. Durfee in Providence. It seems to look as if it must be there is no life out of Christ. I am greatly obliged to the brother who said I could have the paper, as I am alone in the world, and it is quite a comfort to me to have such a privilege granted me, as I am not able to pay for it; but I hope and pray the Lord will reward you for your labor of love towards me.

[The writer of the following wished a sample of the Herald of Life, which we sent, and received this note in return:

Dear Sir:—I received your package of papers with many thanks. I find much interest in reading them; yet I find principles that clashes with my understanding of the resurrection of the saint and sinner; or the good and the bad; the just and the unjust. With my limited information and understanding, I have supposed the teaching of the Bible was plain that there was a resurrection for the good and a resurrection for the evil; and that there must be a "resurrection" before there can be a second death, the final doom of the wicked. My understanding of the few "Heralds of Life," I have received, it advocates no resurrection to the wicked. If so, please explain Acts xxiv. 15; John v. 28–29; xx. 13–15.

My faith in Christ is, that he is the only being that hath eternal life to give; and that it is never possessed by man, only on certain conditions.

If you will publish in the Herald of Life your views on the above passages, and any others that may suggest themselves to your mind, to convince a mind seeking after truth, the writer of this request will feel his mind more confident on the subject.

John N. Waterbury.

[Remark by the Editor.—If our friend will furnish himself with "Life only in Christ" (See Catalogue) he will find all the texts examined to which he refers, and probably all others that may suggest themselves to his mind.

Christ Our Example.

BY B. K. WHITCOMB.

Much is being said in regard to the duty of christians, in this country, at the present day. No subject is more disputed, and yet, to my mind, none so plain. Nearly all the Ministers of the different denominations strive to convince their hearers of their duty in regard to national affairs. But I believe abundant evidence is given, in God's word, that Christ should be our example, and a pattern for all those who would be his disciples in sincerity and in truth.

Some may say, perhaps, Who then can be saved? So they did in our Saviour's day. "Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure; the Lord knoweth them that are his." A great effort is being made to make it appear right for every one, saint or sinner, to take weapons of death and go to the field of battle. Now is this right? Is it in accordance with the teachings of our Saviour who said, "He did not come to destroy the lives of men, but to save them?"

But, says one, We must be subject to the powers that be. But, does being subject, require voluntary action on our part? If so, how far can it be carried? are there no limits? I thing there are. If we have no rule whereby to determine what is right, then, every man's opinion would be his standard. But I have not so learned Christ.

We hear on every side, the call of our country, is the voice of God. And it is urged, as an incentive to action, if you fall in your country's defence, you are nobly doing your duty, and are sure of being saved.

Some may perhaps think it speaking in strong terms, but yet its true, as far as my knowledge extends; and I have had a chance to know some thing about the matter, having been drafted twice, and was subject to the powers that be for six weeks, before they concluded to exempt me. The conclusion we arrive at then is, if this be true, we have a celestial railroad that will give free transportation to all the blood-thirsty characters, as well as christians (if those there be) who may be engaged in crushing the rebellion. But this I do not believe, neither do I think God's word will uphold the position.

That American slavery is a great evil, I always believed; and it is among the many, in which man, left to his own natural inclinations, will indulge. Now, if it be right for christians to take up arms to abolish slavery, why not other evils, and so cleanse the earth from sin before Christ comes? But pray show me in all the teachings of Christ, or his Apostles, where you find any such liberty given, or doctrine taught. Some may seek to evade the point in this manner; say they; We do not believe christians should fight, but they should uphold the President by their sympathy and influence, and perhaps their balot.

But God does not have to behold our works, to determine our character. If our hearts are filled with hatred and revenge, is that like the pattern? Let us see. Jesus says, "My kingdom is not of this world, if my kingdom was of this world, my servants would fight." Again, "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." If we are pilgrims and strangers, and seek a country or a kingdom, we cannot tarry to build up any earthly governments; for they have always been maintained by the sword, and our weapons are not carnal, neither will our feet go that way, if shod with the preperation of the gospel of peace.

Again, says Jesus,—Resist not evil; and if thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirst give him drink." In fact, the teachings of the New Testament are all one way. Then is it hard to know duty in this respect? The grand difficulty is in trying to make God's word teach what it does not. I think it better to submit to God's ways, and be saved by his plan, than to seek to climb up some other way. May the Lord help us to follow Christ our example, and be meek and lowly in heart, that when the Life-giver returns, we may have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom, to go no more out forever.

Corinna, Me.

May Christians Vote and Fight?

On the subject of citizenship and taking up arms to aid the government to suppress this wicked rebellion, I had doubts, and at one time did not see how christians could fight with carnal weapons. But further reflection has somewhat changed or modified my views on this subject.

If we take the position (as most all do who think it wrong to fight) that christians are to have nothing to do with earthly governments, except obedience to just laws, or cheerfully to take the penalty of disobedience to unchristian laws, we must not even identify ourselves with the government by voting. Well now, let us for a moment look at this.

A christian must not vote—a christian then must not take office under the government; or if he holds an office, when converted, he must resign and give place to some other man not a christian. Apply this to the President of the United States. Suppose he accepts office when an unconverted man—he may be a very good and moral man—he may be a very corrupt and wicked man; but if he becomes a christian he must resign and give place to some other unconverted or wicked man. The consequence on that principle is, we never can have a christian ruler, from the President down to the lowest office under him.

Adopt and act upon the principle that a christian is not to take office under the government and the consequence will be, we will have none but wicked rules—no christians to vote. How long would it be before the whole making of the laws and the administration of the laws will be in the hands of, and wholly controlled by the most wicked men in the land.

It is bad enough now; but then the country would speedily be overrun with vice and all manner of wickedness. As long as christians vote so long will there be some salt to preserve the body politic from corruption.

But "Resist not evil"—"if smitten on one cheek turn the other also." Well, so it is, and ought to be in our efforts to extend the gospel. In that work Christ instructed his disciples to "Resist not evil." The gospel is not to be propagated by violence, not even by resistance when we are violently assailed. "My Kingdom," says Christ, "is not of this world, if it were my servants would fight." We are not to force the gospel upon men with the sword; nor are we in that work to oppose force to force. It seems to me, that in these instructions to his disciples, Christ had reference only to the work of spreading the Gospel. But if we make such instruction of universal application, the tendency will be to destroy all social order and government; and invite anarchy and every evil work. O.

Hartford, Conn.

M. Proudhon, the noted socialist and eccentric reformer of the human race, died at Passy [Paris] January 18th. Mr. P. was in the fifty-sixth year of his age. Although at variance with nearly all branches of his party [the democratic] on account of his extravagant doctrines, among which "Property is robbery," is the most remarkable, he was much respected for his integrity, sincerity, and disinterestedness. He fortunately leaves no disciples, and although a powerful intelligence, has been but a passing meteor in the political sky.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head," Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

A Word to Correspondents.

"Each writer is required to state his own views on the topic he takes up, without a direct personal controversy with any other writer in our columns. This course does not restrict liberty of expression, but will save personal feelings."

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance Bible vs. Tradition, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the Herald of Life, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Books and Pamphlets
FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

"THAT'S WHAT'S THE MATTER."

A PARODY, BY T. W. SMITH, V. D. M.

Dedicated to Mrs. N. M. Henry, Bunker Hill, Illinois

What does this excitement mean?
What's now the matter?
The world in great alarm is seen;
What's now the matter?
The statesman wise appear perplexed,
The nations too are greatly vexed,
The people cry, what's coming next?
What's now the matter?

CHORUS—What is the matter, say?
What's now the matter?
Is there not a brighter day?
What, what's the matter?

Darkened clouds are gathering fast;
What's now the matter?
The waves of peace are flowing past;
What's now the matter?
Men leave the plow the sword to wield
And hasten to the tented field,
They say, the country's law to shield;

CHORUS—What's the matter, say? &c.

Nations are reeling to and fro;
What's now the matter?
Like a drunken man they go;
What's now the matter?
Pray what is the answer given,
While the world is death-ward driven,
And with strife, and discord riven?
What's now the matter?

CHORUS—What is the matter, say?

Hear the blinded leaders say,
This now's the matter;
Soon will dawn a better day;
That's what's the matter!
The world is being purified,
Though by fire it must be tried,
Still t'will turn to Him that died,
That's what's the matter.

CHORUS—That is what's the matter now,
That's what's the matter;
All the world with peace shall flow;
That's what's the matter.

The politician too, can tell
What's now the matter;
He can read oppression's knell,
That's what's the matter;
Kings and despots sure must fall;
Liberty must reign o'er all
Who live on this terrestial ball,
That's what's the matter.

CHORUS—That's what's the matter now
That's what's the matter;
Slavery now, we won't allow;
That's what's the matter.

Does the word of God explain
What's now the matter?
Yes, it teaches us most plain
What is the matter,
This but just precedes the day
When the nations must obey
And submit to Jesus sway;
That's what's the matter.

CHORUS—That's what's the matter now;
That's what's the matter;
Rebels there he wont allow;
That's what's the matter.

Men may peace and safety shout,
That wont help the matter:
They know not what they're about;
That's what's the matter.
Dangers thicken all around,
Warnings many still abound,
Soon the trumpet loud will sound;
That's what's the matter.

CHORUS—That's what's the matter now;
That's what's the matter,
All the world to Christ must bow:
That's what's the matter.

ON THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL:

BY THOMAS READ.

It has often been sufficiently proved that the whole nature of man is material, and we might well pass over the discussion of immateriality, till the immaterialists should condescend to define what they term immateriality, in intelligible language. But as many have been misled, and continue in error, by mistaking vague assertions and assumptions for proofs and arguments, we will examine it in connection with the mechanical laws of the human mind.

As immateriality is based upon what Paul calls "a vain philosophy," and metyphysics, and as our argument will be partly philosophical, and partly scriptural, we will, at the outset disclose our views of science. A sound philosophy develops those principles which God has established for the government of the universe, and which, therefore, must always be consistent with his written word. The recognized principles of the philosophy of the present day are demonstrated by direct experiment; and such as will not stand this test, and are not deducible, by fair inference, from the word of God, are very properly discarded. Moreover, we cheerfully concede, that if there be any clearly demonstrated facts, from reason or science, or nature, opposed to the plain teachings of the word of God, it would diminish our confidence in it; because, as all proceed from the same author, all must necessarily agree. But "The words of the Lord are pure words;—as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times;" and "His truth endureth to all generations." We have no fear, then, that the advocates of the "immateriality" and "the natural immortality of the soul," will be able to overturn the word of God.

Remember, our position is, That man has a perfectly organized body, which, with the breath that imparts life, is sufficient for the development of all moral and mental powers, or faculties. That the soul is an essential attribute of the living man; and that man has no immaterial principle or thing, or substance, essence, or natural immortal soul, that can develop any moral or mental powers, or acts, or the powers of life, without a moderately perfect system of bodily organs. We do not say that the soul is material, though we repudiate the idea of its immateriality. We say the manifestations of the soul, of life, of mind, of sight, thought, feeling, love, and envy, and the effects of electricity, sound, heat, and so on, are all alike the effects of physical, or, if it please you, of material causes. We say that the blood is magnetic and electric, and having imbibed oxygen and heat from the air we breathe, becomes instinct with life; "For the blood is the life;" and playing upon the brain, which contains different organs suited to the development of different functions, and upon the nerves, the nerves being modified forms of brain, and the blood thereby produces all the phenomena of mind.

Thought, then, being the effect of a cause, is not absolutely material; but being produced by material organs, and being something of which we can form a definite idea, it can not possibly be immaterial. It can have no existence apart from the causes that produce it. Sound is not material, but as it is occasioned by concussion and vibration communicated to the atmosphere by material agents, it can not be immaterial. The sun and the post are material, but the shadow produced by them is not material. But a shadow or sound are not immaterial, because we can see the one and hear the other. They have no existence independent of their material causes. All these things are tangible. So then, as thought may be perceived, manifested by the countenance, communicated to others by the voice, or spread out on paper, and sent by steam or lightning to the ends of the earth, it can not possibly be immaterial. Thought can no more be produced without the material agents, than a shadow without a substance.

Vision is not material. The inverted image of the object, so admirably diminished by refraction, in passing through the lens of the eye, is painted on the interlacing of the minute arteries and optic nerves, and conveyed by the action of the arterial blood, along the telegraphic-electrical-nerve conductors to the brain, and is there registered by the memory, or excites to other mental, moral or physical action, or passes away unheeded. We say that the diminished image, though caused by the refraction of the rays of light by the eye, is not of itself material; neither is it immaterial. Destroy the beautiful mechanism of the eye, or of the optic nerve, or take away the blood, and sight is destroyed. Thought and vision are alike operations of mind. Destroy the organs of thought and memory, and thought and memory are destroyed. Stop the breath till the blood ceases to circulate and becomes coagulated, and all the organs of mind become dissolved by chemical laws, and become utterly incapacitated to perform their functions, and the man is dead. And thus "his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish." Psa. cxlvi. 4. "Also his love and his hatred, and his envy is now perished." Eccl. ix. 5.

Here, then, is our position proved, alike by Reason, Nature, stubborn facts, and by the word of God. That man is entirely dependent upon his organization for all his thoughts, feelings, sensations, and for all the developments of his soul or life. And now let the advocates for immateriality bring forth their strong reasons.

The creed of the advocates for immateriality may be summed up thus:

1. That man, while on the earth, has a perfectly organized body.

2. That besides his body, man has also a rational soul.

3. That this soul is spiritual, simple, uncompounded, immaterial, indivisible, indissoluble, indestructible, intangible, without exterior or interior surface, is not extended, and can never come into contact with matter.

4. That this soul, from its essential nature is immortal, and independent of the body; and therefore, that it can exercise the functions of life, of the understanding, affections and will, without the concurrence of the body, and does indeed perform these functions, while the body is mouldering in the dust.

5. That these souls continue in a state of conscious enjoyment or suffering, between death and the resurrection; the good going to paradise or heaven, where Christ is, and the wicked to hell.

6. That the resurrection refers only to the body, the soul having never died.

7. That the wicked, as well as the righteous, from the necessity of their own immaterial natures, will live for ever.

The position we assume, conflicts with the words "besides" and "also," in the second article, as implying independent rationality; and with the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles.

The reflecting will readily perceive, that notwithstanding the grand flourish of terms, but one word, "immateriality," supports the whole weight of the position to which we object. Strike out that one word, and the whole fabric falls to nought, crushed by its own weight.

And now, gentlemen, where are your proofs? From nature, none; for all nature is material. From reason, none; for reason can not possibly be made to comprehend even the very existence of immateriality. And from revelation, none; for that emphatically declares, that man is dust, and that his mind is carnal. You assume that matter cannot possess life, or consciousness. We prove that matter is organized by God for this very purpose. Suppose I were to assume that matter could not possess the power of gravitation, because I cannot comprehend it. But if we throw a stone up, it falls, and what becomes of my assumption. It had been better for science, better for religion, and better for truth, if these gratuitous assertions had never been made.

Let us examine some of these high sounding words. If "the soul be simple and uncompounded," how did God compound it, or make it to possess so many parts as will, consciousness, love, and so on? If reason, will, and the affections, are more than one, then it is compounded. If simple and uncompounded, it cannot be different in different individuals, and different and more extensive in man than in beasts. But it is different and more complex (compound) in the one than in the other; man having several mental or moral faculties that beasts have not. If it be indivisible, how can man be divested of a part, his memory or his imagination, and yet possess his will and consciousness? How can he be partly deranged, and at the same time rational on some subjects? If each part separately may become diseased, deranged, lost, or destroyed, the whole can most assuredly be destroyed. If indivisible, how can it be propagated from father to son and transmitted to posterity? It must be the one soul in the whole, or it is divided. If no exterior or interior at surface, it can have no locality And if it cannot come into contact with matter, of course it cannot be in man, and can not possibly influence the man or his body in any way! And were there such a thing as an "immaterial soul," it would neither add to, nor detract from the otherwise perfectly formed man.

And may we not, therefore, conclude, that of all created things, that which is immaterial, not resulting from material agencies, not consisting of matter, nor any way affecting or being affected by it, nor consisting of anything, is nothing, a blank in nature? It is assumed that the soul is immaterial, and hence indestructible, and therefore immortal. We concede, that that which is immaterial is nothing, and can not be made less than nothing, and therefore can not be destroyed. Immortal nothingness is about as bad as annihilation, a term so often used by "immortal-soulists," who cannot afford to deal fairly with the arguments of their opponents. They affirm that man has an immaterial soul that can live, think and be happy, independently of his organization. On the contrary, we affirm that man has a living soul, so dependent on the organization of the body that when that is destroyed the soul is unconscious, dead. The destruction of the organization, causing the death of the soul, they are pleased, improperly, to call annihilation. We will compare the two terms, immateriality and annihilation. The one is nothing, as we have already proved, and continues nothing for ever; the other was some thing, but if annihilated, it is reduced to nothing; that is, it is made immaterial, gentle reader, and continues immaterial for ever. So that the "annihilated soul" and the "immaterial soul" have embraced each other; both alike have become immaterial and immortal nothingness!

We have heard of a certain philosopher who denied the existence of progressive motion. For, said he, a thing must either move where it is, or where it is not, and both propositions are equally absurd. We commend this logic to the consideration of the immaterialists, for surely

"They have given to airy nothingness,
A local habitation and a name."

If in opposing it we have been beating the air, ye have compelled us, for we cannot allow error to entrench itself behind these metaphysical subtleties. May every disciple of Christ forsake the shadowy foundation of immateriality and inherent immortality, and hereafter base his hopes of everlasting life upon faith producing obedience to all the commandments of Him, who by the sacrifice of himself, having redeemed our souls from the power of the grave, raiseth the dead, and quickeneth whom he will; and thus glorify God in the person of his Son.

DOUBTING AND BELIEVING.

The great tragedy had been enacted. In rapid succession the different acts of the drama had been performed. Jesus had been taken into custody by his relentless foes. Accusations—trifling, groundless, malicious accusations, had been brought against him. In Pilate's judgment hall a mock trial had taken place; and though the Roman governor manifested in various ways a desire to show clemency, and deliver Christ from the hands of his persecutors, he was at length frightened into acquiescence. Washing his hands before the clamorous and vindictive crew, saying, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person," he timidly yielded to their wishes, and delivered Jesus into their hands to be crucified. The scourgings, the mockings, the insults, had all been meekly endured by the Lord of Life and glory. The crown of thorns, prepared in malice and envy, had been rudely thrust upon his head; in cruel mockery the sour and bitter draught had been put to his parched lips; the nails had been driven through his hands and feet, thus fastening him in an excessively painful manner to the cross! The "cup" which he had prayed might pass from him, if consistent with the Father's will, had been drained. The incomparably sweet and holy words of prayer on behalf of his persecutors and murders had gone heavenward from the depths of his earnest and loving soul—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." And now the bitterness of death was past; and the body of Jesus, prepared by friendly hands for burial, had been carefully laid in the garden-sepulchre, and a great stone rolled to the door thereof. Moreover, at the special request of the Jews, fearing, as they affirmed, that the disciples would steal the body away, and thus it should be reported that he had risen from the dead, Pilate gave orders that a company of Roman soldiers should for three days and nights guard the tomb. Thus the sepulchre was made sure, the governor's seal was put upon the stone, and the Roman guard ordered to its post of duty.

At this unlooked for and unexpected position of affairs—their leader crucified, dead and buried, the hearts of the disciples grew faint—their courage failed them. Evidently, they had not comprehended Christ in his true character; the full purport of his teachings, and the grand and crowning object of his mission, they had not clearly seen. Their minds, it would seem, were more intently fixed on temporal than on spiritual things. The idea of his resurrection was not a living verity in their souls. Concerning his words on this subject, their minds were confused, bewildered—in a labyrinth of doubts, uncertainty, and unbelief. Very great was their incredulity. After what they had witnessed in the life of Christ; having given ear to his superior moral teachings; having been eye-witnesses of his miracles, it would seem that their unbelief ought not to have been so deeply rooted. But so it was. When the news was communicated to them by the two Marys and the other women who were early at the sepulchre, that Jesus had risen from the dead, they could not credit the strange report; to the stricken and disheartened disciples these words of the overjoyed women seemed merely as idle tales, and they believed them not. This incredulity was common to all the disciples—the minds of the eleven were thoroughly permeated with this belief. Probably they regarded the report of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, as news too good to be true—precisely as many affirm of our holy and blessed faith.

But gradually, before the rumors and strong proofs that were presented to their minds, the stubborn unbelief of the disciples gave way. A short time after the resurrection, on the evening of the first day of the week—our Christian Sabbath—the disciples, with the exception of Thomas, were assembled together, probably for devotional purposes, when Jesus surprised them by his living presence, saying, as he stood in their midst, "Peace be unto you." Suddenly the shadows fled, and light from heaven streamed into their souls. Joyful emotions undoubtedly thrilled every nerve and fiber of their moral and religious being. In the simple yet expressive language of the record, "they were glad when they saw the Lord"—when they knew of a certainty that Jesus lived.

Ought not that memorable evening to have passed pleasantly? Yea, verily. It marked undoubtedly a period in their lives that was never forgotten. With great joy the disciples hastened to communicate with Thomas; they desired that he should know what they knew. "We have seen the Lord!" was their direct and earnest exclamation. But Thomas said, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe." Here was stubborn skepticism, to be sure—no less than an utter disinclination to believe on the testimony of others; a settled determination to accept only the evidence of the senses. There are probably many such unbelievers at the present day; though we can scarcely regard it as either reasonable or satisfactory to occupy such a doubting position. But the evidence required by the unbelieving disciple could in this case be furnished, and was forthcoming. On the following first day evening the disciples were again assembled, and the incredulous Thomas was among them. Again came Jesus into their midst, saying, "Peace be unto you." Addressing Thomas, he said, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing."

The scales fell at once from the unbeliever's eyes; the cloud of incredulity vanished; his doubts were all gone, and the cheering sunlight of faith shone round about him. In language expressive probably of his astonishment, and the deeply stirred emotions of his soul, he cried out—"My Lord and my God!"

Thomas is now fully prepared to enter upon the Christian course and do the work of an evangelist. The well-spring of faith has been opened in his soul. Now he sees with a clearer spiritual vision than ever before. The moral "light of the world" has dawned upon his mind. Now he believes that Jesus is the Christ; that in a high and holy sense he is the Son of God. He sees him now clothed with spiritual power; he contemplates him no longer as a prince in any earthly or temporal sense, but joyfully regards him as the divinely appointed agent or representative by and through whom the moral characteristics of the infinite Father were to be made known to mankind; by whom life and immortality were brought to light; by whom great moral truths were enunciated for the enlightenment and benefit of the human race; by whom glorious spiritual realities were to be brought into the dominion of faith. His views of Christ and Christian doctrine were unquestionably of the most satisfactory kind. No darkness now; no more yielding to sadness and gloom. Light and love and joy predominate in his soul. Faith having taken the place of incredulity, Thomas goes out into the gospel vineyard to perform his duty in teaching the nations, according to his Master's word. He felt that the spiritual Christ would be with him wherever he might go. In Parthia and and India, where Pagan priests held sway, he lifted up the standard of the cross, and preached boldly the name of Jesus. Incurring in some way the displeasure of the Pagan leaders, he fell a victim to their superstition and cruelty. So he lived, faithful to his trust; so he died a martyr to the cause of Christ.

If the incredulity of Thomas was once strong, his faith was afterwards stronger! A significant question arises here: Would this disciple have labored and suffered and died a martyr's death, had he remained doubtful or wavering in his attachment to Christ? No. Had he been lacking in gospel faith, he would not have been the earnest and faithful preacher that he was. The truth is, he believed in Jesus, as the Son of the living God, as the Saviour of the world; and he was therefore strong to labor and suffer, and endure unto the end. Well may we say, "O Lord increase our faith."—Selected.

DON'T BE A GLOOMY CHRISTIAN.

1. Because we have too many of that sort now. Numbers of the disciples are shady, not sunny, have more of November in their countenances than of June. They do not seem happy as Christians, and probably are not. Let there not be added even one more to this number.

2. Because there is every thing to make you a lively, animated, cheerful Christian. You trust you are forgiven and accepted in the Beloved, which is the greatest blessing infinite love could bestow upon you, and that blessed fact should shed a brighter gleam of gladness over all your days of prosperity, and chase away all the gloom of the trials of life. With such a Saviour as you have to love and enjoy, such a home in prospect, such a Comforter as the Holy Ghost, such travelling companions as the saints, and such blessed work to do as that of leading others to read the word of light, it is a shame to hang ones harp on the willow.

3. Gloomy disciples misrepresent religion. A gloomy sinner fairly represents the master he serves and the side he has chosen. But a gloomy Christian makes people believe religion is a gloomy affair, and leads them to believe that they shall have to be gloomy too, if they become religious, all of which is false. He is a proper interpriter of the Christian faith who rejoices in the Lord, and whose joy would not be more than is meet if it should become a "joy unspeakable and full of glory."

4. Gloomy disciples can do very little good. Sinners are not fond of this company, are likely to avoid it. Besides the gloom of such a mind snaps the sinews of all exertion for the good of others. How can such a disciple maintain a cheerful and lively and animated conversation about the glorious things of the kingdom of God, thereby stirring up the souls of sinners to enter into the joy of the Lord? The gloom of the soul implies that all the sin there has not gone out, and of course the lips are sealed, and usefulness is out of the question.

Therefore, let gloom find its victims where it can; but let every disciple of Christ feel that he is born to be the happiest person in the community where here lives—is sacredly bound to be a specimen of the hallowed joyfulness true religion is capable of producing—is bound to let the observing world know that God does "make Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy"—is bound to make it appear that redeeming love can give such sacred peace, holy serenity, and substantial joy, as can not be produced by all that is loved and sought by the followers of the world.

Children's Department.

THE STOLEN BRACELET.

A few years ago, in one of the largest stores in Boston, one cold afternoon, there stood a small, young child. She could not have been more than ten or twelve years of age, and yet there was a look of intense thought on her face, rarely seen in one so young. A close observer would have known by watching the child's face that a struggle of some kind was going on, for various were the emotions manifested. Strange that no one noticed, for the struggle was strong; and as she walked backward and forward, she exhibited more than ordinary emotion. At length she stopped before a box filled with costly bracelets. "No one sees me," said she, and immediately her hand wandered to the box, and hastily slipping one of the bracelets into her pocket, she passed leisurely on. But as soon as the act was done, reflection began its work. "No one sees me—yes, God sees me. He is looking down and knows what I have done," said she; "and besides, I shall never feel right until it is restored, and if I leave the store, perhaps I shall not be able to find it again, and I wish I had never seen it."

And now the bitter thoughts that filled her mind were almost intolerable. At the best, if she was not discovered, she was miserable. Was that a fit return for a father's prayers, a mother's tears? and if she was discovered, thoughts of arrest, imprisonment, and disgrace, haunted her. She who had been instructed in the right way—she who had enjoyed every advantage—what would her father, her mother say, if they knew their little girl was a thief? "Oh! that I had never taken it," said she to herself, over and over again. The bracelet looked fairly hateful to her; but how to return it? But return it she would, and deeply humiliated and ashamed, she went back to the box, and cautiously putting her hand into her pocket, replaced the stolen gem, and with a greatly relieved mind left the store. "That hour decided my after life," said she to a friend a short time since. "If I had yielded that time I should have pursued a life of crime. That was the turning point with me, and I never see a box of bracelets without breathing a prayer of thankfulness that I was saved that time; for since that time I have never had any desire to take any thing belonging to another."

And now, my dear children, learn a lesson from this simple narrative. Strive to resist the first temptation. When temptation of any kind comes, stop and think. Remember that every time you resist temptation you strengthen your ability to do right; while on the contrary every time you yield to temptation you weaken your ability to do right. Remember every time you do wrong, you pave the way for a repitition of the same. Many a poor wretched criminal thinks with pain and sorrow of the time he committed the first offence. Many a poor degraded drunkard looks back with regret to the time he tasted the first drop. Youth is especially the time to form good habits; for habits formed in childhood and youth cling to us through life.

There is a very pretty verse, I learned when quite a child, which I would like you all to learn, and repeat to your mother or older sister:

Now that my journey's just begun,
My road so little trod,
I'll go, before I further run,
And give myself to God.

Do not dear children say, as I have often heard said, "When I am older." You may not live to be much older; the present time is yours, the future is uncertain. None are too young to begin to do right. None are too small. Christ said on one occasion, "Suffer little children to come unto me. . . .for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." So you see that even little children are included in the invitations given to come to Christ. Many are the invitations given to the young, to seek the narrow way that leads to life. May you accept them and follow on in the way pointed out, that you may at last inherit Eternal Life.

PRAYING AND GIVING.

One of our friends keeps a family missionary box, and a little daughter of some six summers was very desirous of putting in her pennies, also, with the rest. Some time after she was saying her evening prayer at her father's knee, when, to his surprise, she hesitated a moment and then added: "Lord, bless my two pennies, for Jesus' sake. Amen." Waiting until she was in bed, he asked his wife, "What made Gracie say that?" and the reply was: "She has prayed thus every night since giving her pennies to the missionary box." May we not believe that the little one's pennies will surely be blessed, and learn from a child the lesson ever to send a prayer with our almsgiving?—Vermont Chronicle.

MAY I STICK TO THEE.

A little boy five years old tried to pick a snail from a rock, but the creature's hold was stronger than his tiny fingers, and he could not get it off. When he prayed that evening he thought of the snail, and said:

"O God, grant that I may stick to thee as the snail stuck to the rock to-day and couldn't be got off."

That was a good prayer. I hope it was answered, and that the noble little fellow was so helped that he did "stick to his Creator." May all my readers stick to their religion too!

MASTER IS WATCHING.

A lad was at work in a field. A man who was at work in an adjoining field said to him:

"You keep very steadily at work."

"Master is watching me," was the reply.

God's eye is ever upon us. He does not watch us with an unkind eye. Far from it. He watches and waits to see if we will not turn from sinning to holiness, that He may bless us. His eye is ever upon us. Let us do nothing, then, that is adapted to displease Him.

TERMS:—Two Dollars a Year; or, 48 numbers; One Dollar FOR SIX MONTHS; or, 24 numbers; invariably in advance. When served by Carrier in New York city, 48 cents additional. Persons sending five new subscribers, with advance pay, will be entitled to a sixth copy for their services.

The Postage on the HERALD OF LIFE, prepaid quarterly or yearly at the office where it is received, is 20 cents a year to any part of the United States. The postage to Canada and the British Provinces is also 20 cents a year, and must be prepaid in New York; for such papers, therefore, the price will be $2 20 a year, or $1 10 for six months.

We can not undertake to prepay postage upon newspapers, except where the law obliges us to do so; that is, any where out of the United States. Anywhere in the United States, the subscriber may just as well pay the postage at his own Post Office, as to send the amount to us, and subject us to the trouble of doing it here. It is far less trouble to the subscriber than to us, and we must absolutely decline doing it for any within the States. Let this be remembered.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ALL LETTERS relating to the HERALD OF LIFE, whether on business or other matter, must invariably be addressed—

ON THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL

BY THOMAS READ.

Besides the other properties of the immaterial soul, it is represented as intangible. We cannot see it, we cannot hear it, we cannot feel it, we can neither smell nor taste it. Indeed it is impossible to form any definite conception of its existence; and as such a being was never thought of, or dreamt of, 250 years ago; nor would it then, if the Scriptures could have been wrested so as to foster the notion of natural immortality, the sooner it is consigned to its former oblivion, the better for religion, for reason, for science, and for the truth of God. Luther Lee says, such is its intangible nature, that matter cannot touch it; and God cannot destroy the soul by an exertion of power upon it! If he meant that the soul is immaterial, and has no separate being, we might perhaps concede, that to destroy such a thing, would involve a contradiction, and therefore it might be impossible. But if he believes that it is a creation of God, then it must be easier to destroy than to create, and God is not only able to destroy the soul, but he says of him that worketh on the day of the atonement, that same soul would he destroy. But Christ says, that God is able to destroy the soul. To which agree the words of the prophets; "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and "He spared not their souls from death." But who are ye, that would limit the Holy One of Israel—that practically deny his omnipotence!

This intangible chimera of immateriality, is worse than the poor man's flea, when he put his hand upon him, behold he was not there. Hamlet's ghost was visible, but this intangible phantom can neither come in contact with you, nor can you come in contact with it. Hence its wonderful facility in evading arguments. But these reasoners upon immateriality, by substituting their vain philosophy for the oracles of God, have at least proved that "the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."

But to make, to create, means to combine; to arrange in order; to mould into form; to organize; to cause to exist. But how can an immaterial soul be made? If it be made, it must be made out of something that did exist before; or out of something that did not exist. If made out of something that did exist, it was altered and endowed with various faculties. It was therefore compounded, not simple, and therefore liable to be altered again, to be dissolved; and therefore it, the created soul, is mortal.

If you say that it was not altered, then we say it was not made, and must have been eternally endowed with reason, will, and the affections, and therefore it cannot be susceptible of change or progress. And thus you arrive at the pagan dogma that all our ideas are reminiscences of something that has occurred in some pre-existing state of being.

Again, if made of something that did exist, would it not be more in accordance with God's customary mode of working, to have at once endowed that something with moral and mental powers, rather than turn that something into nothing, or that some matter, into no matter, thus making it immaterial, and then endow it with moral powers; when for the reception of such endowment it was better adapted in its primitive state? But if you say it was made out of something that did not exist, or called out of blank nothingness; then God added the faculties it now possesses, and therefore these faculties can be taken away. A man may become deficient of memory, sight, or even consciousness, and if any one part of the immaterial soul can be lost, all may be lost, the whole consigned to blank nothingness again, and so immateriality does not confer immortality.

The beasts too have living souls, and as beasts think, choose, and love, according to the immaterialist's mode of reasoning, they too have immaterial souls, and are immortal. We cannot allow you to shrink away from this conclusion, unless you abandon the idea of immateriality altogether. But some affirm that the "immaterial soul is a part of the Deity;" which involves the idea that God is divided, a part of God sins, and a part of God is cast into hell. Thus immateriality and blasphemy are very nearly allied. Father forgive them, for they know not what they say.

Three of the attributes which God claims exclusively for himself, are Invisibility, Immortality, and Immutability. All of these the immaterialists claim for the human soul. "I have said ye are gods....but ye shall die like men."

Such are some of the difficulties, contradictions, and absurdities, which naturally grow out of the unphilosophical and unscriptural doctrine, of the immateriality of the human soul. And thus it is proved to be the legitimate daughter of the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth, who in this doctrine has caused all nations to drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, denying that Christ is our life, and deifying the human soul. Is not this doctrine justly entitled to be branded on the forehead with the name MYSTERY?

We think that it may safely be asserted that nine-tenths of those who believe in the natural immortality of the human soul, are practically and truly materialists. They believe that the soul, when it leaves the body, assumes a sort of etherial body, or spiritual body, or some say, a body of light. The legitimate conclusion from which is, that the resurrection is past already, and they need not look forward for another resurrection. Indeed, this class think and speak very lightly of the resurrection. The Bible records but two states—this world, and the world to come; and but two bodies, the present animal body, or soul-body; and the resurrection-body, or spirit-body. Such believers are affectionately implored to come back to their bibles, lest their enemies should appropriately class them with Professor Bush, A. J. Davis, or Emanuel Swedenborg.

Indeed the only remedy for these fanciful fables, is to admit the scriptural exposition, that the whole compound nature of man was formed of the dust of the ground, with nothing super-added to the perfect organization, but breath to cause it to live. That the soul cannot originate a single indea, nor hold any intercourse with external nature, independently of the bodily organs.

In opposition to this simple and uncompounded phantom of immateriality, we find that every thing in the vegetable and intellectual world, from the lowest vegetable in nature, up to the hightest created intelligence, is material, and is organized. And as a general rule, the more complicated and diversified the organization, the more numerous and higher the functions and developments. That "man is much better than the fowls," because he has a superior organization, giving him a superior nature. Dust, in its primitive particles, is undoubtedly more simple and uncompounded, than the living body; but is it better fitted to develop mind, and glorify God? Indeed the body, by chemical analysis, can almost be brought back to its simple and uncompounded state. Does this improve it? Away then with such terms, as implying superior excellence.

All that God has made, of which the finite mind can form any adequate conception, is made of matter; and there is a beautiful gradation running upwards from the inanimate vegetable to the angels of God who do his pleasure, hearkening unto the voice of his word.

Amid the wild and varied exuberance of nature we find no waste of power, no waste of skill. In all organized beings, every organ, every function that we can fully trace, and fully comprehend, has its appropriate use; and is admirably adapted to promote the progressive perfection of the the creature. We are so accustomed to the beauties of nature, and the skill manifested by the Divine Author, that we cease to be astonished, when the tree, deprived of its vesture and apparently of its life, by the wintry blast, becomes animated by the balmy breath of spring, and puts on its beautiful foliage; then the blossom, and after that the ripened fruit. Nothing superfluous, nothing deficient. Why does the tree put forth its leaves, inhaling carbon and exhaling oxygen?

Because God has endowed it, material as it is, with these faculties, and these are necessary to its growth and production. What mean these lovely blossoms that so sweetly manifest the wisdom and goodness of God? and are so admirably calculated to call forth our admiration. They toil not, they spin not; yet Solomon in all of his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

But why so fragrant, so beautiful, so attractive? Because God hath made it necessary for the perfection of the fruit and seed, that the pollen dust should be carried from the anther of the one to the pistil of the other; and the insects, while following their natural instincts, attracted by their loveliness, sip the nectar for themselves, and carry the pollen dust from flower to flower, to perfect the embryo fruit. Whence this diversity and whence this perfection? All from the perfection of their organization. Again if we slip a scion from one tree, and ingraft it into the branch of another, the same identical sap that would have produced one species of fruit; passing through another system of tubes, and fibres, produces an entirely different fruit from the other branches. Why is this? The difference in the organization of the scion from that of the supporting stem has produced the different result.

Ascending the scale, we find beings more highly organized, and endowed with higher capacities, into whose nostrils has been breathed the breath of life, and hence they have become living souls which are flying in the atmosphere; gliding in the streams; and moving upon the face of the earth. What do we now find? More complicated and admirable organizations; developing the superior powers of life, will, sight, hearing, instinct, and indeed almost all the phenomena of the human mind. And if they have less of reason than their nobler masters, they possess more instinct, more acuteness of vision and hearing, and in many respects a stronger and more enduring muscular fibre. Still all is material. The heat, the light, the air, and the electricity, that cause their several organs to develop their functions; all, all, are material, and the more complex and intricate their organs, the greater their perfection. Without the organs of mind and sense, there can be no development of mind and sense. So true is this, that indeed the peculiar characteristics of the mind of an animal, can be learned even from the external features; particularly from the relative size and situation of the volume of the brain. The science of phrenology is an induction from these facts; and is wholly based upon the materiality of the organs of the soul. As soon as these organs are dissolved, or materially deranged, their appropriate functions necessarily cease. This ought not to be the case, if there were a principle, an abstract "immortal and immaterial soul," that could develop the powers of life without organization. But if there be no such principle—and there certainly is none—then shines the wisdom and power of God conspicuously in the construction of the living organism. But if there could be such an "immortal, independent, immaterial principle," then for all the purposes of life and happiness, their fearfully and wonderfully wrought frames would be superfluous. "Shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?"

We ascend now to the nobler creature, man. Formed by the same hand; moulded of the same materials, the dust of the earth; animated by the same spirit of the breath of lives; in what consists the superiority or difference between him and the beasts of the field?

1. God has given to man a more complicated and diversified organization; which imparts to him more numerous, and superior faculties; a superior mind.

2. He has the gift of speech, and was created in the image of God.

3. He has a moral nature, and therefore responsible and accountable. A subject of praise and blame; of reward and punishment. He is a being for whom the Son of God has died, a candidate for immortality. He may be raised from the dead at the second coming of Christ.

He resembles the animals in these particulars.

Both are material—both are mortal—both have living souls—both have spirits—

And both alike are entirely dependent upon their organization for all their mental phenomena. Although there is a great difference in these three great natural organized orders of nature; and they are widely separated from each other as a class; yet they meet and overlap at their extremities: so that the highest of the vegetable class, is superior to the brute; and the highest of the brute is superior to the lowest of men. And pray where in the series does immateriality and immortality begin, and where is the dividing line? As they cannot be predicated of the one, so they cannot be predicated of the other.

LUTHER LEE ON THE DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

In Mr. Lee's article No. 21, he professes to meet "the assumption," as he is pleased to call it, "that the word destruction means annihilation, or loss of conscious existence." With what success he has done this, remains to be seen.

The principal text examined by Mr. Lee in this article, is 2 Thess. i. 9. "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power."

Upon the word destruction, he remarks, it "does not necessarily mean loss of existence." I would ask Mr. Lee, if it necessarily means any thing? And, if it do, what is it? Does it necessarily mean eternal torments? I affirm it necessarily carries along with it its primary meaning; and that, therefore, when applied to the final destiny of men, it necessarily means loss of existence, or loss of life.

Mr. Lee has given the definitions of lexicographers, one of which is perdition. The Greek is apoleian, which is another form of apoluo, and signifies, among other things, to dismiss from life, permit to die. Olethros is derived from the verb oleo, and so are the words apolluo and apollumi also derived from oleo; so that the meaning and force of olethros is found in the word perdition, and the force of perdition is found in apolluo, which signifies to be destroyed, to perish, to render vain, to bring to nought. While, therefore, the text might be rendered—"Who shall be punished with everlasting perdition," or "everlasting ruin," it could not be rendered "everlasting misery" without discarding its primary meaning.

2. The word tribulation, in the 6th verse, is not the same punishment, as that in the 9th, as Mr. Lee has asserted. He also says that "the word everlasting cannot well be applied to any term denoting annihilation." This is an assumption, and a fallacy. For, first, the word annihilation does not express the condition of the destroyed They are not annihilated. And I cannot help thinking, that Mr. Lee has selected this word for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of his readers, lest they should see the nakedness of his arguments.

But why cannot the word everlasting be applied to destruction? If a thing be destroyed without the possibility of restoration, why may it not be termed everlasting? The word everlasting adds force to the term destruction—a force which is irresistible to you. It shows that it is no temporary destruction which may be repaired, but a never-ending perdition. The word destruction signifies disorganization, and the term everlasting prefixed indicates its eternal duration. What an abuse of all logic—all reason, and common sense! According to your argument, the words eternal, everlasting, and immortal, should never be applied to God! He is self-existent, and the word everlasting can add no force when applied to him. Of course the term everlasting implies that there may be a destruction which is not everlasting, and I will give you an instance; but this is not to "abandon the argument founded on the meaning of the term."

"O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help," is an example in point. This destruction is not everlasting.

Mr. Lee remarks, that "God himself cannot restore a person thus destroyed." As a question of power, God could restore even that which he had annihilated, much more could he restore that which was resolved into its original elements. But he wills not to do it, and therefore the destruction is everlasting.

3. Mr. Lee argues that "the nature of this punishment called destruction, proves it not to be annihilation." This is a very singular sentence, and reads, when divested of its mysticism, "The nature of this punishment called destruction, proves it not to be destruction!" The punishment is destruction, this is its nature; and yet its nature proves it not to be destruction! Really! Mr. Lee is a logician!

Mr. Lee continues—"It consists in being banished from the presence of the Lord," &c. Not "banished," Mr. Lee, but "punished." Why substitute the word banishment, for punishment? The truth is better expressed without your glosses. The punishment is destruction; and the destruction shuts them out from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power. What can be plainer? The everlasting destruction, then, is not a banishment from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power, as Mr. Lee asserts; but a punishment consisting in destruction.

4. Mr. Lee introduces several passages for the purpose of showing the use of the word in other senses. His first text, Hosea xiii. 9, is a politico-ecclesiastical destruction, which is a metaphorical use of the word. He quotes 1 Cor. i. 19, where it signifies to render vain, or bring to nothing, the wisdom of the wise. He also refers to Rom. iii. 16, where he says, "destruction means ruin or perdition." Very well. He quotes Matt. xii. 13, where destruction is used to express the destiny of the wicked; he says—"it means to ruin or perdition." All right.

He refers to Luke xvii. 27, where it is used to express the destruction by the flood. In Acts ix. 21, where it is used to imply physical death. And to Matt. v. 17, where it is used analogically to signify abrogation. Thus we have its literal and metaphorical use before us, and the reader can judge of their import.

Mr. Lee has certainly failed to prove, that the word destruction, when applied to the destiny of the wicked, does not signify absolute destruction, or perishing. Our position remains just as it was before he discharged his artillery.

1. In Mr. Lee's article, No. 22, which is his last effort, he offers a "reply to the assumption" as he terms it, "that the word perish signifies annihilation."

He says "the words perish, perished, perisheth," are "nowhere used to describe or express the quality of the punishment of sin." This is a grand assumption. These words not only express the certainty but the nature of the sinner's punishment, as we shall see. Indeed the very passages he has quoted afford proof of this. "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii. 3. Pilate had mingled the blood of the Galatians with their sacrifices; and the tower in Siloam fell and destroyed eighteen persons: they perished; and Jesus said—"Except ye repent, ye shall likewise perish," or in like manner, "perish," die—come to nought.

The text in John iii. 15, 16, presents us with the word "perish" undeniably expressive of the destiny of the world, apart from the gift of Christ; and it fully expresses the destiny of those, who will not come to Christ that they may have life.

And in Rom. ii. 12, the word perish is used in the same sense. So also 1 Cor. xv. 18; 2 Pet. ii. 12, and Jude 2. Pe. says "shall utterly perish in their own corruption." McKnight, if anything, makes it stronger, when he renders it "by their own corruption," for this expresses the cause of perishing.

2. The original words remain to be examined in this place. Apolluo and apollumi, from the word Oleo, signify to destroy, kill; and, intransitively, to be destroyed, perish; to put to death, render vain to bring to nought. Apolluo, from uso, and compounded of apo and luo, signifies to loose, to send away, dismiss from life, permit to die.

"If the candid reader can see no certain proof" of destruction here, he must be blinded or greatly infatuated with an antiquated theory.

Mr. Lee blunders seriously over Cor. xv. 18. Does he really believe, that, if Christ had not risen, those who had fallen asleep in him would have suffered eternal misery? If so, I envy him not.

Mr. Lee's "illustrations" so far from proving that perish does not mean loss of conscious being, fully sustains this position. "Lord, save us, we perish." "Here perishing means only death by drowning," says Mr. Lee Very well, it means death. Chap. ix. 17. "The bottles perish." "Here," he says, "to perish is to be rendered useless or worthless." Very well. Luke xiii. 33. "It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." "Here to perish is to die, or be put to death," says Mr. Lee. All is well. Chap. xv. 17. "I perish with hunger." "Here perishing," says Mr. Lee, "means to die of hunger." All right again.

Mr. Lee also refers to Eccles. vii. 15: Isa. lvii. 1: Jer. ix. 12, in the first two instances it means death, in a literal sense; and, in the last, desolation.

Speaking of 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18, he says the "Apostle makes the virtue of the atonement depend upon the fact of the resurrection of Christ," &c. This may be true; for if Christ had remained among the dead, or under the dominion of death, there would have been "no profit in his blood." This the Psalmist teaches.

And, just at this point, having finished my review of Mr. Lee's last effort, I will make a few remarks on the death of Christ.

Did he die as a substitute? If so, he paid the penalty of the divine law, and God can have no further demand upon the race. If Christ died to save men from death, then none should ever die; but death is the common lot of all, and, therefore Christ did not die as a substitute in this sense. Neither did he die to save men from a second death, for Adam was not exposed to but one death; and the penalty of the law is one death, not two.

In whatever sense Christ died as a substitute, in that sense mankind will never suffer the penalty of the law; and, if in no sense he died as a substitute, then, unless men avail themselves of the redemption in Christ, they will perish in, and by, their own corruption, and remain under the dominion of death forever.

That the term perish means what we have previously defined it to mean, we have the following additional testimony: "If" God "should set his heart upon man, if he should gather to himself his spirit and his breath; all flesh would perish together, and man would turn again to dust." Job. xxxiv. 14, 15. Again, "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent." 1. Cor. x. 19. And so, also, "the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness."

HOMO.

CHRONOLOGY AND HISTORY.

Historians and chronologists are anything but united on the exact time of many important events which are necessary to define with accuracy the time of the beginning or ending of most of those periods. The chronology of some of the events noted in the scriptures is based upon these conflicting and discordant materials; and too much reliance upon profane chronology and popular mistakes as to the reigning king of the times in which the scripture event happened, has led into great errors in the interpretation of the prophecies. This, we conceive, is especially the case with Daniel ix.

Let us take a view of the generally received chronology in the Bible in a few particulars. The chronology put against Ezra i. 1, or the Decree of Cyrus, is B. C. 536. Haggai i. commences with the second year of Darius, and the chronology is put down at 520 B. C., when the house of God or temple was put forward to its completion by Haggai and Zerubbabel at God's command; that is, just sixteen years after the decree of Cyrus; and Ezra vi. 15, tells us "this house was finished in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king:" that is, according to the common received chronology, within twenty-one years after Cyrus' decree; and yet, strange to tell, commentators and chronologists have fixed upon the decree of Artaxerxes, II., B. C. 457, or fifty-eight years after the temple was finished, according to their chronology, as the commandment that went forth to restore and build Jerusalem! Also, according to their chronology of Dan. ix. B. C. 538, the "seventy years desolation of Jerusalem" (ending at that time, Dan. ix. 2,) ended eighty-one years before the commandment went forth to restore and build Jeruealem, i. e., if 457 B. C. is the true point from which to reckon that commandment; and Daniel must have been dead at least seventy-five years before Ezra went up to restore Jerusalem!

It has seemed to be taken for granted that the Darius of Dan. ix. is the same as the Darius who took Babylon. From a careful examination of the subject, we are fully satisfied this is a great mistake. In consequence of this mistake, that chapter has been thrust in between the 8th and 10th chapters, and thus led to inextricable confusion all who have based their calculations upon that theory.

Daniel, himself, if carefully examined, shows that these Dariuses were two different and distinct persons. Chapter v. 31, tells us, "Darius the Median took the kingdom;" the 9th chapter says, "In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes." The Scriptures give us the Ahasuerus as the husband of Esther, Esther ii. 16, and the chronology in the margin of our Bible gives this event B. C. 462. Artaxerxes I. reigned between Cyrus and Darius king of Persia, "son of Ahasuerus." Any one must be satisfied of this, we think, who, with an unprejudiced mind, carefully reads Ezra iv. Artaxerxes I. died B. C. 424. See Taylor's Manual of History, p. 66. Says Taylor—"On the death of Artaxerxes, his only legitimate son, Xerxes, ascended the throne; but within forty-five days was murdered by his natural brother, Sogdianus; and he again was deposed by another illegitimate prince, Ochus, who, on his accession, took the name of Darius II." This king was surnamed Nothus, that is, illegitimate. He was called illegitimate because the son of Ahasuerus, most likely born of Esther, a Jewess, and therefore would be accounted as not legitimately heir to the throne of Persia. It seems to us clear that Darius Nothus is the Darius of Daniel ix., and he came to that throne about 424 B. C., instead of B. C. 538, as would seem by the chronology now found in the margin of the Bible. If this be so, then all the other chronologcal dates in the margin of the Book of Daniel are equally erroneous.

Darius Nothus reigned at a latter period than Cyrus (whose Persian name is Coresh,) king of Persia. The communication, therefore, made to Daniel, chap. ix., was at a later period than that of the 10th, 11th, and 12th chapters; and its chronological position in the Book of Daniel is after the 12th chapter. Darius Nothus, or "Darius the son of Ahasuerus," is the same, we judge, as Ezra's "Darius king of Persia," Ez. iv. 5; and cannot therefore be identical with "Darius the Median," but corresponds with the Darius of Haggai i. 1, and Zech. i. 1; and what further confirms this idea is, that in the "second year" of this Darius, the seventy years indignation of the Lord against Jerusalem ceased. See Zech. i. 1, 12. The seventy years' indignation which the angel here declared was completed, in the second year of Darius, is identical with the seventy years' desolations which were terminating in "the first year of Darius, son of Ahasuerus;" for the desolations ceased when the work of rebuilding the temple had such a putting forward as resulted in its completion; that was from the "second year of Darius, king of Persia." See Ezra iv. 24, and v. 1–2; therefore, it follows conclusively that Darius the son of Ahasuerus, (Dan. ix. 1,) is the same as the Darius of Ezra, Haggai, and Zechariah; and hence reigned at a later period than the Scripture Cyrus (Coresh,) king of Persia, and king of Babylon, and therefore was not "Darius the Median," who reigned before Cyrus. If these things are so, it follows that the chronology relied on in fixing the dates of the prophetic periods is erroneous, and will forever delude those who follow it.

Again, as Cyrus reigned before Darius Nothus, or "Darius son of Ahasuerus," and as Daniel's seventy weeks, seven week, and sixty-two weeks, were given him under this latter king, it follows that the decree of Cyrus, to restore and build Jerusalem, was previous to the 9th chapter of Daniel; and it is abundantly evident that the decree of Cyrus, and not that of Artaxerxes, is the decree spoken of by Gabriel to Daniel. This we know will be startling to some who have labored to make the generally received chronology harmonize with the facts in history and prophecy; and yet it is demonstration, to our mind, that the decree of Cyrus is the decree of which Gabriel speaks, Dan. ix.

Let us turn to Isa. xliv. 28, and we shall see what the Lord saith concerning Cyrus. "Cyrus is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem, thou shalt be built, and to the Temple, thy foundation shalt be laid." This language exactly tallies with Gabriel's annunciation—"Know, also, from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," &c. Here is a distinct reference to some prophecy on the subject; no other prophecy can be found that so exactly corresponds as that which relates to the acts of Cyrus; and if we are correct as to the chronology of Dan. ix. that decree of Cyrus had been issued prior to Gabriel's announcement of the time at which

BY THOMAS READ.

Besides the other properties of the immaterial soul, it is represented as intangible. We cannot see it, we cannot hear it, we cannot feel it, we can neither smell nor taste it. Indeed it is impossible to form any definite conception of its existence; and as such a being was never thought of, or dreamt of, 250 years ago; nor would it then, if the Scriptures could have been wrested so as to foster the notion of natural immortality, the sooner it is consigned to its former oblivion, the better for religion, for reason, for science, and for the truth of God. Luther Lee says, such is its intangible nature, that matter cannot touch it; and God cannot destroy the soul by an exertion of power upon it! If he meant that the soul is immaterial, and has no separate being, we might perhaps concede, that to destroy such a thing, would involve a contradiction, and therefore it might be impossible. But if he believes that it is a creation of God, then it must be easier to destroy than to create, and God is not only able to destroy the soul, but he says of him that worketh on the day of the atonement, that same soul would he destroy. But Christ says, that God is able to destroy the soul. To which agree the words of the prophets; "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and "He spared not their souls from death." But who are ye, that would limit the Holy One of Israel—that practically deny his omnipotence!

This intangible chimera of immateriality, is worse than the poor man's flea, when he put his hand upon him, behold he was not there. Hamlet's ghost was visible, but this intangible phantom can neither come in contact with you, nor can you come in contact with it. Hence its wonderful facility in evading arguments. But these reasoners upon immateriality, by substituting their vain philosophy for the oracles of God, have at least proved that "the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."

But to make, to create, means to combine; to arrange in order; to mould into form; to organize; to cause to exist. But how can an immaterial soul be made? If it be made, it must be made out of something that did exist before; or out of something that did not exist. If made out of something that did exist, it was altered and endowed with various faculties. It was therefore compounded, not simple, and therefore liable to be altered again, to be dissolved; and therefore it, the created soul, is mortal.

If you say that it was not altered, then we say it was not made, and must have been eternally endowed with reason, will, and the affections, and therefore it cannot be susceptible of change or progress. And thus you arrive at the pagan dogma that all our ideas are reminiscences of something that has occurred in some pre-existing state of being.

Again, if made of something that did exist, would it not be more in accordance with God's customary mode of working, to have at once endowed that something with moral and mental powers, rather than turn that something into nothing, or that some matter, into no matter, thus making it immaterial, and then endow it with moral powers; when for the reception of such endowment it was better adapted in its primitive state? But if you say it was made out of something that did not exist, or called out of blank nothingness; then God added the faculties it now possesses, and therefore these faculties can be taken away. A man may become deficient of memory, sight, or even consciousness, and if any one part of the immaterial soul can be lost, all may be lost, the whole consigned to blank nothingness again, and so immateriality does not confer immortality.

The beasts too have living souls, and as beasts think, choose, and love, according to the immaterialist's mode of reasoning, they too have immaterial souls, and are immortal. We cannot allow you to shrink away from this conclusion, unless you abandon the idea of immateriality altogether. But some affirm that the "immaterial soul is a part of the Deity;" which involves the idea that God is divided, a part of God sins, and a part of God is cast into hell. Thus immateriality and blasphemy are very nearly allied. Father forgive them, for they know not what they say.

Three of the attributes which God claims exclusively for himself, are Invisibility, Immortality, and Immutability. All of these the immaterialists claim for the human soul. "I have said ye are gods . . . . but ye shall die like men."

Such are some of the difficulties, contradictions, and absurdities, which naturally grow out of the unphilosophical and unscriptural doctrine, of the immateriality of the human soul. And thus it is proved to be the legitimate daughter of the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth, who in this doctrine has caused all nations to drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, denying that Christ is our life, and deifying the human soul. Is not this doctrine justly entitled to be branded on the forehead with the name MYSTERY?

We think that it may safely be asserted that nine-tenths of those who believe in the natural immortality of the human soul, are practically and truly materialists. They believe that the soul, when it leaves the body, assumes a sort of etherial body, or spiritual body, or some say, a body of light. The legitimate conclusion from which is, that the resurrection is past already, and they need not look forward for another resurrection. Indeed, this class think and speak very lightly of the resurrection. The Bible records but two states—this world, and the world to come; and but two bodies, the present animal body, or soul-body; and the resurrection-body, or spirit-body. Such believers are affectionately implored to come back to their bibles, lest their enemies should appropriately class them with Professor Bush, A. J. Davis, or Emanuel Swedenborg.

Indeed the only remedy for these fanciful fables, is to admit the scriptural exposition, that the whole compound nature of man was formed of the dust of the ground, with nothing super-added to the perfect organization, but breath to cause it to live. That the soul cannot originate a single indea, nor hold any intercourse with external nature, independently of the bodily organs.

In opposition to this simple and uncompounded phantom of immateriality, we find that every thing in the vegetable and intellectual world, from the lowest vegetable in nature, up to the hightest created intelligence, is material, and is organized. And as a general rule, the more complicated and diversified the organization, the more numerous and higher the functions and developments. That "man is much better than the fowls," because he has a superior organization, giving him a superior nature. Dust, in its primitive particles, is undoubtedly more simple and uncompounded, than the living body; but is it better fitted to develop mind, and glorify God? Indeed the body, by chemical analysis, can almost be brought back to its simple and uncompounded state. Does this improve it? Away then with such terms, as implying superior excellence.

All that God has made, of which the finite mind can form any adequate conception, is made of matter; and there is a beautiful gradation running upwards from the inanimate vegetable to the angels of God who do his pleasure, hearkening unto the voice of his word.

Amid the wild and varied exuberance of nature we find no waste of power, no waste of skill. In all organized beings, every organ, every function that we can fully trace, and fully comprehend, has its appropriate use; and is admirably adapted to promote the progressive perfection of the the creature. We are so accustomed to the beauties of nature, and the skill manifested by the Divine Author, that we cease to be astonished, when the tree, deprived of its vesture and apparently of its life, by the wintry blast, becomes animated by the balmy breath of spring, and puts on its beautiful foliage; then the blossom, and after that the ripened fruit. Nothing superfluous, nothing deficient. Why does the tree put forth its leaves, inhaling carbon and exhaling oxygen?

Because God has endowed it, material as it is, with these faculties, and these are necessary to its growth and production. What mean these lovely blossoms that so sweetly manifest the wisdom and goodness of God? and are so admirably calculated to call forth our admiration. They toil not, they spin not; yet Solomon in all of his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

But why so fragrant, so beautiful, so attractive? Because God hath made it necessary for the perfection of the fruit and seed, that the pollen dust should be carried from the anther of the one to the pistil of the other; and the insects, while following their natural instincts, attracted by their loveliness, sip the nectar for themselves, and carry the pollen dust from flower to flower, to perfect the embryo fruit. Whence this diversity and whence this perfection? All from the perfection of their organization. Again if we slip a scion from one tree, and ingraft it into the branch of another, the same identical sap that would have produced one species of fruit; passing through another system of tubes, and fibres, produces an entirely different fruit from the other branches. Why is this? The difference in the organization of the scion from that of the supporting stem has produced the different result.

Ascending the scale, we find beings more highly organized, and endowed with higher capacities, into whose nostrils has been breathed the breath of life, and hence they have become living souls which are flying in the atmosphere; gliding in the streams; and moving upon the face of the earth. What do we now find? More complicated and admirable organizations; developing the superior powers of life, will, sight, hearing, instinct, and indeed almost all the phenomena of the human mind. And if they have less of reason than their nobler masters, they possess more instinct, more acuteness of vision and hearing, and in many respects a stronger and more enduring muscular fibre. Still all is material. The heat, the light, the air, and the electricity, that cause their several organs to develop their functions; all, all, are material, and the more complex and intricate their organs, the greater their perfection. Without the organs of mind and sense, there can be no development of mind and sense. So true is this, that indeed the peculiar characteristics of the mind of an animal, can be learned even from the external features; particularly from the relative size and situation of the volume of the brain. The science of phrenology is an induction from these facts; and is wholly based upon the materiality of the organs of the soul. As soon as these organs are dissolved, or materially deranged, their appropriate functions necessarily cease. This ought not to be the case, if there were a principle, an abstract "immortal and immaterial soul," that could develop the powers of life without organization. But if there be no such principle—and there certainly is none—then shines the wisdom and power of God conspicuously in the construction of the living organism. But if there could be such an "immortal, independent, immaterial principle," then for all the purposes of life and happiness, their fearfully and wonderfully wrought frames would be superfluous. "Shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?"

We ascend now to the nobler creature, man. Formed by the same hand; moulded of the same materials, the dust of the earth; animated by the same spirit of the breath of lives; in what consists the superiority or difference between him and the beasts of the field?

1. God has given to man a more complicated and diversified organization; which imparts to him more numerous, and superior faculties; a superior mind.

2. He has the gift of speech, and was created in the image of God.

3. He has a moral nature, and therefore responsible and accountable. A subject of praise and blame; of reward and punishment. He is a being for whom the Son of God has died, a candidate for immortality. He may be raised from the dead at the second coming of Christ.

He resembles the animals in these particulars.

Both are material—both are mortal—both have living souls—both have spirits—

And both alike are entirely dependent upon their organization for all their mental phenomena. Although there is a great difference in these three great natural organized orders of nature; and they are widely separated from each other as a class; yet they meet and overlap at their extremities: so that the highest of the vegetable class, is superior to the brute; and the highest of the brute is superior to the lowest of men. And pray where in the series does immateriality and immortality begin, and where is the dividing line? As they cannot be predicated of the one, so they cannot be predicated of the other.

LUTHER LEE ON THE DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

In Mr. Lee's article No. 21, he professes to meet "the assumption," as he is pleased to call it, "that the word destruction means annihilation, or loss of conscious existence." With what success he has done this, remains to be seen.

The principal text examined by Mr. Lee in this article, is 2 Thess. i. 9. "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power."

Upon the word destruction, he remarks, it "does not necessarily mean loss of existence." I would ask Mr. Lee, if it necessarily means any thing? And, if it do, what is it? Does it necessarily mean eternal torments? I affirm it necessarily carries along with it its primary meaning; and that, therefore, when applied to the final destiny of men, it necessarily means loss of existence, or loss of life.

Mr. Lee has given the definitions of lexicographers, one of which is perdition. The Greek is apoleian, which is another form of apoluo, and signifies, among other things, to dismiss from life, permit to die. Olethros is derived from the verb oleo, and so are the words apolluo and apollumi also derived from oleo; so that the meaning and force of olethros is found in the word perdition, and the force of perdition is found in apolluo, which signifies to be destroyed, to perish, to render vain, to bring to nought. While, therefore, the text might be rendered—"Who shall be punished with everlasting perdition," or "everlasting ruin," it could not be rendered "everlasting misery" without discarding its primary meaning.

2. The word tribulation, in the 6th verse, is not the same punishment, as that in the 9th, as Mr. Lee has asserted. He also says that "the word everlasting cannot well be applied to any term denoting annihilation." This is an assumption, and a fallacy. For, first, the word annihilation does not express the condition of the destroyed They are not annihilated. And I cannot help thinking, that Mr. Lee has selected this word for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of his readers, lest they should see the nakedness of his arguments.

But why cannot the word everlasting be applied to destruction? If a thing be destroyed without the possibility of restoration, why may it not be termed everlasting? The word everlasting adds force to the term destruction—a force which is irresistible to you. It shows that it is no temporary destruction which may be repaired, but a never-ending perdition. The word destruction signifies disorganization, and the term everlasting prefixed indicates its eternal duration. What an abuse of all logic—all reason, and common sense! According to your argument, the words eternal, everlasting, and immortal, should never be applied to God! He is self-existent, and the word everlasting can add no force when applied to him. Of course the term everlasting implies that there may be a destruction which is not everlasting, and I will give you an instance; but this is not to "abandon the argument founded on the meaning of the term."

"O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help," is an example in point. This destruction is not everlasting.

Mr. Lee remarks, that "God himself cannot restore a person thus destroyed." As a question of power, God could restore even that which he had annihilated, much more could he restore that which was resolved into its original elements. But he wills not to do it, and therefore the destruction is everlasting.

3. Mr. Lee argues that "the nature of this punishment called destruction, proves it not to be annihilation." This is a very singular sentence, and reads, when divested of its mysticism, "The nature of this punishment called destruction, proves it not to be destruction!" The punishment is destruction, this is its nature; and yet its nature proves it not to be destruction! Really! Mr. Lee is a logician!

Mr. Lee continues—"It consists in being banished from the presence of the Lord," &c. Not "banished," Mr. Lee, but "punished." Why substitute the word banishment, for punishment? The truth is better expressed without your glosses. The punishment is destruction; and the destruction shuts them out from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power. What can be plainer? The everlasting destruction, then, is not a banishment from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power, as Mr. Lee asserts; but a punishment consisting in destruction.

4. Mr. Lee introduces several passages for the purpose of showing the use of the word in other senses. His first text, Hosea xiii. 9, is a politico-ecclesiastical destruction, which is a metaphorical use of the word. He quotes 1 Cor. i. 19, where it signifies to render vain, or bring to nothing, the wisdom of the wise. He also refers to Rom. iii. 16, where he says, "destruction means ruin or perdition." Very well. He quotes Matt. xii. 13, where destruction is used to express the destiny of the wicked; he says—"it means to ruin or perdition." All right.

He refers to Luke xvii. 27, where it is used to express the destruction by the flood. In Acts ix. 21, where it is used to imply physical death. And to Matt. v. 17, where it is used analogically to signify abrogation. Thus we have its literal and metaphorical use before us, and the reader can judge of their import.

Mr. Lee has certainly failed to prove, that the word destruction, when applied to the destiny of the wicked, does not signify absolute destruction, or perishing. Our position remains just as it was before he discharged his artillery.

1. In Mr. Lee's article, No. 22, which is his last effort, he offers a "reply to the assumption" as he terms it, "that the word perish signifies annihilation."

He says "the words perish, perished, perisheth," are "nowhere used to describe or express the quality of the punishment of sin." This is a grand assumption. These words not only express the certainty but the nature of the sinner's punishment, as we shall see. Indeed the very passages he has quoted afford proof of this. "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Luke xiii. 3. Pilate had mingled the blood of the Galatians with their sacrifices; and the tower in Siloam fell and destroyed eighteen persons: they perished; and Jesus said—"Except ye repent, ye shall likewise perish," or in like manner, "perish," die—come to nought.

The text in John iii. 15, 16, presents us with the word "perish" undeniably expressive of the destiny of the world, apart from the gift of Christ; and it fully expresses the destiny of those, who will not come to Christ that they may have life.

And in Rom. ii. 12, the word perish is used in the same sense. So also 1 Cor. xv. 18; 2 Pe. ii. 12, and Jude 2. Pe. says "shall utterly perish in their own corruption." McKnight, if anything, makes it stronger, when he renders it "by their own corruption," for this expresses the cause of perishing.

2. The original words remain to be examined in this place. Apolluo and apollumi, from the word Oleo, signify to destroy, kill; and, intransitively, to be destroyed, perish; to put to death, render vain to bring to nought. Apolluo, from uso, and compounded of apo and luo, signifies to loose, to send away, dismiss from life, permit to die.

"If the candid reader can see no certain proof" of destruction here, he must be blinded or greatly infatuated with an antiquated theory.

Mr. Lee blunders seriously over Cor. xv. 18. Does he really believe, that, if Christ had not risen, those who had fallen asleep in him would have suffered eternal misery? If so, I envy him not.

Mr. Lee's "illustrations" so far from proving that perish does not mean loss of conscious being, fully sustains this position. "Lord, save us, we perish." "Here perishing means only death by drowning," says Mr. Lee Very well, it means death. Chap. ix. 17. "The bottles perish." "Here," he says, "to perish is to be rendered useless or worthless." Very well. Luke xiii. 33. "It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." "Here to perish is to die, or be put to death," says Mr. Lee. All is well. Chap. xv. 17. "I perish with hunger." "Here perishing," says Mr. Lee, "means to die of hunger." All right again.

Mr. Lee also refers to Eccles. vii. 15: Isa. lvii. 1: Jer. ix. 12, in the first two instances it means death, in a literal sense; and, in the last, desolation.

Speaking of 1 Cor. xv. 17, 18, he says the "Apostle makes the virtue of the atonement depend upon the fact of the resurrection of Christ," &c. This may be true; for if Christ had remained among the dead, or under the dominion of death, there would have been "no profit in his blood." This the Psalmist teaches.

And, just at this point, having finished my review of Mr. Lee's last effort, I will make a few remarks on the death of Christ.

Did he die as a substitute? If so, he paid the penalty of the divine law, and God can have no further demand upon the race. If Christ died to save men from death, then none should ever die; but death is the common lot of all, and, therefore Christ did not die as a substitute in this sense. Neither did he die to save men from a second death, for Adam was not exposed to but one death; and the penalty of the law is one death, not two.

In whatever sense Christ died as a substitute, in that sense mankind will never suffer the penalty of the law; and, if in no sense he died as a substitute, then, unless men avail themselves of the redemption in Christ, they will perish in, and by, their own corruption, and remain under the dominion of death forever.

That the term perish means what we have previously defined it to mean, we have the following additional testimony: "If" God "should set his heart upon man, if he should gather to himself his spirit and his breath; all flesh would perish together, and man would turn again to dust." Job. xxxiv. 14, 15. Again, "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent." 1. Cor. x. 19. And so, also, "the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness." HOMO.

CHRONOLOGY AND HISTORY.

Historians and chronologists are anything but united on the exact time of many important events which are necessary to define with accuracy the time of the beginning or ending of most of those periods. The chronology of some of the events noted in the scriptures is based upon these conflicting and discordant materials; and too much reliance upon profane chronology and popular mistakes as to the reigning king of the times in which the scripture event happened, has led into great errors in the interpretation of the prophecies. This, we conceive, is especially the case with Daniel ix.

Let us take a view of the generally received chronology in the Bible in a few particulars. The chronology put against Ezra i. 1, or the Decree of Cyrus, is B. C. 536. Haggai i. commences with the second year of Darius, and the chronology is put down at 520 B. C., when the house of God or temple was put forward to its completion by Haggai and Zerubbabel at God's command; that is, just sixteen years after the decree of Cyrus; and Ezra vi. 15, tells us "this house was finished in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king:" that is, according to the common received chronology, within twenty-one years after Cyrus' decree; and yet, strange to tell, commentators and chronologists have fixed upon the decree of Artaxerxes, II., B. C. 457, or fifty-eight years after the temple was finished, according to their chronology, as the commandment that went forth to restore and build Jerusalem! Also, according to their chronology of Dan. ix. B. C. 538, the "seventy years desolation of Jerusalem" (ending at that time, Dan. ix. 2,) ended eighty-one years before the commandment went forth to restore and build Jeruealem, i. e., if 457 B. C. is the true point from which to reckon that commandment; and Daniel must have been dead at least seventy-five years before Ezra went up to restore Jerusalem!

It has seemed to be taken for granted that the Darius of Dan. ix. is the same as the Darius who took Babylon. From a careful examination of the subject, we are fully satisfied this is a great mistake. In consequence of this mistake, that chapter has been thrust in between the 8th and 10th chapters, and thus led to inextricable confusion all who have based their calculations upon that theory.

Daniel, himself, if carefully examined, shows that these Dariuses were two different and distinct persons. Chapter v. 31, tells us, "Darius the Median took the kingdom;" the 9th chapter says, "In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes." The Scriptures give us the Ahasuerus as the husband of Esther, Esther ii. 16, and the chronology in the margin of our Bible gives this event B. C. 462. Artaxerxes I. reigned between Cyrus and Darius king of Persia, "son of Ahasuerus." Any one must be satisfied of this, we think, who, with an unprejudiced mind, carefully reads Ezra iv. Artaxerxes I. died B. C. 424. See Taylor's Manual of History, p. 66. Says Taylor—"On the death of Artaxerxes, his only legitimate son, Xerxes, ascended the throne; but within forty five days was murdered by his natural brother, Sogdianus; and he again was deposed by another illegitimate prince, Ochus, who, on his accession, took the name of Darius II." This king was surnamed Nothus, that is, illegitimate. He was called illegitimate because the son of Ahasuerus, most likely born of Esther, a Jewess, and therefore would be accounted as not legitimately heir to the throne of Persia. It seems to us clear that Darius Nothus is the Darius of Daniel ix., and he came to that throne about 424 B. C., instead of B. C. 538, as would seem by the chronology now found in the margin of the Bible. If this be so, then all the other chronologcal dates in the margin of the Book of Daniel are equally erroneous.

Darius Nothus reigned at a latter period than Cyrus (whose Persian name is Coresh,) king of Persia. The communication, therefore, made to Daniel, chap. ix., was at a later period than that of the 10th, 11th, and 12th chapters; and its chronological position in the Book of Daniel is after the 12th chapter. Darius Nothus, or "Darius the son of Ahasuerus," is the same, we judge, as Ezra's "Darius king of Persia," Ez. iv. 5; and cannot therefore be identical with "Darius the Median," but corresponds with the Darius of Haggai i. 1, and Zech. i. 1; and what further confirms this idea is, that in the "second year" of this Darius, the seventy years indignation of the Lord against Jerusalem ceased. See Zech. i. 1, 12. The seventy years' indignation which the angel here declared was completed, in the second year of Darius, is identical with the seventy years' desolations which were terminating in "the first year of Darius, son of Ahasuerus;" for the desolations ceased when the work of rebuilding the temple had such a putting forward as resulted in its completion; that was from the "second year of Darius, king of Persia." See Ezra iv. 24, and v. 1–2; therefore, it follows conclusively that Darius the son of Ahasuerus, (Dan. ix. 1,) is the same as the Darius of Ezra, Haggai, and Zechariah; and hence reigned at a later period than the Scripture Cyrus (Coresh,) king of Persia, and king of Babylon, and therefore was not "Darius the Median," who reigned before Cyrus. If these things are so, it follows that the chronology relied on in fixing the dates of the prophetic periods is erroneous, and will forever delude those who follow it.

Again, as Cyrus reigned before Darius Nothus, or "Darius son of Ahasuerus," and as Daniel's seventy weeks, seven week, and sixty-two weeks, were given him under this latter king, it follows that the decree of Cyrus, to restore and build Jerusalem, was previous to the 9th chapter of Daniel; and it is abundantly evident that the decree of Cyrus, and not that of Artaxerxes, is the decree spoken of by Gabriel to Daniel. This we know will be startling to some who have labored to make the generally received chronology harmonize with the facts in history and prophecy; and yet it is demonstration, to our mind, that the decree of Cyrus is the decree of which Gabriel speaks, Dan. ix.

Let us turn to Isa. xliv. 28, and we shall see what the Lord saith concerning Cyrus. "Cyrus is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem, thou shalt be built, and to the Temple, thy foundation shalt be laid." This language exactly tallies with Gabriel's annunciation—"Know, also, from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," &c. Here is a distinct reference to some prophecy on the subject; no other prophecy can be found that so exactly corresponds as that which relates to the acts of Cyrus; and if we are correct as to the chronology of Dan. ix. that decree of Cyrus had been issued prior to Gabriel's announcement of the time at which to commence the seven weeks and sixty-two weeks, so that Daniel had a definite point at which to begin his reckoning, viz: at the decree of Cyrus. As Cyrus is the only person prophesied of as issuing such a decree for the specified object, we have a right to conclude, that is the commandment intended by Gabriel. The question arises, Did Cyrus issue a decree exactly corresponding with the prophecy in Isaiah and the declaration of Gabriel?

In examining this point, we have nothing to do with profane chronology, or the chronology of historians. The Bible must settle the question, and if profane chronology does not tally with it, we have a right to conclude that such chronology is false, and not to be trusted.

Let us now examine the foregoing question. Cyrus did issue just such a commandment as agrees with Isaiah and Gabriel. See Ezra i. 2, "Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven hath charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem. Who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel (he is the God) which is Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, besides the free-will offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem. Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah, and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites, with all them whose spirit God had raised to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem."

Let us next see how this "commandment" was attended to. In the 3d chapter, after noticing the offerings made by the people when they arrived at Jerusalem, it is said, verse 7, They gave money also unto the masons, and to the carpenters; and meat, and drink, and oil, unto them of Zidon, and to them of Tyre, to bring cedar trees from Lebanon to to the sea of Joppa, according to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia." Then verses 10 and 12 say, "And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites the sons of Asaph with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the ordinance of David king of Israel. And they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord; because he is good, for his mercy endureth forever toward Israel. And the people shouted with a great shout when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid. But many of the priests and Levites and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, that had seen the first house, when the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice, and many shouted."

Thus we have an exact fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy; and that the building the city was included in Cyrus' commandment is clear from the letter which the enemies of the Jews afterwards wrote to Artaxerxes I., Ezra iv. 22; "Be it known unto the king, that the Jews which came up from thee to us are come unto Jerusalem, building the rebellious and the bad city, and have set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations." Here, then, we have also a clear sight of the point of time to which Gabriel pointed as "the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem."

The decrees of Artaxerxes and Darius were only an approval of the decree of Cyrus, and not "the going forth of the commandment" to have the work done. See Ezra vi. 14, "And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo. And they builded and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia." "According to the command*ment*" (singular) "of Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes," &c. The commandment was one, originating with Cyrus, but confirmed by Artaxerxes, who finally revoked his approval, Ezra iv. 17–24; the decree itself was unalterable, according to the laws of the Medes and Persians, but it was renewed by Darius king of Persia, in the second year of his reign, which was the next year after Daniel's prayer, chap. ix., who having examined the ancient records at Babylon, (see Ezra iv. 24,) found in the roll containing the decree of Cyrus, Ezra vi. 1–5; and confirmed that decree in strong language, as may be seen, Ezra vi. 6–12; which concludes with saying, "Let it be done with speed."

From that time, the Jews under the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah, [see Ezra vi. 14; and Haggai 1st and 2d chs.,] carried forward the work so rapidly that "this house was finished in the sixth year of Darius," Ezra vi. 15; or, within five years from the time Daniel so earnestly entreated God to "cause" his "face to shine upon the sanctuary that is desolate." Thus was the prayer of this man of God speedily answered, though he, possibly, did not live to see it, as he must have been about ninety-five years old "in the first year of Darius, son of Ahasuerus."

Discussion in Boston.

There will be a public oral debate, of from six to eight evenings, in Kast Hall, Boston, to commence on Tuesday evening, March 14th, between Rufus Wendell (on the Affirmative) and Eld. Miles Grant (on the Negative). Question for discussion: "Do the Scriptures teach the Non-resurrection of the wicked?"

The Lord's Supper Question.

BY RUFUS WENDELL.

SHOULD THE LORD'S SUPPER BE OBSERVED BY CHRISTIANS AS A YEARLY FESTIVAL? The columns of the HERALD OF LIFE, as formerly also the pages of the BIBLE EXAMINER, have given full expression to the arguments in behalf of the affirmative of this question. These I have endeavored to examine with care; and the result has long since been a perfect conviction that the view which they are adduced to support has no foundation in the Bible. For nearly a year, I have felt that the ground of this confidence should be presented to the readers of this paper. If the theory of a merely annual observance of the Eucharist is unscriptural, its practical influence must be injurious to the cause of Christ. This of itself would be a sufficient reason for undertaking to place the subject before the Lord's children in its true light. The innovation proposed for our acceptance in this matter, is certainly one of no small magnitude; and is, therefore, on account of its own independent merits, to be scrutinized attentively by those who would "prove all things," and "hold fast that which is good." It has, moreover, a collateral bearing which we are not at liberty to disregard. Thus far the history of the theory under notice has been connected almost exclusively with the believers of the doctrine of Life only in Christ. Obviously, therefore, the Life truth is likely to be disparaged in the minds of its opposers—to some extent at least—if they find that its advocates give ready credence to a view of the Lord's Supper which flies in the face of some of the clearest utterances of the Word of God. Herein, therefore, I find an additional motive justifying an effort to have the members of our growing "Life company" see that some of our number have erred in this matter of the Lord's Supper. The subject is fairly and somewhat prominently before us, and it is manifestly best to hear what is to be said on both sides.

Incidentally, in a letter published in No. 29 of Volume first, I alluded to the controversy in question in the following words:—"I do not myself regard the Lord's Supper as a merely annual feast. 'Tradition,' I think, does not render it more certain that its frequent observance prevailed in the christian church in the period immediately following the days of the Apostles, than the New Testament does that the earliest christian churches observed it oftener than once a year." This last sentence states partially an argument which I wish, in this article, to present distinctly for the consideration of those who hold or favor the yearly theory. If the argument can be met, they unquestionably are able to meet it. If, on the contrary, it proves to be unanswerable, it must stand as a protest against the new notion that has been so confidently put forth.

The New Testament teaches that the earliest christian churches observed the Eucharist oftener than once a year. This I call a partial statement of an argument on which I repose the utmost reliance. To make it complete, and valid as an argument, the observance claimed as actual, should also be held to have had divine sanction. This additional claim I do expressly make. Then the argument may be stated thus: Whatever the earliest Christian churches did, with divine approval, was RIGHT. But the Lord's Supper was observed with divine approval, oftener than once a year, by one of the New Testament churches. Therefore, such frequent observance was lawful and right.

The annual-feast theory falls to the ground, inevitably, if the minor premise in the foregoing is Scripturally sustained. Can it be thus sustained? To this point let us now direct our attention. The proposition embraces two points, each of which it will be proper to consider separately.

I. In the first place, then, I affirm that one of the New Testament churches observed the Supper oftener than once a year. What is here asserted as true of one of these churches, I believe is true of all of them. But the present argument has reference to a particular church—the one at Corinth. In support of the position assumed with respect to the usage of this church, I appeal to the 11th chapter of Paul's 1st Epistle to the Corinthians. It is quite incomprehensible to me how any Bible student, who reads that chapter with unprejudiced attention, can fail to see that it clearly discloses a frequent observance of the Eucharist. I think that a distinct apprehension of several points, now to be named, should make this matter plain to every reflecting mind.

1. It must be admitted by all that the 17th and 18th verses of the chapter alluded to, bring to our view the ordinary meetings of the church at Corinth; and, also, that these meetings were not yearly, but frequent. "When ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you." It would be worse than trifling to suppose that the Apostle here loses sight entirely of the schisms that must have appeared in the ordinary meetings of the church, and then levels his rebuke at the same things as occuring once every year. Paul knew what the Master had said about straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

2. The word "THEREFORE," in the 20th verse, is conclusive evidence that the COMING TOGETHER of the church, which it mentions, is identical with the COMING TOGETHER spoken of in the 17th and 18th verses. But the coming together in the 20th verse, was for the purpose of eating the Lord's Supper. It follows, therefore, that the Supper was eaten at the ordinary meetings of the church.

3. The supposition—should any one venture it—that the irregularities denounced by the Apostle, in the 20th verse and onward, were such as had connected themselves merely with a yearly festival, will bear not a moment's examination. The idea is sufficiently refuted by the single fact, that Paul had visited Corinth, in person, between the time of his writing this 1st Epistle and the last preceding Passover. This visit being admitted as having taken place, it must be conceded that the flagrant abuses of which he had been informed, and which he seeks in the 11th chapter of his Epistle to correct, must have existed subsequently to both the Passover and the visit. Those abuses were, therefore, in no wise connected with an anniversary occasion of any kind. Besides all this, the entire structure of verses 17–34, of the chapter under consideration, evinces that the writer of the Epistle believed that the evils which called forth his reproof were in operation at the time he wrote. If they were, then it is certain that the Corinthians met oftener than once in each year to eat the Lord's Supper.

But why multiply words on a point so plain? I do not believe a single expositor of the Scriptures can anywhere be found who would not say, that the position which I now contend for is the clear and only possible deduction from the portion of Holy Writ on which I base it. More than this, what is here claimed is conceded by a leading advocate of the annual theory. Br. JOSEPH T. CURRY, in his recent article entitled "Our Passover—The Lord's Supper," refers to "1 Cor. xi. 20–34" as "the main argument used in opposition to the yearly festival," and says—"We admit that the reading of the passage carries the impression of a more frequent celebration." Certainly it does; and vain must be every attempt to make "the passage" yield any contrary "impression," without doing such violence to plain language as only a bad cause can ever require.

II. In the second place, I affirm that the "frequent celebration" of the Eucharist, by the Corinthians, was justified by the Apostle, and thus had the divine sanction claimed by my argument. This asserted approval, by the Apostle, is seen,—

1. In his entire omission to rebuke the frequency with which (as we have seen and as Br. Curry admits) the church at Corinth celebrated the Eucharist. Here is an eminent instance in which we may insist that "SILENCE GIVES CONSENT." Paul had "received of the Lord" the true doctrine concerning the Supper; and he had delivered it in its purity to the Corinthians. This we learn from his own explicit declaration. Now this true doctrine had become wofully lost sight of in the practice of the church, and the Apostle sets himself about the work of correcting the existing abuses. This being the case, I hold it to be simply preposterous, to suppose that he would have failed to discountenance the "frequent celebration" of the Lord's Supper, provided that he had previously taught the church, on the authority of Christ, that it could only be properly observed as "a yearly festival." Certain it is, that such recreance to duty is not, in this particular matter, chargable upon the modern advocates of the annual observance. It is not easy to believe that our dear brethren of the present day, are more zealous than Paul was to have an institution of the Lord observed in harmony with its original intent.

The yearly theory regards the Lord's Supper as a continuation of the Passover of the Mosaic dispensation. The claim I believe to be unfounded; but it will help us to an illustration. Suppose, then, that in the days of Moses, the Israelites, from a "misconception" of the "design" of the Passover, had taken it into their heads to observe it every week, instead of once a year. Suppose, also, that they had grown somewhat loose in thier manner of observing it. They might, for example, have deemed the command to exclude "leaven" from their dwellings, as being "more nice than wise," and so have contented themselves with seeing that the article was carefully kept out of their dough during the Passover week. Let us suppose all this to have taken place;—then I ask, how would Moses have acted in the matter? Would that servant of God, "who verily was faithful in all his house," have merely reproved their "disorderly procedure when they did" observe the feast? Or would he have read the riot act to the whole congregation—commanding the people to return straightway to Jehovah's arrangement, and keep the feast only "from year to year"? To ask these questions, is to answer them; and to answer them for Moses and the Israelites, is to answer them for Paul and his disorderly brethren at Corinth.

2. Significant as we may regard the omission of the Apostle to rebuke the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper, it is not our only evidence. What Paul says to the church at Corinth, shows directly and positively that he approved of their "frequent celebration" of the Eucharist. Hear him: "When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat [margin, ye cannot eat] the Lord's Supper." Why not? "FOR"—here comes the reason, and the only one—"for in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry and another is drunken." Now Paul could not have written in this way, if "the Lord" had taught him the yearly notion which some of our brethren maintain. According to their view, there can be no such thing as a Scriptural observance of the Lord's Supper oftener than once a year. With them, the time of its observance is of as great importance as the manner; nor do they hesitate to declare that the "frequent celebration" is not only unauthorized, but that it tends to degrade the institution itself. Not so the Apostle Paul. He offers not so much as one lisp of remonstrance against the frequency with which his brethren met together to eat the Supper; his rebuke, on the contrary, is confined entirely to the manner in which they behaved themselves when they were together. I therefore insist that verses 21 and 22 can never be harmonized with the idea, that Paul regarded the Corinthians as celebrating the Supper with too great frequency.

Paul's approval of the church's "frequent celebration" is further involved in the language of the 26th verse. "For AS OFTEN as YE eat this bread and drink this cup, YE do show the Lord's death till he come." These, be it observed, are not the Saviour's words, but the Apostle's. The "YE" addressed were his brethren who ate the Eucharist oftener than once a year. Now Paul says—"AS OFTEN [even though it be every time "ye come together in the church"] as YE [Corinthians] eat this bread," etc. I beg to know what could be language of approval, if this is not?

Finally, the closing verses are decisive as to this matter of divine sanction. "Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat [we have seen that this can not mean once a year], TARRY FOR ONE ANOTHER. And if any man hunger, LET HIM EAT AT HOME; that ye come not together unto condemnation" In this passage the Apostle tells his brethren what to do at home, before going to meeting to eat the Lord's Supper; and, also, what to do at the meeting, after they have satisfied their hunger at home. He could not, in any other way, have more explicitly sanctioned the church's act of coming together for the purpose of eating the Eucharist. Settle it, therefore, that the coming together is oftener than once a year, and you put to flight the assumption of a merely annual observance. So I believe, and so I teach. Amen.

In the foregoing observations, I have purposely refrained from any attempt to answer the arguments which are offered in support of the yearly theory. All of them appear to me easy of refutation. But I have desired, in this article, to make one distinct issue respecting the usage of the church at Corinth. If my reasonings in this direction are valid, the arguments on the other side must be fallacious. In due time I shall be glad to show, if I can, that such is their character.

The Logic Tested.

It is affirmed that what was practiced by "the earliest christian churches," and "had divine sanction," must be "RIGHT." The application of this logic is made in proof that 1st Corinth. xi. warrants the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper. It is not our design, at this time, to prove what was or what was not the practice of the Corinthian church, which was not one of the earliest churches, nor as perfect as might be; but we design to test the logic upon which the argument is built for a practice being "right," and apply this logic to the practice of the earliest church; the one at Jerusalem. We wish it, however, understood that the attempt to prove the Corinthian church partook of the Lord's Supper oftener than annually has entirely failed to convince us. The same logician has scouted the idea that the Lord's Supper is the continuance of the Passover, though modified to correspond to the fact of the Lamb already offered, once for all.

According to the logic relied on, if we prove that the earliest Christian church celebrated the Passover feast after our Lord's death, and that by divine sanction, then, unless it can be made to appear that some other, or any other time is just as valid—by an equally clear divine sanction—to Him who instituted the Supper, it follows, THAT is the time of its celebration.

That the Passover was a divine institution, and that the Lord's Supper was ordained by our LIFE-GIVER in the Passover feast, none will have the presumption to deny. Did the earliest churches continue to keep the Passover feast after the Lord's supper was instituted? Let us see.

When Paul returned from a missionary tour—among the Gentiles—to Jerusalem, he went in to see "James, and all the elders were present." Acts xxi. 18. This interview must have been some twenty years after our Lord's acension to heaven. After hearing Paul's account of his labors among the Gentiles, this christian assembly, with James presiding, said to Paul;

"Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe, and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews, which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs."

They then go on to ask Paul to disprove to the Church at Jerusalem, these charges again him by performing a certain purification, that "all may know....that thou thyself walkest orderly and keepest the law." Paul complied with their wishes, and acted accordingly, to show that he walked "orderly."

Here, then, is the chief and earliest church of the New Testament—the Mother Church—who all keep the Passover feast, as it was of the law and customs. That it had the divine sanction, not only by James and all the Elders, but also of Paul, is undeniable. Hence it follows, according to the logic we are called upon to do homage to, that the Passover Supper, under the New Testament dispensation, is a divine institution, and there is no escape from this conclusion if such logic is reliable; so that if we want proof of the validity of celebrating the feast yearly, we have all we can desire by the logic given us.

Paul, being a Jew by birth, did keep the yearly feast; for "all" believing Jews did. If he did not, then he consented to act the hypocrite to please James and the Elders at Jerusalem. If he kept the yearly feast, we want and must have some proof besides inferences that he "eat the Lord's passover" oftener than yearly, or that he sanctioned such a procedure. The fact of there being but one text, from which to make such an inference, is strong evidence against the position of partaking of it as frequently as any one pleases. If such a labored effort, with so much emphasizing of words, is necessary to sustain a theory, we may well doubt the reliability of the author's inferences. Is he anxious to smooth the way for others to come among the Life-believers? So are we; but not by laying aside our convictions of truth; which would be quite likely to make thoughtful persons think we are concerned to be popular, and full asmuch inclined to act on principles we condemn in others who reject the doctrine of no life for the wicked dead, because they think it will prevent some from accepting truths they now hold. They have one or two texts ten-fold stronger in proof of the resurrection of the wicked dead, than 1 Corinth. xi. is of the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper.

We have no fear, however, of any considerable number of the believers in the life-views abandoning the well established view that the true, scriptural time for that celebration is an annual commemoration of our Lord's death. They are too well instructed in the matter to abandon a definite period for an "any time"—or as "often" as any choose, however frequent; and so have no definiteness about it. The believers in New York are all but unanimous on this question.

The yearly celebration, in our view, stands on a more impregnable foundation than ever by the utter failure of the logic that has attemted to overthrow it. The disciples—all of them of the Jews, who believed—certainly did keep the yearly Passover, according to the statement of James and the Elders of Jerusalem. Let our opposers show, if they can, that that church "frequently" kept any other Passover feast at other times. Our Lord established his Supper at the Passover feast; and He said—not Paul—"This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." What were they doing? Concluding the Passover feast. But we have said enough for this time, and leave our readers to judge in the matter.

Self-Deception.

The children of this world are constituted of two great bodies—deceivers, and deceived. Again, the latter class is divided into two parts—those who are deceived by others, and those who are deceived by themselves. There is a vast amount of self-deception in the world, and especially among those who have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof. Thousands profess the religion of Christ, who have no part nor lot in the matter. All denominations contain this element—the Catholic, Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, and every other name, including the heterogeneous conglomeration known as the Second Advent body.

This class of self-deceivers has always existed from the foundation of Christianity to the present. Jesus warned the people against self-deception. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven." So Paul warned the Galatian church: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." We reap not as we profess to sow, not as we think we sow, but as we sow. It is not a glib tongue that proves acceptance of God. A person may talk long and loud on religious subjects and yet come short of what is required. We have no doubt that there are many who stand in high places as teachers of righteousness who deceive themselves. They dream that they sow to the Spirit, whereas in fact they sow to the flesh. We have no doubt that many who talk of the prophetic periods, signs of the times, the speedy coming of Christ, etc. etc. are only actuated by a desire for self-aggrandizement. They sow to the flesh. God save the people from self-deception!

The Spirit of God is the saving element. If we would have everlasting life we must sow to the Spirit. Think of this, ye professors of godliness! "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves: know ye not that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" There is a great deal of "hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife" among professing Christians. All these things come from the flesh. The Spirit of God produces love. "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

It is often remarked—"How the Adventists are cut up? They are divided in every place." If these divisions were only on account of doctrines it might perhaps be excused. But, alas, the main cause is the flesh. People imagine that they are Christians, and act out their own will under the name of Christ. Sometimes we hear it said—"O for a union of all Adventists!" Far be such a consummation. We want a union of those in Christ, not of the mere pretenders to the name. We want no union with back-biters, tale-bearers, schism-makers, will-worshippers, self-seekers. From all such—Good Lord, deliver us. The Apostle Paul gave most excellent advice to the Romans. "Now I beseech you, brethren mark them which cause divisions and offences ....and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple."

How is it that people are so self-deceived? One great cause is the dependence on forms for salvation. Men think that if they have been baptized with water, and eat consecrated bread, and drink consecrated wine, they are therefore Christians. Hundreds and perhaps thousands of Adventists are wallowing in this very ditch to-day. There are they who treat other professed Christians with contempt because they are not instructed in the true doctrine of life and the kingdom. They forget the Saviour's saying about the mill-stone. Matt. xviii. 6.

Our standard is simple—Have you the Spirit? This is the great essential, without which no one can be saved; with which no one can be lost. There is no need of self-deception. The matter is very plain. Have you the Spirit? We do not ask whether you believe this or that; but—Have you the Spirit? Away with your trashy schemes—water salvation, bread and wine salvation, theoretical salvation. Have you the Spirit? Do you mind the things of the flesh, or the things of the Spirit? Is the love of God shed abroad in your heart by the Holy Spirit, which is given unto you? Do you cling to spiritual things—true, venerable, just, pure, lovely things? "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." J. T. C.

Keep in the Love of God.

BY D. J. WEAVER.

"Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." Jude 21. How shall we keep ourselves in the love of God? Says Christ, "If ye love me keep my commandments.' How can the natural man keep the commandments of God? By being united to Christ and having his spirit. And by having this spirit in our hearts all hatred, wrath, and the spirit of retaliation will be driven out; for if we are "new creatures" old things will be done away. When I hear people talk about love, and preach it from the stand, telling others how they must live, and then get angry at those who do not believe God will raise the wicked to torment them and kill them again, calling them "backsliders," &c., how can I think they keep the love of God in them? They must be mistaken: for "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor," but is "the fulfilling of the law." "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him." If those who profess to have this love do not bear the fruit of it, we must conclude they are deceiving themselves, for "by their fruits ye shall know them." Paul in Gal. v. says "The fruit of the spirit is love," which is in harmony with the text in Jude.

Can we in safety, he said, to be "looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life"-and not keep ourselves in the love of God? I think not. The promise is to those that are loving and looking for him, not to any others. And if we have hatred and revenge in our hearts, the love of God does not dwell there. What is "mercy"? It is pity and compassion. And if his obedient children thro' the mercy of God obtain eternal life, will he not have compassion on dead sinners who were never united to him, and let them forever remain dead? The prophet Isaiah says, "They are dead, they shall not live: they are deceased they shall not rise." Here we see the mercy of God manifested toward them, from the fact that their condition would not be bettered by a resurrection.

So we see in order to keep ourselves in the love of God we must be united to the "Living Vine" and have the divine Spirit continually dwelling in us. When I hear people say, "the non-resurrection doctrine is dangerous," I think they do not understand what they say; for the doctrine itself brings us in a position where we must have the spirit of Christ abiding in us in order to have eternal life, when the LIFE-GIVER comes. We find in Christ no spirit of retaliation, and he is to be our example. When hanging on the cross, reviled by his persecutors, his language was, Father, FORGIVE THEM. Why did he not tell them he could bear it patiently, for they would have to come up at the last day and get their punishment, be tormented and killed again? The reason is, he had no such revengeful spirit in him. He manifested the love of the Father in his last expiring moments. He came to do his Father's will. We hear him saying to his disciples, "A new commandment give I unto you. That ye love one another as I have loved you. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another."

Christ also says, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day:" (and them that do not believe?) No it does not read so. "Well," says one, "that is what it means." Why did he not say so, then? Again we read, "The pure in heart shall see God." Why did he use this language if every body that ever lived "shall see God?" If this be true, what superiority has the pure over the impure as respects seeing God. Paul says, "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Paul is in harmony with the Great Teacher; and as we can not have holiness without possessing the love of God, we are brought back to the text, "Keep yourself in to commence the seven weeks and sixty-two weeks, so that Daniel had a definite point at which to begin his reckoning, viz: at the decree of Cyrus. As Cyrus is the only person prophesied of as issuing such a decree for the specified object, we have a right to conclude, that is the commandment intended by Gabriel. The question arises, Did Cyrus issue a decree exactly corresponding with the prophecy in Isaiah and the declaration of Gabriel?

In examining this point, we have nothing to do with profane chronology, or the chronology of historians. The Bible must settle the question, and if profane chronology does not tally with it, we have a right to conclude that such chronology is false, and not to be trusted.

Let us now examine the foregoing question. Cyrus did issue just such a commandment as agrees with Isaiah and Gabriel. See Ezra i. 2, "Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven hath charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem. Who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel (he is the God) which is Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts, besides the free-will offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem. Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah, and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites, with all them whose spirit God had raised to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem."

Let us next see how this "commandment" was attended to. In the 3d chapter, after noticing the offerings made by the people when they arrived at Jerusalem, it is said, verse 7, They gave money also unto the masons, and to the carpenters; and meat, and drink, and oil, unto them of Zidon, and to them of Tyre, to bring cedar trees from Lebanon to to the sea of Joppa, according to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia." Then verses 10 and 12 say, "And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites the sons of Asaph with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the ordinance of David king of Israel. And they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord; because he is good, for his mercy endureth forever toward Israel. And the people shouted with a great shout when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid. But many of the priests and Levites and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, that had seen the first house, when the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice, and many shouted."

Thus we have an exact fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy; and that the building the city was included in Cyrus' commandment is clear from the letter which the enemies of the Jews afterwards wrote to Artaxerxes I., Ezra iv. 22; "Be it known unto the king, that the Jews which came up from thee to us are come unto Jerusalem, building the rebellious and the bad city, and have set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations." Here, then, we have also a clear sight of the point of time to which Gabriel pointed as "the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem."

The decrees of Artaxerxes and Darius were only an approval of the decree of Cyrus, and not "the going forth of the commandment" to have the work done. See Ezra vi. 14, "And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo. And they builded and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia." "According to the command*ment*" (singular) "of Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes," &c. The commandment was one, originating with Cyrus, but confirmed by Artaxerxes, who finally revoked his approval, Ezra iv. 17–24; the decree itself was unalterable, according to the laws of the Medes and Persians, but it was renewed by Darius king of Persia, in the second year of his reign, which was the next year after Daniel's prayer, chap. ix., who having examined the ancient records at Babylon, (see Ezra iv. 24,) found in the roll containing the decree of Cyrus, Ezra vi. 1–5; and confirmed that decree in strong language, as may be seen, Ezra vi. 6–12; which concludes with saying, "Let it be done with speed."

From that time, the Jews under the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah, [see Ezra vi. 14; and Haggai 1st and 2d chs.,] carried forward the work so rapidly that "this house was finished in the sixth year of Darius," Ezra vi. 15; or, within five years from the time Daniel so earnestly entreated God to "cause" his "face to shine upon the sanctuary that is desolate." Thus was the prayer of this man of God speedily answered, though he, possibly, did not live to see it, as he must have been about ninety-five years old "in the first year of Darius, son of Ahasuerus."

Discussion in Boston.

There will be a public oral debate, of from six to eight evenings, in Kast Hall, Boston, to commence on Tuesday evening, March 14th, between Rufus Wendell (on the Affirmative) and Eld. Miles Grant (on the Negative). Question for discussion: "Do the Scriptures teach the Non-resurrection of the wicked?"

☞ NOTICE.—I have been chosen Treasurer and Corresponding Secretary for the Church in New Haven, Conn. All Preachers sending appointments or coming to New Haven to preach without an invitation from, or corresponding with me, will come at their own charges.

The Lord's Supper Question.

BY RUFUS WENDELL.

SHOULD THE LORD'S SUPPER BE OBSERVED BY CHRISTIANS AS A YEARLY FESTIVAL? The columns of the HERALD OF LIFE, as formerly also the pages of the BIBLE EXAMINER, have given full expression to the arguments in behalf of the affirmative of this question. These I have endeavored to examine with care; and the result has long since been a perfect conviction that the view which they are adduced to support has no foundation in the Bible. For nearly a year, I have felt that the ground of this confidence should be presented to the readers of this paper. If the theory of a merely annual observance of the Eucharist is unscriptural, its practical influence must be injurious to the cause of Christ. This of itself would be a sufficient reason for undertaking to place the subject before the Lord's children in its true light. The innovation proposed for our acceptance in this matter, is certainly one of no small magnitude; and is, therefore, on account of its own independent merits, to be scrutinized attentively by those who would "prove all things," and "hold fast that which is good." It has, moreover, a collateral bearing which we are not at liberty to disregard. Thus far the history of the theory under notice has been connected almost exclusively with the believers of the doctrine of Life only in Christ. Obviously, therefore, the Life truth is likely to be disparaged in the minds of its opposers—to some extent at least—if they find that its advocates give ready credence to a view of the Lord's Supper which flies in the face of some of the clearest utterances of the Word of God. Herein, therefore, I find an additional motive justifying an effort to have the members of our growing "Life company" see that some of our number have erred in this matter of the Lord's Supper. The subject is fairly and somewhat prominently before us, and it is manifestly best to hear what is to be said on both sides.

Incidentally, in a letter published in No. 29 of Volume first, I alluded to the controversy in question in the following words:—"I do not myself regard the Lord's Supper as a merely annual feast. 'Tradition,' I think, does not render it more certain that its frequent observance prevailed in the christian church in the period immediately following the days of the Apostles, than the New Testament does that the earliest christian churches observed it oftener than once a year." This last sentence states partially an argument which I wish, in this article, to present distinctly for the consideration of those who hold or favor the yearly theory. If the argument can be met, they unquestionably are able to meet it. If, on the contrary, it proves to be unanswerable, it must stand as a protest against the new notion that has been so confidently put forth.

The New Testament teaches that the earliest christian churches observed the Eucharist oftener than once a year. This I call a partial statement of an argument on which I repose the utmost reliance. To make it complete, and valid as an argument, the observance claimed as actual, should also be held to have had divine sanction. This additional claim I do expressly make. Then the argument may be stated thus: Whatever the earliest Christian churches did, with divine approval, was RIGHT. But the Lord's Supper was observed with divine approval, oftener than once a year, by one of the New Testament churches. Therefore, such frequent observance was lawful and right.

The annual-feast theory falls to the ground, inevitably, if the minor premise in the foregoing is Scripturally sustained. Can it be thus sustained? To this point let us now direct our attention. The proposition embraces two points, each of which it will be proper to consider separately.

I. In the first place, then, I affirm that one of the New Testament churches observed the Supper oftener than once a year. What is here asserted as true of one of these churches, I believe is true of all of them. But the present argument has reference to a particular church—the one at Corinth. In support of the position assumed with respect to the usage of this church, I appeal to the 11th chapter of Paul's 1st Epistle to the Corinthians. It is quite incomprehensible to me how any Bible student, who reads that chapter with unprejudiced attention, can fail to see that it clearly discloses a frequent observance of the Eucharist. I think that a distinct apprehension of several points, now to be named, should make this matter plain to every reflecting mind.

1. It must be admitted by all that the 17th and 18th verses of the chapter alluded to, bring to our view the ordinary meetings of the church at Corinth; and, also, that these meetings were not yearly, but frequent. "When ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you." It would be worse than trifling to suppose that the Apostle here loses sight entirely of the schisms that must have appeared in the ordinary meetings of the church, and then levels his rebuke at the same things as occuring once every year. Paul knew what the Master had said about straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

2. The word "THEREFORE," in the 20th verse, is conclusive evidence that the COMING TOGETHER of the church, which it mentions, is identical with the COMING TOGETHER spoken of in the 17th and 18th verses. But the coming together in the 20th verse, was for the purpose of eating the Lord's Supper. It follows, therefore, that the Supper was eaten at the ordinary meetings of the church.

3. The supposition—should any one venture it—that the irregularities denounced by the Apostle, in the 20th verse and onward, were such as had connected themselves merely with a yearly festival, will bear not a moment's examination. The idea is sufficiently refuted by the single fact, that Paul had visited Corinth, in person, between the time of his writing this 1st Epistle and the last preceding Passover. This visit being admitted as having taken place, it must be conceded that the flagrant abuses of which he had been informed, and which he seeks in the 11th chapter of his Epistle to correct, must have existed subsequently to both the Passover and the visit. Those abuses were, therefore, in no wise connected with an anniversary occasion of any kind. Besides all this, the entire structure of verses 17–34, of the chapter under consideration, evinces that the writer of the Epistle believed that the evils which called forth his reproof were in operation at the time he wrote. If they were, then it is certain that the Corinthians met oftener than once in each year to eat the Lord's Supper.

But why multiply words on a point so plain? I do not believe a single expositor of the Scriptures can anywhere be found who would not say, that the position which I now contend for is the clear and only possible deduction from the portion of Holy Writ on which I base it. More than this, what is here claimed is conceded by a leading advocate of the annual theory. Br. JOSEPH T. CURRY, in his recent article entitled "Our Passover—The Lord's Supper," refers to "1 Cor. xi. 20–34" as "the main argument used in opposition to the yearly festival," and says—"We admit that the reading of the passage carries the impression of a more frequent celebration." Certainly it does; and vain must be every attempt to make "the passage" yield any contrary "impression," without doing such violence to plain language as only a bad cause can ever require.

II. In the second place, I affirm that the "frequent celebration" of the Eucharist, by the Corinthians, was justified by the Apostle, and thus had the divine sanction claimed by my argument. This asserted approval, by the Apostle, is seen,—

1. In his entire omission to rebuke the frequency with which (as we have seen and as Br. Curry admits) the church at Corinth celebrated the Eucharist. Here is an eminent instance in which we may insist that "SILENCE GIVES CONSENT." Paul had "received of the Lord" the true doctrine concerning the Supper; and he had delivered it in its purity to the Corinthians. This we learn from his own explicit declaration. Now this true doctrine had become wofully lost sight of in the practice of the church, and the Apostle sets himself about the work of correcting the existing abuses. This being the case, I hold it to be simply preposterous, to suppose that he would have failed to discountenance the "frequent celebration" of the Lord's Supper, provided that he had previously taught the church, on the authority of Christ, that it could only be properly observed as "a yearly festival." Certain it is, that such recreance to duty is not, in this particular matter, chargable upon the modern advocates of the annual observance. It is not easy to believe that our dear brethren of the present day, are more zealous than Paul was to have an institution of the Lord observed in harmony with its original intent.

The yearly theory regards the Lord's Supper as a continuation of the Passover of the Mosaic dispensation. The claim I believe to be unfounded; but it will help us to an illustration. Suppose, then, that in the days of Moses, the Israelites, from a "misconception" of the "design" of the Passover, had taken it into their heads to observe it every week, instead of once a year. Suppose, also, that they had grown somewhat loose in thier manner of observing it. They might, for example, have deemed the command to exclude "leaven" from their dwellings, as being "more nice than wise," and so have contented themselves with seeing that the article was carefully kept out of their dough during the Passover week. Let us suppose all this to have taken place;—then I ask, how would Moses have acted in the matter? Would that servant of God, "who verily was faithful in all his house," have merely reproved their "disorderly procedure when they did" observe the feast? Or would he have read the riot act to the whole congregation—commanding the people to return straightway to Jehovah's arrangement, and keep the feast only "from year to year"? To ask these questions, is to answer them; and to answer them for Moses and the Israelites, is to answer them for Paul and his disorderly brethren at Corinth.

2. Significant as we may regard the omission of the Apostle to rebuke the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper, it is not our only evidence. What Paul says to the church at Corinth, shows directly and positively that he approved of their "frequent celebration" of the Eucharist. Hear him: "When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat [margin, ye cannot eat] the Lord's Supper." Why not? "FOR"—here comes the reason, and the only one—"for in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry and another is drunken." Now Paul could not have written in this way, if "the Lord" had taught him the yearly notion which some of our brethren maintain. According to their view, there can be no such thing as a Scriptural observance of the Lord's Supper oftener than once a year. With them, the time of its observance is of as great importance as the manner; nor do they hesitate to declare that the "frequent celebration" is not only unauthorized, but that it tends to degrade the institution itself. Not so the Apostle Paul. He offers not so much as one lisp of remonstrance against the frequency with which his brethren met together to eat the Supper; his rebuke, on the contrary, is confined entirely to the manner in which they behaved themselves when they were together. I therefore insist that verses 21 and 22 can never be harmonized with the idea, that Paul regarded the Corinthians as celebrating the Supper with too great frequency.

Paul's approval of the church's "frequent celebration" is further involved in the language of the 26th verse. "For AS OFTEN as YE eat this bread and drink this cup, YE do show the Lord's death till he come." These, be it observed, are not the Saviour's words, but the Apostle's. The "YE" addressed were his brethren who ate the Eucharist oftener than once a year. Now Paul says—"AS OFTEN [even though it be every time "ye come together in the church"] as YE [Corinthians] eat this bread," etc. I beg to know what could be language of approval, if this is not?

Finally, the closing verses are decisive as to this matter of divine sanction. "Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat [we have seen that this can not mean once a year], TARRY FOR ONE ANOTHER. And if any man hunger, LET HIM EAT AT HOME; that ye come not together unto condemnation" In this passage the Apostle tells his brethren what to do at home, before going to meeting to eat the Lord's Supper; and, also, what to do at the meeting, after they have satisfied their hunger at home. He could not, in any other way, have more explicitly sanctioned the church's act of coming together for the purpose of eating the Eucharist. Settle it, therefore, that the coming together is oftener than once a year, and you put to flight the assumption of a merely annual observance. So I believe, and so I teach. Amen.

In the foregoing observations, I have purposely refrained from any attempt to answer the arguments which are offered in support of the yearly theory. All of them appear to me easy of refutation. But I have desired, in this article, to make one distinct issue respecting the usage of the church at Corinth. If my reasonings in this direction are valid, the arguments on the other side must be fallacious. In due time I shall be glad to show, if I can, that such is their character.

New York, Feb. 24, 1865.

The Logic Tested.

It is affirmed that what was practiced by "the earliest christian churches," and "had divine sanction," must be "RIGHT." The application of this logic is made in proof that 1st Corinth. xi. warrants the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper. It is not our design, at this time, to prove what was or what was not the practice of the Corinthian church, which was not one of the earliest churches, nor as perfect as might be; but we design to test the logic upon which the argument is built for a practice being "right," and apply this logic to the practice of the earliest church; the one at Jerusalem. We wish it, however, understood that the attempt to prove the Corinthian church partook of the Lord's Supper oftener than annually has entirely failed to convince us. The same logician has scouted the idea that the Lord's Supper is the continuance of the Passover, though modified to correspond to the fact of the Lamb already offered, once for all.

According to the logic relied on, if we prove that the earliest Christian church celebrated the Passover feast after our Lord's death, and that by divine sanction, then, unless it can be made to appear that some other, or any other time is just as valid—by an equally clear divine sanction—to Him who instituted the Supper, it follows, THAT is the time of its celebration.

That the Passover was a divine institution, and that the Lord's Supper was ordained by our LIFE-GIVER in the Passover feast, none will have the presumption to deny. Did the earliest churches continue to keep the Passover feast after the Lord's supper was instituted? Let us see.

When Paul returned from a missionary tour—among the Gentiles—to Jerusalem, he went in to see "James, and all the elders were present." Acts xxi. 18. This interview must have been some twenty years after our Lord's acension to heaven. After hearing Paul's account of his labors among the Gentiles, this christian assembly, with James presiding, said to Paul;

"Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe, and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews, which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs."

They then go on to ask Paul to disprove to the Church at Jerusalem, these charges again him by performing a certain purification, that "all may know....that thou thyself walkest orderly and keepest the law." Paul complied with their wishes, and acted accordingly, to show that he walked "orderly."

Here, then, is the chief and earliest church of the New Testament—the Mother Church—who all keep the Passover feast, as it was of the law and customs. That it had the divine sanction, not only by James and all the Elders, but also of Paul, is undeniable. Hence it follows, according to the logic we are called upon to do homage to, that the Passover Supper, under the New Testament dispensation, is a divine institution, and there is no escape from this conclusion if such logic is reliable; so that if we want proof of the validity of celebrating the feast yearly, we have all we can desire by the logic given us.

Paul, being a Jew by birth, did keep the yearly feast; for "all" believing Jews did. If he did not, then he consented to act the hypocrite to please James and the Elders at Jerusalem. If he kept the yearly feast, we want and must have some proof besides inferences that he "eat the Lord's passover" oftener than yearly, or that he sanctioned such a procedure. The fact of there being but one text, from which to make such an inference, is strong evidence against the position of partaking of it as frequently as any one pleases. If such a labored effort, with so much emphasizing of words, is necessary to sustain a theory, we may well doubt the reliability of the author's inferences. Is he anxious to smooth the way for others to come among the Life-believers? So are we; but not by laying aside our convictions of truth; which would be quite likely to make thoughtful persons think we are concerned to be popular, and full asmuch inclined to act on principles we condemn in others who reject the doctrine of no life for the wicked dead, because they think it will prevent some from accepting truths they now hold. They have one or two texts ten-fold stronger in proof of the resurrection of the wicked dead, than 1 Corinth. xi. is of the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper.

We have no fear, however, of any considerable number of the believers in the life-views abandoning the well established view that the true, scriptural time for that celebration is an annual commemoration of our Lord's death. They are too well instructed in the matter to abandon a definite period for an "any time"—or as "often" as any choose, however frequent; and so have no definiteness about it. The believers in New York are all but unanimous on this question.

The yearly celebration, in our view, stands on a more impregnable foundation than ever by the utter failure of the logic that has attemted to overthrow it. The disciples—all of them of the Jews, who believed—certainly did keep the yearly Passover, according to the statement of James and the Elders of Jerusalem. Let our opposers show, if they can, that that church "frequently" kept any other Passover feast at other times. Our Lord established his Supper at the Passover feast; and He said—not Paul—"This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." What were they doing? Concluding the Passover feast. But we have said enough for this time, and leave our readers to judge in the matter.

Self-Deception.

The children of this world are constituted of two great bodies—deceivers, and deceived. Again, the latter class is divided into two parts—those who are deceived by others, and those who are deceived by themselves. There is a vast amount of self-deception in the world, and especially among those who have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof. Thousands profess the religion of Christ, who have no part nor lot in the matter. All denominations contain this element—the Catholic, Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, and every other name, including the heterogeneous conglomeration known as the Second Advent body.

This class of self-deceivers has always existed from the foundation of Christianity to the present. Jesus warned the people against self-deception. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven." So Paul warned the Galatian church: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." We reap not as we profess to sow, not as we think we sow, but as we sow. It is not a glib tongue that proves acceptance of God. A person may talk long and loud on religious subjects and yet come short of what is required. We have no doubt that there are many who stand in high places as teachers of righteousness who deceive themselves. They dream that they sow to the Spirit, whereas in fact they sow to the flesh. We have no doubt that many who talk of the prophetic periods, signs of the times, the speedy coming of Christ, etc. etc. are only actuated by a desire for self-aggrandizement. They sow to the flesh. God save the people from self-deception!

The Spirit of God is the saving element. If we would have everlasting life we must sow to the Spirit. Think of this, ye professors of godliness! "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own-selves: know ye not that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" There is a great deal of "hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife" among professing Christians. All these things come from the flesh. The Spirit of God produces love. "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

It is often remarked—"How the Adventists are cut up? They are divided in every place." If these divisions were only on account of doctrines it might perhaps be excused. But, alas, the main cause is the flesh. People imagine that they are Christians, and act out their own will under the name of Christ. Sometimes we hear it said—"O for a union of all Adventists!" Far be such a consummation. We want a union of those in Christ, not of the mere pretenders to the name. We want no union with back-biters, tale-bearers, schism-makers, will-worshippers, self-seekers. From all such—Good Lord, deliver us. The Apostle Paul gave most excellent advice to the Romans. "Now I beseech you, brethren mark them which cause divisions and offences ....and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple."

How is it that people are so self-deceived? One great cause is the dependence on forms for salvation. Men think that if they have been baptized with water, and eat consecrated bread, and drink consecrated wine, they are therefore Christians. Hundreds and perhaps thousands of Adventists are wallowing in this very ditch to-day. There are they who treat other professed Christians with contempt because they are not instructed in the true doctrine of life and the kingdom. They forget the Saviour's saying about the mill-stone. Matt. xviii. 6.

Our standard is simple—Have you the Spirit? This is the great essential, without which no one can be saved; with which no one can be lost. There is no need of self-deception. The matter is very plain. Have you the Spirit? We do not ask whether you believe this or that; but—Have you the Spirit? Away with your trashy schemes—water salvation, bread and wine salvation, theoretical salvation. Have you the Spirit? Do you mind the things of the flesh, or the things of the Spirit? Is the love of God shed abroad in your heart by the Holy Spirit, which is given unto you? Do you cling to spiritual things—true, venerable, just, pure, lovely things? "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

Keep in the Love of God.

BY D. J. WEAVER.

"Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." Jude 21. How shall we keep ourselves in the love of God? Says Christ, "If ye love me keep my commandments.' How can the natural man keep the commandments of God? By being united to Christ and having his spirit. And by having this spirit in our hearts all hatred, wrath, and the spirit of retaliation will be driven out; for if we are "new creatures" old things will be done away. When I hear people talk about love, and preach it from the stand, telling others how they must live, and then get angry at those who do not believe God will raise the wicked to torment them and kill them again, calling them "backsliders," &c., how can I think they keep the love of God in them? They must be mistaken: for "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor," but is "the fulfilling of the law." "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him." If those who profess to have this love do not bear the fruit of it, we must conclude they are deceiving themselves, for "by their fruits ye shall know them." Paul in Gal. v. says "The fruit of the spirit is love," which is in harmony with the text in Jude.

Can we in safety, he said, to be "looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life" and not keep ourselves in the love of God? I think not. The promise is to those that are loving and looking for him, not to any others. And if we have hatred and revenge in our hearts, the love of God does not dwell there. What is "mercy"? It is pity and compassion. And if his obedient children thro' the mercy of God obtain eternal life, will he not have compassion on dead sinners who were never united to him, and let them forever remain dead? The prophet Isaiah says, "They are dead, they shall not live: they are deceased they shall not rise." Here we see the mercy of God manifested toward them, from the fact that their condition would not be bettered by a resurrection.

So we see in order to keep ourselves in the love of God we must be united to the "Living Vine" and have the divine Spirit continually dwelling in us. When I hear people say, "the non-resurrection doctrine is dangerous," I think they do not understand what they say; for the doctrine itself brings us in a position where we must have the spirit of Christ abiding in us in order to have eternal life, when the LIFE-GIVER comes. We find in Christ no spirit of retaliation, and he is to be our example. When hanging on the cross, reviled by his persecutors, his language was, Father, FORGIVE THEM. Why did he not tell them he could bear it patiently, for they would have to come up at the last day and get their punishment, be tormented and killed again? The reason is, he had no such revengeful spirit in him. He manifested the love of the Father in his last expiring moments. He came to do his Father's will. We hear him saying to his disciples, "A new commandment give I unto you. That ye love one another as I have loved you. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another."

Christ also says, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day:" (and them that do not believe?) No it does not read so. "Well," says one, "that is what it means." Why did he not say so, then? Again we read, "The pure in heart shall see God." Why did he use this language if every body that ever lived "shall see God?" If this be true, what superiority has the pure over the impure as respects seeing God. Paul says, "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Paul is in harmony with the Great Teacher; and as we can not have holiness without possessing the love of God, we are brought back to the text, "Keep yourselves in the love of God." Then can we exhibit the beauties of Christianity before the world, being "lights" unto it, and they seeing our "good works" may be led to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

The more of God's love we have the better we can surmount all difficulties. We have one privilege that none can take away; we can love our enemies, do them good, and they can not prevent it. But in order to do this, we shall need to have the love of God in our hearts, increasing and abounding more and more. The Lord help us to be faithful to our calling; to do his will in all things; so we can hear him say, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." This glorious language will not be said to us unless we are very humble and obedient followers of Christ. Brethren, "Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. Amen.

Politics.

They are many who cry out against politics, who are doubtless honest and sincere; yet neither of these qualities are a guarantee against wrong opinions and conclusions. The persons spoken of have, clearly, no definite idea of what politics are. They evidently have in their minds corrupt and unprincipled men, who are professional politicians. The wicked character of those men give them the idea that politics are a corrupt and corrupting affair. They reason precisely as infidels do about Christianity. They see men who are professional followers of Christ and expounders of his religion: but some of these men are exceedingly corrupt, and make their profession a cloak for selfish and wicked ends; and hence the rejectors of Christianity cry out against religion as a corrupt and wicked institution; and very religiously will have nothing to do with it.

What are we to understand by politics? Not party lying and jugglery; such as is practiced by men of corrupt minds, with selfish ends. That is not politics; it is a lie on politics, and a perversion of them, for which politics are no more responsible than Christianity is responsible for the folly and madness of Romanism, or any other corruption of it. Let the things stand on their own merits, and not be judged of by men of mere professions.

Politics is "The science of government; that part of ethics which consists in the regulation and government of a nation or state, for the preservation of its safety, peace, and prosperity; comprehending the defense of its existence and rights against foreign control or conquest, the augmentation of its strength and resources, and the protection of its citizens in their rights, with the preservation and improvement of their morals."—Webster.

Now, what is there in politics, as thus defined, that a christian man, if enlightened, can object to? What, that is in opposition to God's order in governing the world? The fact is, as a general rule, those who inveigh against having any thing to do with politics, are misinformed or misguided by ignorant or designing men. To neglect to do the good we might, is hardly less criminal than to commit the wickedness we were bound to do all in our power to prevent. The man who would look on and see his child murdered before his eyes, and make no effort to prevent it, is little less guilty than the murderer himself.

Government is essential in the present state of this world; and somebody is bound by God's ordinance to see that it is righteously administered. Shall christian men say, they will have nothing to do with it? that is, they will not have any thing to do with an ordinance of God; and thus leave government to the basest and most corrupt men. Is that the course that Christianity calls them to pursue? The question only needs to be asked, to be seen as folly or sin.

If professed christians, who condemn having any thing to do with politics, will confine their condemnation to corruptions of politics, by selfish men, who "decree unrighteous decrees....to turn aside the needy from judgment, and take away the right of the poor.... that widows may be their prey, and that may rob the fatherless" (Isa. x. 1, 2), we shall have no controversy with them. Such politicians are to be condemned, and no christian man should lend them his vote, or influence, in any way, to carry on their iniquity. But it is just such politicians who are loudest in crying out against the pulpit or religious papers having any thing to do with politics; and, for the most part, among professors of religion, it is those who have unhappily fallen under the influence of such corrupt and unprincipled politicians, who are the offended ones if we say any thing which may be construed to be of a political character.

Let every man use his liberty in political matters, as a right and a religious duty to God, and to his fellow-men. If he is bound to pray for rulers, he is bound to use his God-given right to select those rulers, where the providence of God has placed it in his power. Not to do so, is to make himself responsible for the evil he might have prevented by the exercise of that right; and it is to make his prayers for rulers a mockery, because they are not accompanied by corresponding works. Our remarks have nothing to do with such as are under a despotic reign, where they have no right to aid in the choice of rulers.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Feb. 27, 1866.

BR. STORRS:—Will a few words concerning an older portion of the field be distasteful or tedious to your readers, who reside at a distance from the field to which I refer?

The "Herald of Life" is fast coming to live, not only in the affections of its friends, but in the apprehension of its former opposers, as an institution which must be maintained and made successful. It is a fresh corps of fighting men brought upon the field of battle at the opportune moment, with well-timed appointments, and every Division, Brigade, Regiment, Battalion, Company, and Battery, in perfect order. I think of solid columns moving to the onset! It is awake to its mighty mission of "Life in Christ," and the enemy failing to meet us in open contest, I trust, will also fail to divert us from the grand object.

Certainly, young Generals, with obsolete ideas, cannot be expected to cope with the wisdom of years, when that embraces the advanced conceptions of progress and truth, with the counsel (which a wise officer will ever employ) of manhood and strength; as well as experience.

The position what is does the work! It is like Gen. Grant's. He has held his position before Petersburgh and Richmond, (a "masterly inactivity"), but the enemy has lost ground, and will lose all!

It does, indeed, seem a pity that our brethren do not all unite to push on the cause. There are divided interests; and, I fear, some of the "will" that does not present the most acceptable worship.

I was at Springfield, the 12th and 19th. Our friends in that old cradle of the doctrine of "Life only in Christ," and other kindred and important topics, are holding on, and will still keep open a place of worship; but their number is small. Only a few attend except the old confirmed believers in the doctrine. These faithful men and women, will still be found at their post. I had interesting seasons with them, and am happy to find that those who have identified themselves on the life theme, almost without an exception, are determined to stand for God and his truth, even if they die in the battle.

It's of no use cringing or whining after the luxuries of Egypt. We've enlisted, and the blessed Captain of our salvation wishes the banner of Life in the very van of the column; this is the honor he confers upon us; this, the labor that he expects us to perform. We'll on, then, to the thickest of the struggle, and and plant his standard on the silenced fortress of the foe.

I did not remain in Boston over the Sabbath, as was my intention, but came to this city for Sunday 26th; where we had a good hearing in the afternoon; the storm preventing attendance in the morning. The reason of my not staying in Boston was simply the fact of the time being employed in finishing up the effort on "Time," by Brn. Stevenson and Thurman, neither of whom were expected to be there.

I think the brethren in Providence have as good a prospect as they have had for some time; and hope they may keep the "unity of of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

And now allow me, dear brother, through the excellent "Herald," which we must all prize, to offer a word of exhortation to the flock.

The time movement will proceed. It may so proceed as to do the people no material injury, whether the position taken is right or wrong; and it may so proceed as to do incalculable injury, whether the Lord comes or not, at the stated time. Lecturing on time, however good in itself, can never take the place of preaching. We must have the word preached to save men. The great learning of the effort on the periods, we may grant, but the power of truth, is in the gospel.

Shall We have a Mission to Freedmen?

BR. STORRS:—In No. 17 of the Herald of Life are these words, "Who knows but that it will be our privilege as a people to carry the blessed tidings to the thousands in the South, whom the march of events is delivering from the wickedest and cruelest bondage the world ever saw?"

It is part of my faith, that this grand emancipation movement, which is going on under our eyes, is the harbinger of glorious opportunities to those who desire to carry joy and gladness to the hearts of the lowly ones of the earth. My whole being responds—amen. And for one, I hail with joy the prospect of being able to use my powers in redressing, in some slight measure, the great wrong done the colored man. From the time I was old enough to comprehend right and wrong, justice and injustice, to the present, I have been opposed to slavery. That is, I have believed, "God is no respecter of persons." Hence my whole being is thrilled with gladness that "Liberty has been proclaimed throughout all the land, to all the inhabitants thereof." Because others do not see on some points as I do, it does not follow that I must denounce them as having no religion, and refuse to take a paper in which there is, to me, unscriptural views, on some topics, sometimes published. Were I to do so, I should never take another paper. As you say, "To make such a war of words is no less criminal than to do it with any other carnal weapons."

Although I longed to see the downfall of "the sum of all villaines," slavery, still I could not see it my duty to go and use carnal weapons to speed its downfall. But now that God has caused the wrath of man to praise him, and in his own way caused the oppressed to go free, I feel an almost irresistible inclination to go and aid in educating them. Time in this age, I feel is short, and I would be found as a laborer, not as an idler. Myself and wife have had more than ordinary success as teachers in the States of New York, Iowa, and Missouri; together with this, I have have had a longing desire for years to become a missionary We have no family and can go at short notice. Now if you, or any Br., North or South, can tell me how I can get a situation where I can spend my strength in laboring for the despised race, and instil into their minds hopes beyond the grave, even the hope of unending life through Christ alone, I will be greatly obliged.

Yours for justice,
D. EDSON SMITH.

Vesper, Onon. Co., N. Y.

From John Goodwin 2d.

MARBLEHEAD, MASS. Feb. 12, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—Those tracts you gave me at the Conference in Boston, last October, I have read, and have put them in circulation, believing that the good seed thus sown will take root in some honest heart or hearts and spring up and bear fruit, even an hundred fold to the glory of God.

Yes, bless the good Lord, I do believe the glorious truths contained in them cannot fail to commend themselves to the minds and consciences of every lover of divine truth.

I have deferred writing until the present time, because I wanted to report the conversion of some to a knowledge of the truth; for I knew full well how it would gladden your heart to hear of impressions being made in this hard place. The leaven is at work, thank God, and I cannot doubt, for the truth is so good. O glory to God, how glad I am I ever heard the joyful sound. The question has been asked, What good has it ever done? I can answer, It has done me good. I have felt better ever since I heard it preached at Wilbraham in 1863; and this is not all, I have been trying to live better. I know it has done me good and I cannot help acknowledging it.

How Things Look To Me.

The sun is shining brightly, and it looks some like the breaking up of winter; and although I hail with joy the approach of spring, on some accounts, I shrink from it on others.

The prospect, as far as the war is concerned, is the darkest yet presented; and then the signs of the pestilence that "walketh in darkness" strays along unperceived but by those who fear the Lord; and famine, lean and gaunt, stands a little farther in the distance, waiting for its victims: and while in my imagination I fill up the sad picture, I remember we are admonished to watch and pray always, that ye may be able to escape all the things that are coming on the earth.

Does it mean the above named things? and if so, are we commanded to do any thing which is impossible?

When we reason from the word of God, it looks as though, if we follow the Lord fully, that we may escape.

We read, the Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish; and in another place, "His bread shall be given and his waters shall be sure." Are not such scriptures —and there are more of that class—a guarantee against starvation? And again; we read, when his own people provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images, he gave them over to the sword: and again; when they provoked him, the plague break in upon them.

JULIA A. DODGE.

Pawling, N. Y., Feb. 20.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—"Take no thought for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Here Jesus forbids his friends burdening themselves with imaginary evils in the future, and loading themselves with more evil than is laid on them to-day. As to war prospects, they have never been freer from darkness, for the nation, in four years than now. As to pestilence, there is no unusual appearance of it at present. As to famine, it seems farther off than usual; and only imagination seems to "fill up the picture" of such things. Let us be thankful for the abundance of every needful thing our gracious God is granting us, and strive cheerfully to trust him for the future; while we watch and pray, lest we enter into temptation from any quarter.

DAVID H. BAKER, Italia, Kansas, writes:—I believe it would be for the glory of the Master if an able exponent of the views we hold would make one of Paul's tours to this western country. It looks selfish, I think, for them to confine their labors to so small a territory as the New England States. When Christ said to Peter, feed my lambs—feed my sheep, I think he did not mean simply a few in and about Jerusalem. It was to all the nations—to every body. Had there been as much preaching on the life-views in the west as there has been in the eastern States, the subscription to our paper would now be three or four-fold more than it is. So it seems to me.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have no doubt Br. Baker is correct in these matters. Who that believes the life-views is willing to visit and work in the west. Any brother known, or having ability to present the truth on the subject, who will go west for six or eight months, with the sole view to labor on that subject as for the Lord, and not for selfish ends, we believe can be helped on his way and supported in that field. Br. J. Lewis is laboring in western Illinois, almost single handed, and with only one arm; yet his labors seem to be profitable to the people, as we hear a good report from friends there, who have been favored with his labors; and he has sent more subscribers to the Herald of Life than any one preacher in the east, except where names were collected at a Camp-meeting in Maine last fall. The West must have laborers. Will we do the work, or bring a dearth on ourselves by neglecting it? Shall the cry come up in vain for help there? The work must go on; and those who will not work for Christ and his truth may have the sad experience of barrenness in themselves. "Beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak."

CHARLES JONES, Lebanon, Ills., writes:—Although a stranger, I feel to address you by the familiar title of brother in our faith, and trust in Jesus, the great LIFE-GIVER to mankind. I long saw that the churches of the day were preaching a doctrine contrary to the word of God. When Br. LEWIS visited this place last spring, by God's grace, the way was opened for me to have the word made plain. The Herald of Life is now our weekly friend; and we almost envy the time given to Conference for the Brethren East, in which you take part; as the preacher of the truth, our weekly Herald, does not come to hand; and in our town, I am sorry to say, we have no meetings of like faith. I enclose $10. Please date my paper from the first of the present volume. I send one new subscriber from this date. The balance please send to Br. Lewis in tracts.

JAMES H. JACOBS, Freetown, N. Y., writes:—I send $2 for a new subscriber. I am trying to do what I can in spreading the truth of God's word. I am poor in this world's goods, but think I have strong faith in God and pray that I may be kept from the evil that is in the world. As often as I can, I try to preach the word of truth, life only to the righteous and of the reign of Christ on David's throne. The strongest opposers of the doctrine of life only through Christ are those who believe in the destruction of the wicked after a resurrection. They are not satisfied unless they can make Jesus give the wicked life from the dead. To me there is no good in such an idea. But the truth is gaining ground; for which I thank the Lord. I should be glad to spend at least half my time in publishing the truth; but this I can not do; for it takes most of my time to earn my bread.

L. N. OLMSTED, Hartford, Conn., writes:—The noble work in which you are engaged should be assisted by every lover of truth. Please find enclosed $2 for the "Tract and Army Fund." May the truth sown in Camp and battle-field do much good and prove a savor of life unto life to many souls.

CHAS. C. TUCK.

Died

In Woburn Center, Mass., DANIEL YOUNG, JR., son of Daniel and Betsey Young of Wakefield, N. H.; aged 39 years. He professed faith in 1842. His moral character up to the time of his change of mind was unspotted, and so he maintained his character until the day of his death, Jan. 17, 1865, when between the hours of eleven and twelve, A. M., he took his own life. This is the saddest part we have to pen. From the first of December up to the time of his death he complained of distress in mind and body; often he said to his beloved companion, I will not worry about the shop so much. He was a Patent-Leather dresser by trade; doing a good business and had no reasons whatever for committing the rash act, which we cangive. Notwithstanding we have hope in his death; for we have many reasons to think he was not in his right mind. He was a firm believer in the second coming of Christ and the sleep of the dead, and literal resurrection. We have had many a sweet season with him in prayer and conference meetings: have heard him speak of his hope in the glorious gospel of Christ. He was taken from his home in Woburn to his father's residence to be interred in the family lot; there to sleep until the resurrection morn. We commend his afflicted wife and numerous friends to the Lord, who has said, Cast thy burdens upon the Lord, for he careth for you.

The Review of Luther Lee.

The article in this number ends that Review. It is a perfect cure for all such works as Lee's, Landis', Mattison's, Bishop Clark's, the late writer's in Zion's Herald, and all others of like character. Several have expressed a wish that the Review of Lee by HOMO could be reproduced in pamphlet. The expense at the present time makes it unadvisable to do it. Should the demand be such as to warrant it hereafter, it can soon be re-issued.

W. S. CAMPBELL will preach as follows:
NEW YORK, (at Botanic Hall, 68 East Broadway) Sundays March 5th and 12th; and at Cooper Institute (Room 24) Tuesday evenings the 7th and 14th.

S. W. BISHOP will preach in,
PAWLING, N. Y., Thursday evening, March 2d, and over Sunday the 5th.
ALBANY, N. Y., Sunday, March 12th.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

A Word to Correspondents.

"Each writer is required to state his own views on the topic he takes up, without a direct personal controversy with any other writer in our columns. This course does not restrict liberty of expression, but will save personal feelings."

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted intheir design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening; afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That LEONARD C. THORNE act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction, defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, it he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy —more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

GOG AND MAGOG.

BY H. J. SWEETLAND.

In the Crisis of Feb 14, I notice some questions put by O. T. Hobbs, and an attempt made to answer them by Eld. Grant. Whether O. T. H. is satisfied with the answer or not, I know not, but to my mind they are not correctly answered.

Ques. 1. "Is the Gog and Magog of Rev. xx. 8 the same Gog and Magog of Ezek. xxxviii. 2?" &c.

In answer to this question, it is replied that the Gog of Rev. xx. 8 performs the work there specified a thousand years after the first resurrection; and that Gog and Magog there mentioned are the resurrected wicked dead. Now, I would ask, is not satan bound during the thousand years for the express purpose that he shall not deceive the nations during that space of time? or, in other words, if satan were not bound, would not he be liable to deceive the nations during the thousand years as well as either before or after that time? If so, how could the resurrected wicked [admitting their resurrection, which I do not believe] compose those nations liable to be deceived? To me, the idea can not be admitted. Again, if the wicked are raised, where is the first text to prove that they are formed into nations [plural] after they are raised to be judged and killed again?

I will now state a number of dissimilarities, to show that the Gog of Ezekiel and that of Revelation cannot have their career ot one and the same time in the history of the world. First: it is evident that the Gog of Ezekiel is composed of nations that now exist on the earth, and are alive at the time of the advent. They are gathered in the latter days; Ezek. xxxviii. 16; and come up on the mountains of Israel into the land that is brought back from the sword, against inhabitants newly returned, who inhabit a land of unwalled villages, [no city built yet] having neither bars nor gates, &c. This is not far from the time of the advent. It is before Ezekiel's city is built; for Zechariah, prophesying of this city, or temple of the city, says, That the man whose name is the BRANCH shall build the temple of the Lord. Zech. vi. 12, 13.

The Gog of Ezekiel goes up to take a spoil, to a people gathered out of the nations; which is Israel restored in this age or the commencement of the one to come; to carry away silver and gold [wonder if the wicked raised from the dead will go into dealing with silver and gold and take away cattle, goods, &c.] when the people of Israel dwell safely.

Again, will the wicked when raised, a thousand years after the Lord comes, gather into armies, ride upon horses, a great company, and a mighty army? Does this look rational? What a theory this presents. This is at that day when there is a great shaking in the land of Israel, and every man's sword shall be against his brother. And this is at the time that the Lord will be known in the eyes of many nations [the Lord here is known by nations who are distinct from Gog] and they shall know that I am the Lord. Ezek. xxxviii. 23.

I am satisfied, with what I am capable of investigating, that Russia, together with some other powers, will compose the Gog and Magog of Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. In chapter xxxix. Gog is represented as being turned back, and but a sixth part left. [Query: will there be a sixth part of the wicked, raised to life, left after they are raised?] In that day the Lord will make his holy name known among his people, Israel; and he will not let them pollute his name any more. This is Israel gathered from their scattered state. And the heathen shall know that he is the Lord.

Eld. Grant does not take the position in his reply, that this has been fulfilled. This is true. Neither has the city of Ezekiel been built, that we may locate it in the past. If so, I want the history presented that the fact may be proved. This ought to have been done in reply to O. T. H., or the question is not answered.

Now, to discriminate between Ezekiel and Revelation, First: The Gog and Magog of Ezekiel come from the "north parts:" Ezek. xxxviii. 15, and xxxix. 2. The Gog and Magog of Revelation come from the four quarters or are in the four quarters of the earth. Second: Ezekiel's Gog comes against a land of unwalled villages, having neither bars nor gates. But the Gog of Revelation compass the camp of the saints and beloved city that has been built a thousand years. Third: The career of Ezekiel's Gog is in the latter days of this age; while the career of the Gog of Revelation does not exist until a thousand years of a future age have passed away. [I state this upon Eld. Grant's position.] Fourth: There is a space of seven years required to gather and burn the weapons of the army of Ezekiel, while no such thing is mentioned in Revelation. Fifthly: the army of Ezekiel are gathered and buried in graves, and seven months are occupied in burying them in order to cleanse the land; while the Gog of Revelation is destroyed by fire from heaven, and nothing said about gathering or burying them. Ezekiel says, that seven months are occupied in searching out the land to cleanse it; and if a bone is found, there shall be a sign set up by it till all has been buried in the valley of Hamon-Gog; and at that time the Lord will set his glory among the heathen [a distinct people from Israel] and the heathen will see the judgment which the Lord has executed upon the army of Gog.

No one can take the position that the Gog of Ezekiel and Revelation are one, without admitting nations and heathen in existence who are saved; consequently have probation during the thousand years. Without regard to the city it is equally evident that both are yet to exist in the future, if that of Revelation is literal. It appears to me that the statement ought not to be made, that the city of Ezekiel is to be located in the past, without sufficient evidence produced to prove it. The vision of Ezekiel concerning the city was long after its destruction in the days of Nebuchadnezzar; and it could not have been the one built by the decree of Cyrus; for that does not answer that of Ezekiel by any means. It was to be built in the latter days: same latter days of Ezekiel's Gog's existence. It is to be built for the Lord, where he shall place his throne to dwell in.

The temple built by the returned captives stood upon Mount Moriah in Jerusalem; but by reading Ezekiel it appears that the temple to be built in the future will be upon a more lofty mountain, north of the city. I gather this from reading the xlviii. chapter, where the inheritance is laid out for the Twelve Tribes.

This prophecy is said to be exceedingly difficult, to this day, in the mind of an Israelite. The prophet was charged to set his heart to all that was showed to him, and to pay the greatest possible attention thereto; and also to declare it all to the house of Israel; which proves that it will surely be built; for to this day they do not understand it; and they even forbid any to read this vision until they are 30 years of age, esteeming it the most difficult of all the prophecies; and indeed nothing else than the idea of its being exactly fulfilled can ever make it to be thoroughly understood.

CELESTA.

FROM D. EDSON SMITH.

No. 4 of the "Day Star" is out; and one page is devoted to "Facts about Celesta, and Facts about D. E. Smith." P. E. Armstrong says:

"And as many of what he (D. E. S.) calls facts are either false or highly falsecolored, and meets my flat denial, I will rebut his false facts with real facts about himself."

Now I say that what P. E. A. calls facts "are either false or highly falsecolored." Now there are grave charges on both sides, and both can not be right. How are the jury to decide? First examine the spirit of each communication, and see which breathes the most of charity, honest, and simple truth; and which the most of sarcasm, irony, lightness, and mysticism. Next examine the kind of testimony and the character of the witnesses. In my article I stated that the most conclusive evidence was, that all who had been to Celesta saw the matter in a somewhat similar light as myself. And that I stated the truth is proven by the public testimony of W. Hicks, George and Sanford Hart, S. L. Manley, and W. Y. Patterson, in late Nos. of the Crisis The main argument of P. E. A. is an attempt to prove me a "lazy, office aspiring, malicious defrauding, lying scandalizer;" and therefore my testimony is of no worth. I know I am an erring mortal, and if I am as bad as represented (which I doubt) I pray our Heavenly Father to open my eyes, and aid me in reforming. P. E. A. brings forward two witnesses, Giles Russell and D. D. Lathrop. At present I can bring nothing of a convincing nature to a jury to rebut the testimony of Giles Russell, but thank God, I have just received a private letter from D. D. Lathrop which will be of much weight in the trial. He says:

"BR. EDSON:—After you went away, Peter told many things about you that I thought must be true. That accounts for some things I said in the Day Star concerning you; but as I have since discovered the cloven foot, I have reason to doubt what has been written against you. I ask your forgivness for all I have said amiss. The type was set up before my eyes were opened. We hope to depart from this wilderness next week. . . . Sister Heaton will probably go soon. She is very anxious to go. The last one has got dissatisfied."

Many pages might be filled with unmentioned facts going to prove that the Celesta movement is a "fatal snare;" but as only a small number of the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE are interested, I say no more at present; for if the testimony already given is not sufficient, they will not be convinced short of practical experience.

NOTE BY EDITOR.—We think, Br. Smith, the better way is, to pay no more attention to Celesta, unless to answer private letters.

FROM A. F. SERVICE.

BR. STORRS:—Having in my travels seen and perused several Nos. of the "Herald of Life," I confess myself well pleased with its general character. The open and fearless manner of its contributors, as well as the policy of its Editor, is praiseworthy. Setting forth sentiments sustained by the bible, although unpopular with the masses, and till recently unknown to them, is a work worthy the commendation of every lover of truth. To keep a paper open for a fair and full discussion of all Bible subjects, so that truths hitherto unknown, and destined to be neglected and ignored, may have the importance attached to them by the candid which the Law-giver intended, is noble, christian, and doubtless well pleasing to God. In this respect, the Herald is the only religious paper coming under my notice, whose columns is practically given for such a purpose. Hope there will be no subsequent restraint and truth languish in consequence.

The non-revival of the wicked dead, I discover, is claiming a share of notice from those who write for the Herald: a subject upon which I had bestowed but little thought until the last year. Some, I see, have passed a resolution not to give tolerance to a doctrine so subversive of the christian faith. If it is a doctrine so dangerous, and without foundation in the scriptures, in my opinion, the better way will be to show from the bible its untenableness, as we have been able to do in respect to other subjects.

The result of my own investigation in this direction is, a hearty embracing of the non-living of the wicked dead, as a part of the gospel of the kingdom of God. The unprejudiced everywhere embrace it, when we preach the penalty of the law, without a labored argument to prove that the wicked will live again. Many inquire, "Why have we not seen this before?" With equal propriety we might inquire, why have we not seen ere this, all there is in the bible? Why do not all see that the Most High God made this earth, and man to inhabit it, through the angels? through whom also, all the revelation to our race has come; no man having seen the great God at any time? Why not see at once, that the Holy Spirit that Christ promised should teach the apostles, was an angel? and close every avery avenue to Spiritualism, and let fall out every seeming contradiction in the bible? Knowing that "sin is the transgression of the law," and "where no law is, there is no transgression," and that God is no respector of persons," why not see that "His ways are equal?" Hence every soul of Adam's race, will have an opportunity, in some one of the ages of probation, to secure eternal life?

Why not see that there will be one hundred years probation to every soul, in the one thousand years blessing to the world? and that by a parity of reasoning, the "little season" will be one hundred years long for a like purpose? Why not see that the "rest of the dead" will comprise all who have not heard the gospel? namely, infants, idiots, heathen, and comparatively good people? Seeing this class will be raised at the commencement of the "little season," and judged at the close thereof, why not see that such do develop characters during that age? and the disobedient can and will die a second death? Why not see that the first death to such a class [being only a consequence upon Adam's transgression] is no more a reward to them, than death is the reward of the righteous? There being no sting in the death of either class, as in the death of the sinner; being a mortal poison to the latter, from which he can never recover? Why not see, too, that "death and the grave [being only conditions] having died [been abolished] when the saints rise therefrom, will die a second time when the rest of the dead rise therefrom? Why not see that the books and second death belong exclusively to the "little season," and to those on trial therein? So I believe and so I preach.

Yours for the whole truth.

I HEARD SINGING TO-NIGHT.

"I'll tell you what, I heard singing to-night that made me wish I was in heaven, or good enough to go there," said an old backwoodsman to his wife, as, entering their log hut, he sat down to his evening meal. "Where did you hear it?" she asked. "At our neighbor's, up yonder. They must feel some thing I don't know about or they couldn't sing so."

"When they first came here," said the wife, "I thought they were proud and stiff; but they are real good neighbors; and I heard they were good folks, too." "Well," said he, "I mean to go to church to-morrow, and see if I can't hear some singin' like that."

"The singer knew that her neighbors were ignorant, rough, and unbelieving, nearing the decline of life, and unwilling to be approached on the subject of religion. The old wife especially was so nearly a heathen that she would never enter a church, never allow the visit of a minister, nor listen to the reading of God's word or even to the singing of a hymn. The man was a poor but honest day laborer, who had ruined his worldly affairs by indulgence in strong drink, but had been lifted out of the pit, and been sober for many years. Still he was a rough, swearing man, and his heart unsoftened by any religious influences.

One glorious summer evening, as the sun was going down, the lady seated herself at the door, and involuntarily tuned her voice to Mrs. Hemans' sweet vesper song, "Come to the sunset tree." She felt the spirit of the heavenly words, and sang with fervor. When near the close of the hymn, she cast her eyes to the field where her neighbor was at work, and saw that he was listening intently. Instantly the thought flashed into her mind, "Oh if I could raise that poor man to think of heaven." She closed her refrain, and then commenced, "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," singing it "with the spirit and the understanding also." The firmament above her foreshadowed the glories of that state described by the hymn, and the beauty of the green earth reminded her of the pastures above where the redeemed are walking by the river of life. And as she sang the old man listened almost spell-bound. The singer did not wish to call admiration of her full-toned voice; she wished to glorify God by leading one of his creatures to think of him. "I will sing to God's praise whenever he can hear me, and perhaps he may be led to praise the Lord himself," was her mental resolve.

The next Sabbath the old man was at church. This cheered the lady, and she said, "I will sing whenever he comes." Ere another week was closed he was at work again. This time she sang

"Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me."

Slowly, distinctly, she sang, that he might take in the full meaning of the words, and feeling their sweet pathos in her inmost soul, she poured out all the hymn. The listener shook his head, and rubbed his hand quickly over his eyes.

The next Sabbath evening he was among the praying people of God, earnestly inquiring for the way of salvation. The singer had sowed; and earnestly asked the Lord to make him one of his own children. It may be that other influences led him to the house of God, and to think of his soul, but certainly God has blessed the voice of music as one of his instruments.

Seeking further to do good, the lady encouraged his poor ignorant wife in many friendly ways, and one day invited her into the parlor to hear her piano. She had never seen nor heard such an instrument, and was wonder-struck. The lady called her daughters to her side, and all joined in singing, "All hail the power of Jesus' name" in old Coronation.

"Do you like that?" said the lady.

"Oh, it's nice. I believe I heard that tune somewhere when I was a girl, but I've forgot."

"Probably you heard it at church. It is often sung there. We can not sing the praises of Jesus too often, for he came to save us poor sinners." Then they all sang, "Come, humble sinner, in whose breast," etc. The woman rose and said she must go, and was invited to come again. "Oh, I'll come often if I can hear you sing."

"Mother, you take a strange way to win souls; do you think you will succeed?"

"Why not, my daughter? Has not God commanded that whatsoever we do shall be done to his glory? And if he has given us voices to sing, should we not use them in his service? There are many who will listen to a hymn for the sake of the tune, who will not hear a word from the Bible. Our voices and our musical instruments should all be employed in winning lost souls."

OUR ELLIE.

When I was twelve years of age I went to spend a few months with an older sister who was married and resided in the city of H., in a neighboring state. This was a great change for me, for my home had always been in the country,—my play-house, some beautiful, quiet nook, under the large old trees that shaded the banks of the Quinnebaug which ran near my father's house, or else among the grey rocks in the groves and forests, where I often rambled to gather wild flowers, mossess or nuts, and countless other treasures which were stored there. Often I stopped to peep into curious bird-nests, catching a glimpse of beautifully colored eggs, and watching day after day for the appearance of tiny little birds, which as they grew older, it was my delight to feed with berries. My playmates, (for there were no children in our family near my own age,) were generally my dog and kitten, and every other animal with which I came in contact, that I could tame or pet, my imagination supplying any others I might wish for, so I was always happy.

This new city home was very unlike my other, but I found plenty of friends, and then there was always some thing new every day to interest and please a child.

But the great event which most interested me, was the birth of a little neice—the first in our family. It was a pleasant September morning when I first heard of it. I was visiting a friend in the city when my brother-in law came for me with the news that a little girl-baby had come to live with us. You may believe that my visit ended very suddenly and without much ceremony, and that on my way home I did not stop to notice any thing that might otherwise have attracted my attention.

But that baby. No doubt it was very much like other babies, and laughed and cried and ate and slept like others, but you must not suppose for a moment that I thought so. I, who had never had a baby before to play with, who had not even a baby relative any where, and who had often walked a long distance to just look at some little stranger baby in the neighborhood. And this was ours; our little Ellie, and I could look at and play with her and take care of her as much as I pleased. Her little round soft face, with its bright dark eyes, her dainty mouth, that I was almost afraid to kiss, her tiny fingers with their perfect little nails, and her cunning feet, (for what child does not like to look at a baby's feet?) were ever a perfect wonder to me. Indeed, I do not think I was the only one who looked upon her with such curious eyes, if I may judge from all I heard and saw; and even my mother, who was there to welcome her first grandchild, and who ought to know, for she had had seven babies of her own, seemed to think that this was the most wonderful of all.

After a few months I returned to my home in the country, but when warm weather came, my sister brought little Ellie to spend some weeks with us, and I was never so happy as when drawing her in her baby carriage or exhibiting her wondrous beauty and intelligence to others. But I shall make my story too long if I stop to tell all I could about her, and how every year, as she came to visit us, we became more and more attached to her; and finally we all removed to the same place, where we could see her much of the time. It seems as if even now, through all these years, I could hear her sweet childish voice singing her little hymns, or see those busy little fingers that ever would be trying to do what older ones did. To be sure, in process of time there were other neices, and nephews too, born into the family, who were dearly loved, but none ever seemed to me just like our Ellie.

When she was about seven years old we were again separated, she at that time removing with her parents to Philadelphia, and about a year later, she was made very happy by having a little sister for a companion. We used to visit her in her far-off home, and she ever found a welcome among her New England friends, with whom she spent many pleasant weeks every year; and who saw that she was growing up to be all that her early childhood gave promise of, or that they could desire. She early gave her heart to the Saviour, and became deeply interested in his service, and her many lovely traits of character only seemed the lovelier after receiving the crowning grace of piety. As she grew older she manifested a peculiar attachment for her mother, often remarking to her, as she was going out, that she much preferred her society to that of her young friends, with whom she was most intimate. Her father almost idolized her and spared no pains or expense in her education, she devoting much time to the study of music, for which she early evinced a taste and in which she excelled.

I wish you could have seen our Ellie as she visited me at my own home, just before her nineteenth birthday. I think you would have agreed with me that there was some thing about her appearance very graceful and queenly, yet there was no hautines or vanity. She was the picture of health, and one would hardly think as they looked at her full rounded form that it would ever grow thin, or the rose on her cheek and lip would fade and the bright, expressive eye be dimmed. Accompanying her was a young man to whom she expected to be married the coming winter, and we all felt satisfied that her affections were bestowed on one every way worthy of them. I shall not soon forget her look as on leaving us, she said sportingly, referring to her intended marriage, "Aunt Louisa, this is the last you will see of Ellie H."

They returned to Philadelphia, and early in October we learned that Ellie was sick. At first only a cold, resulting in slow fever, from which she only partially recovered, leaving her with a cough and other symptoms which at once aroused the anxiety of her friends. All that affection could devise was done for her restoration to health; but she seemed gradually, and almost imperceptibly, to grow weaker. She was impressed with the idea that she should never be well again, and though all the while preparations for the approaching marriage were being made, and friends came to assist her, yet she seemed the least interested of any one. Her Physician recommended travelling and a change for her, and, as after her marriage she intended to visit her friends in the East again, it was thought best to hasten the time. The 13th of January was chosen for the wedding, and hundreds of invitations were sent out, while among many, costly presents were being prepared for the young bride.

A little more than two weeks before the appointed time, her father, a man who had always enjoyed good health, was suddenly stricken down by sickness of an alarming nature, which continued to increase, notwithstanding the skill of Physicians, the care of sympathizing friends, and the attention of a devoted wife were called into requisition. He was unconscious of of all. A gloom filled the house and every heart saddened as the conviction fastened upon it, that he must die. Ellie alone was calm, but it seemed almost like the calmness of death, and she appeared to have no desire or will of her own. The wedding invitations were recalled, and friends and Physicians being consulted, it was thought best that Ellie should be quietly married while her father yet lived. Accordingly, on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 11th, Dr. B., the father of her intended husband, who was a minister, brought his family,—the friends in the house were called together, and the ceremony was performed, Ellie being arrayed in only a loose wrapper, as she had arisen from her sofa, where she reclined much of the time. It was a solemn occasion, and seemed much more like a funeral than a wedding; all present with the exception of Ellie, being affected to tears On Tuesday morning, the 13th, her father died, and from that time Ellie failed; and by no means whatever could a ray of hope be inspired in her heart. Yet she was cheerful and never once referred to the change in her bright prospects, nor complained of any thing, but gratefully acknowledged every little act of kindness performed by her husband and mother, who so devotedly watched over her.

Sometimes she spoke of her Saviour, of his presence, and of rest, and once remarked to her mother, "How precious those words of Jesus are, Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest."

For a time, in the latter part of March, her symptoms appeared more favorable, and a kind of hope began to spring up in the hearts of her friends, and even her Physician thought that possibly she might remain with them through the warm months. One day early in April she walked from her chamber into a sitting-room on the same floor, and looked at her birds and plants, she once loved to care for, and then sat down to her favorite instrument, her mother supporting her, while she softly ran her fingers over the keys and played a plaintive air; then returned to her room. In two days after, our Ellie was dead. Her husband's friends, in their anxiety for her recovery, had long urged her to try a new Physician, the one employed in their family; but to this both Ellie and her mother were opposed, but at length she reluctantly consented on condition, that if after a short trial she received no benefit, she might return to the old course of treatment. The trial proved fatal, and her husband was almost frantic when he found all his fondest hopes thus suddenly destroyed.

For the first time, Ellie was arrayed in her costly bridal robes, and prepared for her burial. Hundreds came to look at her, that bride of twelve short weeks,—now the bride of death. Too fair and lovely she looked, to be laid away in the tomb; but all the love of friends could not hold her back; so they covered her with her beautiful veil and shut up all that had been so pleasant to look upon, and carried her to Laurel Hill, to rest beside her father, and where, a few years after, her dear mother was also laid to await the dawn of that morning when the voice of Jesus shall awake all who sleep in Him, to die no more for ever. The cold grave hath in its keeping many a precious gem, and much that was once so lovely has there become food for worms.

And here after so many years, which seem but a few fleeting days as I look back upon them, I sit and write out for you, the story of our Ellie. I have an object in doing so. It is to remind you that every thing earthly must have an end. That tho' friends be many, and wealth and happiness be our portion here, they can not give lasting peace,—they can not save from death.

How necessary that while we have opportunity, we seek after and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thus becoming united to him by faith, if we fall asleep, our life being hid with him will be secure, and at the last day, "when he who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." There will be no death nor tears, no parting and no graves in the world to come.

AUNT LOUISA.

Obituary.

With a sad heart, I take up my pen to inform you of the sudden death of my dear father, WILLIAM RIDER. He was 74 years of age, a man of uncommon activity, and always cheerful and happy. He left his home in his usual good spirits on the morning of the 6th of January, to go into the woods alone to chop, as he was wont to do, and had done thousands of times in his life, and in falling a tree upon which another had lodged the day before, he received a blow which caused his sudden and shocking death. His neck was broken, killing him instantly!! He was not found until sunset [though he was killed a short time after he went into the woods] as no one felt alarmed about him until his usual time to return home. He was a man beloved by all who knew him, and it was a sleepless night throughout the whole neighborhood. You can judge of the horror and loneliness of my poor mother on that night, without a child near her to comfort her, and all the sons they had living, in the army. But notwithstanding we are greatly afflicted by the death of a husband and father, yet we sorrow not as those who have no hope. My father and mother were both firm believers in "no life out of Christ." They were both immersed some ten years since, by our much esteemed brother, R. V. Lyon. He will be shocked by this sad intelligence, and he may be quickened by it, to renewed diligence in the cause of his divine Master. It was through his instrumentality, that we, as a family, were brought from the darkness of tradition, into the glorious light of God's truth.

I humbly trust my father sleeps in Jesus] "Blessed sleep, from which none ever wake to weep." "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so, them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

May this sudden death admonish all the household of faith, of the necessity of doing with our might what our hands find to do. I had hoped my father would live to see the coming of our glorious King. May we who survive him, "be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." ABBY A. PERRY.

ON THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL

BY THOMAS READ.

We will now more closely scrutinize the powers of the soul. "I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say." It has been ascertained by direct and numerous experiments, that for the production of any mental, or moral action, there is required a body, brain, nerve fibre, which is a modified form of brain, and bright arterial blood. The nerve fibres are insulated from other nerves by a covering of fat. When any muscle or organ is in action, a double current of electricity passes from the blood in the minute arteries in the brain, along the nerves, which rae arranged in pairs, producing the required thought or action of the will. That memory is produced by the power that a certain organ of the brain possesses of registering the impressions made by the nerves, conveying sensations from the eye and the other senses. The voltaic circuit in man is exactly balanced, and does not act without some impression to set in motion the electric current. The arterial or oxygenized corpuscles of blood, propelled from the heart, after having passed through the lungs, are admirably adapted to effect this purpose; and when one is in contact with each minute nerve fibre, no current can take place; but the moment one is removed, or acted upon by any outward impression, or by heat, light, or other forces, a strong voltaic battery is formed.

The beating of the heart which contracts with a force of 400 lbs, seems to be effected without nerve fibre, and consequently is not subject to the will. Thus the blood is the source of all life, of all mental and moral actions. And thus is the scripture demonstrated to be true, that "The soul or life of the flesh is in the blood, and the blood is the life." And "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." The heart, being the centre of the circulation of the blood, is the source of moral action, and the seat of the emotions, and therefore; "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness." "Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, envyings" and such like. With the heart man loves; therefore the precepts to "love the Lord thy God with all thy heart," and to "keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life."

Thus we find that all the functions of animal life; all the sensations of sight, feeling; all the processes of reason; the registration of impressions, as memory; all muscular action, and other phenomena of life; are voltaic effects, and are entirely obedient to material laws. That the soul, or life has no independent conscious existence, apart from the organs that produce thought, feeling, and action; and therefore that life, mind, memory, thought, reason, and conciousness, are physical phenomena, and cease at death. And therefore, because the organs of thought are destroyed, "The dead know not anything." Therefore, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." And man must be organized again, before he can think, see, or feel again, which will not take place till the resurrection. Thus we see how admirably the book of nature authenticates the book of revelation.

Again; though man is composed of soul, body, and spirit; yet the soul is not the man; the body is not the man; and the spirit is not the man; but the whole united, constitute the man. And any one of these, separated from the others, cannot have life, or consciousness.

THE WHOLE MAN, SAVE THE BREATH, PROCEEDS FROM THE PARENTS.

1. Pet. i. 23. Being [begotten] again, not of corruptible seed; but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever. That which is born of the flesh, is flesh, [and not spirit,] therefore, before men can have a title to everlasting life, ye must be born again, [of the Spirit.] Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob. Gen. xlvi 26. All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins. . . . all the souls were threescore and six.

As the term Isaac includes a soul, souls were begotten by corruptible seed, and therefore mortal and corruptible. The soul is therefore an attribute of the flesh and properly denominated the carnal mind, mortal and corruptible. That the mind is born of the flesh is demonstrated by the similarity of intellectual powers and dispositions, transmitted from parents to children.

This is further demonstrated from the fact that all eminently great minds, as David, Solomon, Webster, Franklin and Wesley, were born when their parents were of mature age.

THE MEMBERS, OR ORGANS OF THE MIND ARE FLESH.

To be carnally minded is death. Col. ii. 18. The worshipper of angels is "vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind." 1 Cor. ii. 14. The [animal] man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God.

It cannotbe too strongly impressed upon the mind of the reader, that though material is very properly opposed to immaterial; yet that in the scriptures, there is no such thing as immaterial, or immateriality, as implying existence, mentioned, or even alluded to; and that matter in the scriptures, is never contrasted with spirit. But the word spirit and spiritual are always contrasted with such words as carnal, flesh, fleshy, animal, natural, and with man in his natural state when uninfluenced by the Spirit of God. And that spirit, and spiritual; when contrasted with the carnal, natural, animal, and fleshy, invariably mean the Spirit of God, and not our own spirits. That our own spirits, being a part of our animal natures; when not subjected to Christ; are always on the side of animal enjoyments; or else brought into bondage to them. That is, the reason and the judgment, either sanction unrestricted animal enjoyment; or condemning or disapproving of it, yet submit. The passions of the men who will not have Christ to rule over them are stronger than their reason and judgment.

They know what's right and do approve it too,
Condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.

We give a few examples, proving that moral powers, and even will are attributed to the flesh; and that the influence of the Spirit of God in man is contrasted with the whole animal nature of man comprising his soul, body, and spirit.

Gal. v. 19. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, ... idolatry, hatred, wrath, envyings, murders, revelling, and such like. The operation of the Spirit of God, produces an opposite manifestation from the same flesh. John i. 13. Which were born not of of the will of the flesh. This implies that the flesh can will. Gen. vi. 3. My spirit shall not always strive with man, for he also is flesh. 2 Cor. x. 4. For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, are not the offspring of our unassisted minds. Rom. viii. 6. For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace; because the carnal mind is enmity against God. 13. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: [the second death:] but if ye through the Spirit [of God] do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live [for ever.] Mat. xvi. 17. Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee.

James iii. 14. But if ye have bitter envying, and strife in your hearts, glory not and lie not against the truth. This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly [animal] devilish. 1 Cor. xv. 44. It is sown a [soul-body or an animal body:] it is raised a [spirit-body.] 46. That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is [animal;] and afterward that which is spiritual. Heb. iv. 12. For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword, piercing even to the dividing assunder the soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

The scriptures show that all the passions and emotions, with all the faculties of the soul are fleshy, and are produced by the body, and are not independent of it. And that when good moral qualities or actions are spoken of as resulting from the spirit; it does not mean from our own spirits, but from the Spirit of God.

The flesh loves, and hates, rejoices, fears, trembles, grieves, desires, wills, chooses, and perfoms all the opertions of mind. Do you say flesh means the unregenerate man? Granted. But the unregenerate man is a man without the Spirit of God. That the exertion of those powers of the soul, said to be the fruits of the Spirit, proceed from the Spirit of God influencing our moral natures.

Again, certain moral emotions are ascribed to particular parts of the man; to the heart, reins, bowels, spleen.

Ps. lxxiii. 21. Thus was my heart grieved, and I was pricked in my reins. Rev. ii. 23. I am he that searcheth the reins and hearts. Jer. xxxi. 20. My bowels are troubled for him; I will surely have mercy upon him. Lu. i. 78. Through the [bowels of the] mercy of our God. Col. iii. 12. Put on. . . . bowels of mercies. 1 John iii. 17. But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? Prov. xii. 10. The [bowels] of the wicked are cruel.

Who that has acutely felt the emotions of pity, sympathy, mercy, or compassion, does not feel the propriety of ascribing them to the bowels? Again: the faculties of the soul are represented as residing in many members.

Job. xvii. 7, Mine eye is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members [or thoughts] are as a shadow. Rom. vi. 12. Let not sin reign in your mortal body. 13. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin; but yield your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. Rom. vi. 19. For as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. Col. iii. 5. Mortify, therefore your members which are upon the earth; covetousness, &c. 1 Cor. xii. 26. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it. James iv. 1. From "whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?

Though some of these texts may be susceptible of a different interpretation, yet we think that some of them very clearly ascribe certain moral actions to certain members of the body. In 1 Cor. xii. 17 hearing and smelling are called members of the body. Seeing, feeling, hearing, smelling, and thinking, are equally members of the body. But these faculties are parts of the mind. Therefore the mind is an attribute of the body.

THE IMMORTAL SOUL LOCATED.

It has been no small puzzle to the believers in the popular view to determine in what part of the human system that invisible and unimaginable entity called the immortal soul, has its special abode. Most persons, we presume, if requested to designate, as nearly as possible its invisible dwelling-place, would lay their hand upon their breast. But it has been decided that it has fixed its residence "higher up;" namely, in the head, or rather that it is confined there; for the soul itself seems not to be a free agent in this matter. We will listen to Dr. Fitch on this subject. He says:

"The first chamber I will notice, is the skull. This is a dark chamber, remarkable for being the room in which the brain is located; and it is also remarkable for the place where mind and matter meet. In the brain resides that inscrutable and awful being, the human soul. The eye does not see, the ear does not hear; all the senses are only means and instruments that convey knowledge to the soul. The soul is imprisoned in this dark chamber. Its food is knowledge. No man can explain, no man comprehend it. It is an emanation from the Most High; and in control, holds the same relation to man's body that the Almighty does to it. Imprisoned now, it will one day leave its prison-house, and wing its way to immortality."—Fitch's Lectures, pp. 22, 23.

"The eye does not see, the ear does not hear," says our worthy Doctor. Then it is the immortal soul that does all these things; and as a corollary we may add, that wherever there is seeing, hearing, etc., somewhere behind those operations lies an immortal soul. But animals have eyes and ears; therefore we are borne by this theory to the conclusion, that every individual brute, peregrinating on four legs, more or less, bears about an immortal soul shut up in its head! Will immortal-soulists feel flattered by the introduction of this class of associates? Will they any more accuse us of degrading man to a level with the brute, when their own theory brings them to the same level? All we contend for is that Solomon was correct when he declared that in respect to death and its concomitants, man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; and their own theory, prop it up as they will, when legitimately carried out, leads to the same results, and they cannot avoid it; for beasts are endowed more or less with all these attributes, upon which they rely to prove immortality in man.

But we are told that this immortal soul is "imprisoned in this dark chamber," the skull. The question at once arises, what keeps it in this prison? If the soul is of itself an entity distinct from the body, and vastly freer in its operations without than with it, why does it not leave? What holds it in the body? How is it fastened? Any man who was imprisoned, imprisoned not from any fault of his, and under no obligations which would make it criminal for him to leave, would be considered very foolish, if he did not leave. Are the immortal souls of popular theology such imbecile or stupid things that they cannot act as wisely? Or is the body superior to the soul so that it can hold it in its prison at pleasure; and so that the soul must needs wait till the body is relaxed in death, before, like trembling fugitive, it can slip out!

But we are digressing. These are independent questions having a field of their own, and inviting separate investigation. We only took our pen to congratulate our friends of the popular view, on having settled this much of their theory, that the mysterious inhabitant of their bodies is imprisoned in the skull. Let them take heed, lest at some unlucky moment their prisoner should "break jail," and leave them in the lurch.—Sel.

THE SECOND PERSONAL PRONOUN.

The following article from the pen of Br. J. S. White, I have copied from a number of the Crisis, published in 1861. It is worth reading, and may help to remove some seeming difficulties out of the way of those who are earnestly and honestly searching for truth. L. J. BEACH.

THE SCRIPTURAL USE OF THE SECOND PERSONAL PRONOUN.

Jesus said to the high priest, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Matt. xxvi. 64.

There is no proof here, that the high priest, to whom this language was speken, will be alive when the Lord comes, or that he in person will ever see the Lord. This passage fails to show that there will ever be a resurrection from the dead of either good or bad. All through the bible we find the second person used to designate a class. See the 27 28, 29, and 30th chapters of Deut. "When ye shall pass over Jordan." Then Moses goes on to tell them what they should do after they should come into the land, using the words, thee, thou, ye and you, extending on for nearly two thousand years. Not you individuals who hear me speak to-day, but ye, or you—the Jews. So in the New Testament. Matt. xxiv. 33, "So likewise ye when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near." 44th verse—"Therefore be ye also ready." Matt. xxviii. 20—"Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Luke xxi. 31—"So likewise ye, when ye shall see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." 1 Thess. v. 4, —"But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." That is, ye or you brethren, who may be alive at that time. So Christ spoke to the high priest as a Jew—"Hereafter shall ye—Jews—my persecutors, see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven." This passage will be strictly fulfilled though that priest should never have a resurrection.

Rev. i. 7, "Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him." This also will be strictly fulfilled, though that one soldier who pierced Christ should never live again. The Jews as a people pierced Christ, and they as a people will be here, as they ever have been, when Christ comes, and of course will see him coming. For this generation is not to pass away till all these things are fulfilled.

CHRONOLOGY AND HISTORY.

The chronology generally received, and found in the margin of our Bibles, makes the time of "Darius, son of Ahasuerus," to be 538 B. C. In the book of Esther, where we have an account of Ahasuerus, the chronology of Esther's marriage is put at 457 or 458 B. C., and the decree which Haman procured for the destruction of the Jews, is made to be 453 B. C.; that would make it four years after the decree of Artaxerxes to Ezra, to "restore and to build Jerusalem," according to the received chronology. Can any man, in his senses, believe that? Look at it. The common chronology necessarily makes Artaxerxes and Ahasueres the same identical king, for they were both reigning in 457 B. C. Then, according to that chronology, this king marries Esther 457, issues his decree to restore and to build Jerusalem the same year, and in 453, issues another decree by the instigation of Haman, to have all the Jews in his kingdom destroyed! We ask if such a combination of events is likely to be true? or, what is still more marvellous, Townsend makes all three of these events to happen in 457. Now mark: Darius of the 9th of Daniel is son of Ahasuerus; and yet, strange to tell, his chronology is put at 538 B. C.; that is, 80 years before Ahasuerus married Esther; thus, if we reckon from this marriage, making the son at least one hundred years older than his father, if we allow Darius to be twenty years old when he came to the throne!

It must be manifest to all, that Ahasuerus reigned before the Darius of Daniel, ix. and hence, Darius, son of Ahasuerus, was not and could not possibly be "Darius the Median," who "took the kingdom" of Babylon; and therefore, Darius, Daniel, ix. must have been Darius Nothus, who, according to Taylor's Manuel of History, p. 66, came to the throne about 424 B.C., and fixes the chronology of Daniel ix. at that period; or 114 years later than the present chronology for that chapter. If this be so, it is equally clear there must be an error in the chronology given to the Cyrus of the Scriptures; for Darius Nothus' reign could not have been 112 years after the first year of the Scripture Cyrus, as it would be if 536 B. C. was the true chronology of Cyrus. We cannot suppose that Ahasuerus of Esther reigned after Cyrus, for several reasons: first, it is not likely that a king immediately after Cyrus' decree to restore and to build Jerusalem, to lay the foundation of the temple, and for the Jews' return, would have issued the decree for the Jews' destruction; or, if he had, if that decree did not include the Jews in Judea, it seems improbable that there would have been such mourning and resistance, when they might have removed to Judea under Cyrus' decree and been safe. But again, we find Mordecai among those who returned from captivity under Cyrus' decree, Neh. vii. 5–7: "I found a register of the genealogy of them that came up at the first," says Nehemiah. In that list he names Mordecai as one "who came with Zerubbabel," (see also Ezra ii. 1–2). Zerubbabel laid the foundation of the temple under Cyrus' decree, (see Ezra iii. 8–11, and Zech iv. 9.) Under the decree of Darius Nothus, or the son of Ahasuerus, the temple was finished. Ezra vi. 15. The true state of the matter seems to be this: the Ahasuerus of Esther reigned before the Cyrus of the Scriptures, and is possibly the same as "Darius the Median." Artaxerxes I., who hindered the work going forward at Jerusalem, reigned next after Cyrus; he was succeeded by Darius Nothus, son of Ahasuerus, at which time Daniel had his interview with Gabriel, as recorded Daniel ix.; the next year after that, Darius put forward the building of the temple, according to Cyrus' decree, (see Ezra v. and vi.,) and the house was finished in the sixth year of his reign, or about 418 B. C. If this be true, then the common chronology makes the decree of Cyrus nearly a century too early; for, at the longest, that decree could not be more than "forty and six years" (see John ii. 20) before the temple was finished, so that Cyrus' decree could not have been earlier than 464 B. C., and probably it was some time later.

It is possible the seventy years captivity in Babylon commenced in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, (See Jer. xxv. 1, 11, 12.) The "desolations of Jerusalem" in the nineteenth year of the same king, (see 2 Kings xxv. 8–10.) The difference between the commencement of the captivity of the Jews, and the commencement of the desolations of Jerusalem in that case, would be 18 to 20 years; the termination of these two events would therefore be equally distant. The 9th of Daniel speaks of "seventy years desolations of Jerusalem," corresponding with the 70 years indignation against Jerusalem. (Zech. i. 12.) This latter Prophet shows that indignation was then ended (v. 16) in the second year of Darius, (v. 7.) This corresponds with Dan. ix. 2, where it is evident the 70 years desolations of Jerusalem were ending; hence, the decree or command to restore [thy people] and to build Jerusalem, had gane forth about 20 years previous, near the termination of the captivity; or, in the first year of Cyrus. Now, as the first year of Darius, son of Ahasuerus, or Darius Nothus, was about 424 B. C., the decree of Cyrus must have been about 444 B. C., if the first year of Nebuchadnezzar is the true date of the commencement of the captivity.

In Dan. ix. 25, Daniel is commanded to "know and understand that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," &c. Now, if this communication was made to Daniel B. C. 538, according to to the common chronology, that is, before any decree had been issued, Daniel did neither 'know" nor "understand the matter;" for he was just as ignorant where to begin his reckoning now, as before Gabriel came, and Gabriel still fails to accomplish his commission. But if we take the first year of Darius Nothus, then the decree of Cyrus, and no other, had gone forth previously; and Daniel had a definite point of time to commence his reckoning for his 7 weeks and 62 weeks, and would therefore "understand the matter," as Gabriel had enjoined upon him to do. Any other view of the chronology leaves Daniel just as much in the dark as before Gabriel's visit. Archbishop Magee, of Dublin says—"The decree of Cyrus is obviously the command referred to in Dan. ix 25."

Dr. Wall says of Archbishop Magee—"In strength of intellect, no writer that ever engaged in the investigation has been found his superior," (in endeavoring to reconile the language of prophecy with the received chronology.) Yet, his mighty intellect found the reconciliation impossible, and so will every other man who has but one object, viz: to know what is truth, without regard to theories.

The decree was to restore [thy people] and to build Jerusalem; therefore it must have been before the first year of Darius; for Jerusalem was at that time inhabited. (See Hag. i. 4.) In Ezra iv. 12, also, which was before Darius, the building of the city is mentioned. Daniel knew of the decree of Cyrus, and he knew of no other, as we have before remarked, and he had witnessed the return of the Jews, under Zerubbabel; and knew that the "foundations of the temple were laid" by Zerubbabel, and the rebuilding commenced; he must therefore have supposed that the decree of Cyrus was the one Gabriel spoke of. If Gabriel had meant some future and unknown decree, Daniel was rather deceived than informed. When it was demanded of the Jews by what right they proceeded to build the temple, they appealed to the decree of Cyrus, and to no other human authority. (See Ezra v. 3–16.)

Tertullian, one of the christian writers of the second century, commenced the 70 weeks of Daniel with the first of Darius Nothus, and so did Sulpitius Severus in the fourth century, and both maintained that "Darius, son of Ahasuerus," was Darius Nothus; and the great Joseph Mede dates the 70 weeks from the third of Darius Nothus. Scalliger, Dr. Parry, and Hales, all commence the 70 weeks with Darius Nothus.

How are we to extricate ourselves from the difficulties in which we are involved by conflicting opinions and dates? We are opinion there is "a way of escape" out of all this confusion, which the learned and unlearned have thrown around us. We conceive it has arisen from three causes:

First—Making Darius, the Median, and Darius, son of Ahasuerus, to be the same person.

Second—From confounding Cyrus the Great (or Khosrau) with the Scripture Cyrus, (or Coresh.)

Third—From making the 70 weeks and the 7 weeks and 62 weeks to have a common beginning, as though the 7 and 62 were only a subdivision of the 70. All three of these positions, we think, are erroneous.

Much confusion also has arisen from not observing that there art two periods in Babylon and Media, one of the 70 years captivity; the other the 70 years desolations of Jesusalem. We have already spoken of the possibility of the captivity commemcing with the first of Nebuchadnezzar, but are more inclined to the belief that it commenced in the eighth year of that king; and that instead of eighteen or twenty years intervening from the captivity to the desolations it was only eleven.

Ezekiel, xl. i, shows us that the period at which the Desolations of Jerusalem commenced is eleven years later than the Captivity; thus he says—"In the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the eity was smitten." Compare this with Ezek. xxxiii. 21, where he says: —"It came to pass in the twelfth year of our captivity—one that had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, the city is smitten." Here then we have demonstration that the time that elaped from the commencement of the capticity to the desolation of Jerusalem was eleven years. But this is not the only proof. In 2 Kings xxiv., we learn that "Jehoikim became servant to Nebuchadnezzar three years," and "then turned and rebelled against him." Jehoikim died and was succeeded by Jehoiachin, who reigned but three months, before he was taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar, in the eighth year of the reign of the king of Babylon. (See also Jer. lii. 28.) At this time Nebuchadnezzar "carried away all Jerusalem, and all the princes and all the mighty men of valor—none remained save the poorer sort of the people of the land."

Here, manifestly, is the commencement of the 70 years captivity in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar. Then, in 2 Kings, xxv., we have an account of the desolation of Jerusalem, and it is stated thus, verses 8 to 10—"In the fifth month on the seventh day of the month, which is the nineteenth year of king Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, came Nebuzaradan, captain of the guard, a servant of the king Babylon, unto Jerusalem; and he burnt the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house burnt he with fire—and brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about." Here, then, is a further demonstration that eleven years intervened between the captivity and the desolation of Jerusalem; and as 70 years were allotted to each of these, we shall find a corresponding termination to the captivity and desolations.

The presumption is, that Daniel was among the captives that were carried away with Jehoiachin, in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar. We will suppose that he was then fourteen years old. If so, he must have been 84 years old in the first year of Cyrus, king of Persia, for that year ended the 70 years captivity. (See Ezra i. 1.) This proclamation is expressly said to be made "that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled;" which prophecy related, specially to the time of Judah's captivity. In the first year of Cyrus, then, the 70 years captivity ended—Daniel lived to see it, and to witness the promulgation of Cyrus' proclamation; though being at that time at least 84 years old, he did not go up to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, Joshua, and their associates. Daniel is alive in the third year of Cyrus, as we learn from Dan. x. 1, which was the next year after "the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid, (see Ezra iii. 8–11,) in the third year of Cyrus," probably, the news reached Daniel, in Persia, that "the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin" (see Ezra iv. 1–5,) were plotting to prevent the work going on, which led Daniel to the "mourning" and fasting for "three weeks," recorded in Dan. x.

Daniel not only lived to see the end of the 70 years captivity, but also to see the end of the "70 years desolations of Jerusalem," [see Dan. ix. 2,] which must have been eleven years later than the first of Cyrus, or the end of the captivity; so that when the desolations ended, which was in the first or second year of Darius, son of Ahasuerus, or Darius Nothus, [compare Daniel ix. 1–2, with Zech. i. 7, 12, 16,] Daniel must have been at least 95 years old. The temple, or house of God, was finished in the sixth year of the reign of Darius, at which time Daniel, if living, was 100 years old; it is probable, however, that he had gone to rest before that time.

At the time Daniel had the communication from Gabriel, chap. ix., the foundation of the temple had been laid; but the work had been hindered, so that it was still unfinished. And Dr. Townsend, in his chronological arrangement of the Bible, makes this prayer of Daniel ix., to be during the suspension of the rebuilding of the temple; and yet, strange to tell, he falls into the common error of placing that chapter 538 B. C., that is, before the temple began to be built, and consequently could not be during the suspension of work.

From M. P. Martin.

WOODSTOCK, New Brunswick, Feb. 22, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—I noticed in the Herald of Life an article on the unscriptural practice of the penitent bench. It impressed on my mind that we should be as wise as serpents as well as harmless as doves. I think the brother's remarks very timely, and I hope those that advocate Life only in Christ may not venture on unscriptural ground, let our success seem ever so discouraging. O how unsafe to do evil that good may come.

For several weeks past there have been meetings held here nearly every evening, and some day meetings, to get up a revival. I have not heard of any special interest except a great number go to the penitent bench and speaking in meetings; this seems to be the order of experience. I attended one or two at the commencement, and from the views advocated, to induce the young to go to the penitent bench, which were eternal suffering and endless misery after death, I concluded we should not see much fruits of the gospel.

One evening I thought I would attend and see for myself, as the report was, that there was something more than the work of man, so evident was the work of God. When I went in exhortation had commenced. The meeting was conducted very systematically; apparently no excitement. Inviting sinners to the penitent bench and to profess religion was urged with great ernestness until about 10 o'clock, when the leading minister said he had one more request to make before closing. "All who want to serve the Lord and help others serve the Lord will stand up; and those that do not want to serve the Lord and help others, remain on their seats."

Now, I felt I had got into a close place. To leave the house would show a cowardly disposition to desert; to stand up would be to yield to man and the power of public sentiment. As far as I was concerned, I felt there was no call to me of the Lord to sanction such a course. To remain on my seat would give the public a chance to say I had decided not to serve the Lord; but the good Lord helped me, for which I give him praise, to remain on my seat until the vote was taken, when I asked the privilege to say a word, which was given. I said to the congregation, the reason I did not stand up was not because I did not want to serve the Lord, for I do; and if I could realize a call from the Lord I willingly would stand up, go forward, or anything else; but as I did not I could not conscientously do it, God witnessing between us and the truth. I thank the Lord I have reason to believe that some realize the truth that no man can stand between the sinner and Christ, either in form of penitent bench, class-meeting, confession, or his highness the Pope; these all lead to bigotry and superstition, and are a reason so many poor creatures are dying for the true knowledge of the only true LIFE-GIVER, who taught that God alone could forgive sin; and plainly teaches us. When we look to him, we must not simply view him as man, the Son of David, but the Son of God with power on earth to forgive sin.

O, how glad I am that we can know the spirit of truth and the spirit of error. Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God. 1 John iv. 2.

A number of those calling themselves Adventists, and who have been bitter against the immortal soulists, have gone back to them. They could not manfully meet the doctrine of no life out of Christ, and the non-reliving of the wicked dead, and rather than to accept of it, say, Give us darkness rather than light. I am thankful to believe there are some that are pondering these things in their minds; and may the good Spirit lead them into the truth, is my prayer.

O how thankful I am that I saw the light on the blessed truth "No life out of Christ."

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—It is no more than we expected, that rejectors of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," who had gone out of Egypt with us, would turn back to the "leaks and onions" of their former bondage. The test has come to them to receive the whole truth on life, or turn back to the old theory. Some may be slow to own it, but go forward they must or turn back.

The Future of Europe.

BY MR. FITZGERALD, MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.

This honorable gentleman not long since, at an annual dinner at a cattle show at Horshan, England, referring to the state of Europe generally, expressed his belief that serious times are approaching. The differences between nations were now likely to be not quarrels upon political circumstances, or events, as in past times, but differences arising from diversity of origin, from religion, and from great principles. He looked forward to the growth of the military spirit upon the Continent with great apprehension and alarm. He regarded the intimate understanding between the great military Powers with more than alarm. Great and gloomy days were before us; but if this country was true to itself, it would be able to hold by its own, as it had done for many a year, and its influence and reputation with the world would remain as paramount as it had been in years gone by.

The Hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, was loudly cheered.

Discussion in Boston.

There will be a public oral debate, of from six to eight evenings, in Kast Hall, Boston, to commence on Tuesday evening, March 14th, between Rufus Wendell (on the Affirmative) and Eld. Miles Grant (on the Negative). Question for discussion: "Do the Scriptures teach the Non-resurrection of the wicked?"

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MARCH 8, 1865.

Father Wilson yet Alive.

It will be recollected that Dec. 14, 1864, we published a letter from Eld. JONATHAN WILSON—who has long styled himself "The Bibleite"—in which he stated his conviction that he would die Feb. 26, 1865. We did not know, at the time, on what ground his conviction rested; but it seems it was on two dreams he had. We confess our lack of confidence in such premonitions, and would never dare hazard any thing on them. We are of the opinion, however, that when they are yielded to, the imagination so powerfully affects the person that sometimes the thing anticipated is brought on, which would not otherwise have occurred. We thought it possible this might be true in Br. Wilson's case; but he still lives in good old age. May his prayers and his love of truth be a blessing to his numerous friends and to the Church of God.

None can be too careful in receiving impressions from dreams and visions, since the canon of Scripture has been completed. The Bible is our rule and standard. That, with the promised aid of the Holy Comforter, is our guide; and no dreams or visions can now be relied on as coming from God, or be made a basis of action. In our experience and observation, we have seen that such things have wrought immense evil, and have turned away many from the truth unto fables.

While, therefore, we give our dear aged Br. Wilson's "Record of Visions" a place in our columns, from respect and love to him, we cannot approve of making any dreams or visions public, except those recorded in the Bible. We think our beloved Br. fell into a temptation; out of which God has partially delivered him, and we trust He will yet entirely deliver him. It is plain to us, the visions concerning his death were not from God: but we do not wonder that our aged Brother should be more or less impressed with them; but we beg of him now to dismiss the "reprieve" from his mind. We are presuaded the thoughts of it can work no good to himself or any one else, and may work much evil.

ELD. C. W. LOW, of Fredonia, N. Y., who was at Br. Wilson's residence, on the 26th ult., the day Eld. W. was to have died, according to the dreams, writes us as follows:

BR. STORRS:—In behalf of our aged Br. Elder J. Wilson, I would say to all whom it may concern, that I regard him as being in a sane state of mind, and very well balanced for a man of his years. I saw and conversed with him last Sunday, and he manifests less imbecility than many others of far less years. Whatever he says or does is with a moral honesty, and christian integrity and sincerity, seldom witnessed among men.

C. W. LOW.

Fredonia, N. Y., Feb. 28, 1865.

In the correctness of the statement of Br. Low we have no doubt. Br. Wilson will ever live in our affections and sympathy. O, that the mantle of his "moral honesty, and christian integrity and sincerity" might fall on some much younger than himself; and that the self-seeking, so manifest in some others, might be eradicated by the contemplation of the absence of such a spirit in our beloved pilgrim "Bibleite." The following is the article just sent us by Br. Wilson.

A RECORD OF VISIONS.

BY ELD JONATHAN WILSON, A PILGRIM.

When I was converted, on July 7th, 1807, I had a vision of the heavens and its glory, which caused me to look into the bible for that manner of truth. Gen. xv. 1. The Lord came unto Abraham in a vision saying, fear not. Numbers xii. 6. When God appeared in the cloud to give laws to Israel. And he (the Lord) said hear now my words, if there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. 2 Chron. xxvi. 5, And he (Amaziah) sought God in the days of Zechariah, who had understanding in the visions of God, and as long as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper. Job iv. 12, Now a thing was secretly brought to me, mine ears received a little thereof. In thoughts from the vision of the night when deep sleep falleth on men. Ezekiel i. 1, Now it came to pass in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the 5th day of the month, as I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, that the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God. Daniel vii. 1, In the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon, Daniel had a dream and visions of his head upon his bed: then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters. Hosea xii. 10, I have also spoken by the prophets, and I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes, by the ministry of the prophets. Joel ii. 28, And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions. In 2 Cor. xii. 1, Paul says, it is not expedient for me to glory, I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. So we see the Old and New Testament times vindicate the above manner of God's method of communicating his will and word to men. Therefore I will write the dreams and visions I have had from the Lord, that men may judge of them for themselves. I begin with my dream last March, 1864.

I dreamed that a messenger like a man appeared before me and said he had come to tell me when I would die, and said you will live until next Feb.; and on the 26th day of Feb., in the 88th year of your age, at nine o'clock in the morning you will die. I awoke and found it was a dream; yet my age and circumstances in life seemed to correspond with it. It made no excitement on my mind. On the 29th day of July last, at night, the same man-messenger appeared again, and said he had come to confirm the message he had brought before. He repeated it word for word, and added, You will hear no more from it until it is confirmed to you. I awoke again and it was yet a dream; and as the thought of death gives me no alarm I looked candidly on the message, and commenced a preparation to be ready to meet it. I never was happier nor more busy than I have been this present Feb. I wanted to spread among my relatives and friends, our chronology; as I was the only one on earth that could do it, as much of it depended on memory and no other one living but myself had it. I pursued it, and since Feb. commenced I have mailed twenty-five letters and received thirteen answers—some from five hundred miles distance. Feeling entirely resigned to the sentence to be executed, all the burden it has been to me was the state of suspense it threw me into. I knew God's law given to individuals and nations was conditional, and recognized the characters of its subjects; and that God could, consistently with his government, reprieve me. Ezek. xxxiij. This threw me into a state of a suspense which is an unpleasant situation to be in. I felt in mind forbidden to pray for a reprieve as much as Paul and Silas did to preach in Asia, when going to Phillipi. Acts xvi. But my prayer was that I might in this thing honor God, in my life or death. On Wednesday night, Feb. 22, between 10 and 11 the Lord relieved my suspense, by words, yet no voice but to my sense and understanding, saying, you are the beloved of the Lord. By your chronology your faith is tried. You will yet live three years and a half, and that will be your end of time. That period runs to September 26th, 1868. I have ever since that hour been as David says, Ps. cxxxi. 2, 3. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself as a child that is weaned of his mother. My soul is as a weaned child. Let Israel hope in the Lord from henceforth and forever; which is the very exercise of my soul this day.

J. WILSON.

The Time Question.

BY DR. ALEXANDER DECKER.

Do any of the prophetic periods reach to, and point out the time of the second Advent of Christ? This question I regard to be one of much importance; for if the time of the second coming of Christ is revealed in the word of God, then most certainly God had some important purpose to accomplish by it; and that purpose can only be accomplished by its being understood; otherwise it would simply serve to distract the brains and break the hearts of honest searchers after truth. But this is not the character of the God of the Bible. He has given his word to be understood, by which means to accomplish certain important purposes: and it is therefare clearly our duty to search it out.

That one at least of the prophetic periods (the 1335 days) reaches to the second advent, I think there is nothing more susceptible of proof in the Bible. In Daniel xii. 1, 2, certain wonders are brought to view—the standing up of Michael—time of trouble—deliverance of Daniel's people; every one found written in the Book; and the awaking of many of that sleep in the dust, &c. It will be seen that the resurrection is here mentioned among the wonders, and the last one too in the category. I wish this fact to be particularly noticed. Therefore, in whatever light the standing up of Michael may be seen, it is certain that the coming of Christ must be embraced in the wonders, since the resurrection cannot take place prior to his advent. Therefore when the angel, as recorded in verse 6 asks, "How long to the end of these wonders?" he virtually asks, how long to the resurrection, as that is the last wonder mentioned. This question was asked by an angel of God sent to Daniel for this purpose; and, therefore, the question is a pertinent one, and the answer must be as definite as the question—must reach to the end of the wonders—to the resurrection and coming of Christ. Therefore it is the resurrection that is definitely pointed out by the 1335 days. That this view of the case is correct is further proved by the fact, that Daniel is to rest and stand in his lot at the end of the days, which necessarily involves a resurrection.

"At the end of the days." This phrase, where it stands in connection with prophetic periods, has always been definitely fulfilled; or, in other words, all events marking the termination of prophetic periods have always been fulfilled in the last day or year of those periods. The children of Israel left Egypt on the self same day that the 430 years ended. They also crossed over Jordan five days before the forty years of their wandering in the wilderness was out; and the king of Babylon was killed in the seventieth year of the captivity, &c. This, I regard, as quite sufficient to establish the fact, that the resurrection will take place near the close of the last year of 1335.

But it is objected, that none of the prophetic periods point out the time of the coming of Christ, from the fact, that our Lord said, as recorded in Mark xiii. 33, "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only." Therefore, it is objected, that if the time of the second advent was revealed in any of the numbers of Daniel, some man, or angel, or the Son, must have revealed it, and therefore must have understood it.

This may seem quite plausible, at first sight, to some; but it will not bear investigation. For instance, suppose Christ and the angels did know that when the 1335 days ended, the resurrection would be fulfilled, how, I ask, could they know from anything revealed when they would end, since there was nothing in the prophecies that showed when the abomination of desolation would be set up? and yet, without this knowledge, they certainly could not tell when they would end. There was no period running either from the angel's time, or from Christ down to that event. Therefore, as they could not know from anything revealed, when the abomination of desolation would be set up, they could not know when the 1335 days would end, notwithstanding the angels were the agents in making the revelation. Furthermore, it does not follow that because the angels were made the agents to reveal certain facts to Daniel, and through him to us, that therefore they understood perfectly what they revealed, and especially so, since those things were sealed up to the time of the end.

I admit that the objection holds good against the 2300 days, and shows unmistakably that they do not end at the coming of Christ; that it is not at the resurrection that the Sanctuary is cleansed; for they must have known, (it being already fulfilled and in the past) where the commandment went forth to restore and build Jerusalem, and therefore they must have known where the 2300 days would end. But there is nothing in the prophecies of Daniel to show how long it would be from the cleansing of the Sanctuary to the coming of Christ.

I hope those who contend that the 2300 days reach to the advent, will take especial notice of these facts. Nor could it be that it was revealed that Christ was to come seven years before they ended, as some seem to think; for, in that case, Christ and the angels must have known, from the 2300 days, the time of his coming, just as certainly as though they terminated at that very point. Thus it is shown that the 2300 days do not, in any way, point out the time of the second advent of Christ; that the cleansing of the Sanctuary is quite another event; and it takes place at quite another point of time. I have no sympathy, however, with the idea that they run seven years beyond His coming. On the contrary, I think it will yet be shown, that they have already ended some considerable time in the past.

The 1335 days, therefore, is the only period that clearly runs too, and points out the time of, the Saviour's coming.

But when this latter period would end, neither Christ or the angels had any means of knowing in their day, unless they knew it from some revelation direct to them, that is not contained in Daniel's prophecies; for, as before said, there is nothing there, by the understanding of which, they could know when the abomination of desolation would be set up, and therefore they could not know when the 1335 days would end.

But again. If the Saviour's language refers to all future time, then it precludes himself and the angels from knowing a single day or hour before he makes his appearance in the world, as certainly as it does the waiting church; and who, I ask, is ready to take such a position? Are we to believe that Christ will not know the time of his coming, a single day or hour beforehand? I am satisfied that no man, in his right mind, can believe anything so monstrously absurd.

That the Saviour had reference to present time, is further proved from the fact, that after he declared that no man, angel, neither the Son, knew the day or hour, he says: "but as the days of Noah were," &c.; thus showing the contrast. Well how was it in the days of Noah? Answer. The flood came and took them all away. Who did it take away? Answer. All who knew it not. Who did it not take away? Answer. Those who knew it. Will it be so when the Son of man is revealed? Answer. Jesus says, it will. Did Jesus endorse definite time in the 24th of Matthew? He did; for he commands us to read and understand when the abomination of desolation stood in the "holy place;" and He knew, that to understand this, was to understand when the 1335 days would end.

Again, Mark xiii. 33, "Take heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is." This verse is supposed by many to be possitive evidence against knowing the time. But I object, that if the church could never know the time, then why watch? Is there anything to be gained by watching? The following verse shows that the idea of watching, is to know when the "master of the house cometh." But if those who are commanded to watch can never know "when the time is," then there is no use of watching; for the only sense in which the term watch is here used, is to watch for the approach of the master: and the plain import of the Saviour's injunction is to watch until ye do know when the time is. This position, I think, is clearly proved by the Saviour's language in Revelation. Hear him. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief; and thou shalt not know what hour I will upon thee. This passage shows unmistably what is to be gained by watching—a knowledge of the hour that Christ will come. It further shows what is meant by his coming as a thief: that it is his coming at an hour unknown by those upon whom he thus comes.

As a further proof of this, I refer to the Saviour's threatening against the "evil servant", in Matt. xxiv. 50. "The Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour he is not aware of, and shalt cut him assunder," &c. All can see, I think, the force of this passage—that if the Lord is thus coming on the evil servant because he is evil, that He will not thus come on the good or wise servant. Therefore He will come to the wise servant the day he is looking for it, and the hour he is aware of it. Thus it was in the days of Noah and Lot, and thus, the Saviour says it will be, when the Son of man is revealed.

I think I have now shown what the Saviour means by watching, and the benefit to be derived by so doing—a knowledge of the time of his coming. I have omitted much in the foregoing that might be said on this subject. There is one thing more, however, which I will here mention in short.

In Daniel xii. 7 the angel, with uplifted hands to heaven in answer to the question, "How long to the end of these wonders?" swares that it shall be for "a time, times, and a half." What was it that Daniel heard but understood not? Answer. The oath of the angel on time. What was it, or what were the words that were closed up and sealed to to the time of the end? Answer. The words or oath of the angel on time. What was it then, that the angel declared the wise should understand? Answer. The words closed up and sealed to the time of the end. And what were these words? Answer. What the angel swore to which was to time.

Yes, dear reader, the word of God, by the mouth of his angel, declares that the wise shall understand the time: and the time reaches to the end of the wonders—to the resurrection, whoever may say to the contrary. If there was nothing else in the word of God to prove that the time of Christ's coming would be understood, this one declaration of the angel, standing in the connection that it does, is quite sufficient.

For want of time and space, I now come to the close of what I have to say on this subject, for the present, hoping that the foregoing will be sufficient to convince the readers of the "Herald of Life," that the design of God, in giving the prophetic periods, was that they should be understood, and thus accomplish the important purpose of showing His waiting church the time of their deliverance, and thereby securing her readiness for the coming of the Son of God from heaven.

Newark, N. J.

"How Readest Thou?"

There are those who argue that because some prophetic periods have brought the events spoken of to a close in the last year of the period indicated, that therefore the 1335 days of Daniel will do the same. The case of Israel's coming out of Egypt, and their passing over Jordan, and the king of Babylon's death in the seventieth year of the captivity, are presented in proof of this position. But that argument is not as conclusive, possibly, as may be supposed; for in each of those cases the periods were given in literal time, and with a definite point at which to commence the reckoning; while the 1335 days are not regarded as literal time by the advocates of definite time for the advent. To make their position perfect they should make these days literal time, as those other periods are literal; and if these are literal days, then supposing they actually extend to the time of the advent, the commencement of the period must of necessity still be in the future; and hence, until the event takes place that shall mark their beginning, all labor to find the termination is as vain to us as it was to Daniel, the angels, or to the Son, as an advocate of time-knowing has said it was eighteen hundred years ago. Better wait, then, till the prophetic period (1335 days) begins, before attempting to find the end; for if the time is literal, as quite likely it may be, it certainly has long since past or has not yet begun.

It is said, the lack of knowledge by the Son of God, and his friends, had reference to the time then present, and not to the future, as He must know the time before He comes. If we admit that the Son will know the time before his second advent, it does not follow that his disciples will. It is certain the largest portion of them will not; for they are sleeping in the dust of the earth. But, says one, the living saints will know the time beforehand. That does not follow, even admitting the Saviour thus knows it; for, He gave certain signs which should indicate the near approach of the event, and told his followers to watch; and gave as a reason why they, at the period of the sings, should "take heed, watch and pray; for," said He, "ye know not when the time is." He did not tell them to watch and pray to find the time, as Timeists talk in these days; they were to do it because the exact time was not to be known when the signs appear which indicate the event near; or, if known at all, not to be more more than 1335 literal days before the event.

Those who illustrate by the case of Noah and the flood, are shut up to this last conclusion; for Noah did not know the exact time of the flood's commencing till "seven days" before it began. (See Gen. vii. 4.) Is it pretended that Noah was saved because he knew the time, and others perished because they did not know it? This is certainly an assumption. He was saved not by the knowledge of the time, nor did the world of the ungodly perish for lack of it. The true state of the case is given us by Paul thus: "By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith." Heb. xi. 7.

Here we see why Noah was saved and the ungodly perished. It was not what has been asserted. Faith in the event to come, and a corresponding preparation for the event—and not knowledge of the time—was what saved Noah. Disbelief of the event, and contempt of the waring, was that which proved the ruin of the ungodly, and not a lack of knowledge of the time.

But the strangest of all logic is, that the Saviour after telling his followers "ye know not when the time is," should tell them to watch in order to find the time. That they were to watch for the coming of the "master of the house" is granted; but that they were to watch to find "the time" is to us "monstrously absurd." The effort to establish such an idea by an appeal to an address of the Saviour to one of the seven churches of Asia, is evidence of a hard labor to establish an untenable theory. In rebuking the church of Sardis, the Saviour told them, they had a name to live and were dead, and admonishes them to be watchful and strengthen the things which remain and are ready to die; and tells them, if they did not do it, He would come on them "as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come on thee."

Pray, what are we to understand by this warning? Had it any relation to the second coming of Christ? It is a self-evident truth, his coming on them as a thief related to judgments with which He would visit them, if they did not heed his warning? and that He would visit them in such a manner that there would be no escape, any more than an unguarded house could escape from the depredations of a thief. Surely, there would be something "gained by watching," but not the knowledge of "the time" the thief would come; but by watching, as the Saviour bade them do, they would be restored to his favor, and the threatened judgments averted. The threatening on that church was long since executed; not because they did "not know the time," but because they refused to reform. Here is no warrant for the idea, that if we watch we can know "the hour that Christ will come" from heaven in his glory.

The effort to make the languge of our Saviour, Math. xxiv 50, prove His coming to the good servant is in "the day he is looking for it, and the hour he is aware of"—that is, on a time previously known to the good—is clearly overthrown by the Saviour's words, vesse 44, "Therefore, be ye also ready: for in such an honr as ye [my servants] think not the Son of man cometh:" and in verse 42, He had said, "Watch therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."

If men are not prepared for the event of Christ's coming in glory without an exact knowledge of the time, then none who have died previous to the present hour are to be admitted to his kingdom; for they have all, confessedly, gone down in death without knowing the time: and as, according to the theory of Timeists, we have been for some years in "the time of the end," and no one yet has had wisdom enough to fix on the time of the second advent, there is little hope that many of the so-called "Adventists," will be saved; for hitherto they have utterly failed in finding the time, though they have often professed to do it, but as often proved themselves mistaken.

We regard it as a mistake to say "the resurrection is the last in the category of wonders mentioned" in Dan. xii. The last is, "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." This brings the saints into their inheritance, and corresponds with the time Daniel shall "stand in his lot at the end of the days;" verse 13. So that it is more likely that the 1335 days reach to a period beyond the advent, than that they give us the time of that event; and we think the effort to find the definite time of the second advent does "serve to distract the brains and break the hearts of honest searchers after the truth;" and the sooner such efforts are abandoned the better for all parties concerned. Let all live as Christians ought at all times to live; be always ready to meet their Lord, looking for his return from heaven, as the early Christians did; and then, whether they are asleep or awake, they will be found of Him in peace, and the day will not come upon them as a thief; for they are ready.

It is said that "All events marking the termination of prophetic periods have always been fulfilled in the last day or year of those periods." Suppose that is true where the periods are given in literal time. Can it be proved true of a single prophetic period given in symbolic time? And can it be proved, when literal years were given, that even the saints knew the exact time of the fulfilment till after the event occurred? They knew when they were drawing near to it; but the exact time they did not know beforehand; and Moses was mistaken "forty years" in his calculations, with far better means of knowledge than any now have of knowing the time of the second advent.

The period of Messiah's first advent was given in symbolic time of the most clearly understood character; and the commencement of the period was more distinctly marked than almost any other given in symbolic time; and yet, who has ever proved the exact time of its fulfilment was known beforehand? or, that it was "fulfilled on the last day or year of that period?" Clearly, no one, not even to this day, eighteen hundred years after the event. And yet, with no such definite period for the second advent, we are called on to believe in definite time, and to search for it as essential to our being saved! and told that unless we know the time we are to be shut out of the kingdom, as the old world were drowned because they did not know the time of the flood! Let all our friends beware of this sectarian and proscriptive spirit: it will work no good to saint or sinner. We have seen enough of such positiveness about time; and the bitter fruits of such "movements" are seen in too many cases not to be a warning to "the wise," lest "the last state" of such as are drawn into them shall be "worse than the first." Live as Christians: work for God and his Christ while the day lasts: be found occupying till He comes; then, away with all fears that you will not be accepted because He shall come "in an hour ye think not." He has told you he would so come, even to his saints. Let us believe it, and live in constant readiness to meet our Lord and Master.

Life Believers in New York.

These friends of the glorious truth of "Life only in Christ" will remove the location of their place of public meetings from 68 East Broadway, (or Botanic Hall,) to DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, below 12th Street. Services to commence there Sunday, March 19th, at the usual hours of public meetings. The public are invited to attend at this commodious and well known place.

REFLECTIONS ON THE REMOVAL.

For about two years and a half, Botanic Hall, 68 East Broadway, New York, has been opened for religious services on Sunday. In the meetings, held here, the doctrine of Christ's second coming, as a great and glorious fact, and an event that might be now, reasonably and scripturally, looked for as near at hand, has been held up. Also, the great question of prophetic fulfilment, exhibiting the character and glory of the Kingdom of God on earth, has formed a very important part of the instruction which has edified the flock of Christ and called the attention of sinners, in a most solemn manner, to the necessity of preparation for the world to come.

In this Hall, at the same time, liberty has been enjoyed to believe and speak (and to deny the right to speak, is to forbid the faith) and preach on the glorious doctrine of "Immortality the gift of God through Christ;" while, for more than one year, and especially, since the accession of the "Life and Advent Union of New York and Brooklyn," the meeting has been qualified by the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ."

The facts of a place give it character. It is what is done, that gives the interest and some times the solemn importance to a locality, otherwise humble and even repulsive. Forbiding as the place may have been to some, it has been the means of refreshment and truth to many weary souls seeking after the knowledge of God.

What were splendid temples, and the most gorgeous appointments for worship, without truth, and without Christian liberty? What were Sinai without God's thunder and glory on its brow? What were a mount Calvary without the cross? or, Zion, if the presence of the Redeemer of Israel and the world should not grace his appointed throne with the presence that must, of itself, subdue the nations to the peaceful rule of righteousness?

Here the friends of Christ have had their trial, as the flock must ever more or less experience, in the appointed travail. That endears the place Here the Church has enjoyed fellowship—the communion of saints, which is like—because of the same spirit—to the sympathy of heaven itself. Here souls have been quickened, and sinners awakened and wept in bitterness over their sins: and why should not the old humble tabernacle have been as the shadow from the heat? as the springs of water in the thirsty land—the birth place of converts—the morning gate of hope—the east of rising light to multitudes who have directly, or indirectly, secured more or less acquaintance with the blessed inculcations of the gospel?

Here we have had liberty to worship, and to act in the fear of God, for the promotion of his glory, and the improvement of our minds in holiness. Thank God for this. The place is dear! The scenes of worship and love; of sorrow and hope; of labor and blessing, have made it precious.

Ministers who have been called to preach in this Hall, will bid it farewell with regret; not so much for the place to be left as for the interest which their efforts in the Master's cause give to any point where, in his gracious call they may have earnestly put forth.

We have, brethren of the Ministry, been blessed with liberty to communicate what we held as dear and sacred, in the mighty power of God given to earthen vessels; and have found sympathy which has been denied us often. Strong is the tie that binds the church at this place to our heart; and hence sadly we utter the farewell to the altar which leaves it desolate. God only can enlighten us, for the day shall reveal it, upon the consequence of the labors of the church and the ministry at 68 East Broadway.

In the removal of the Church to Dodworth's Hall, Broadway, it is to be hoped that the prior associations will not die or be forgotten; that their faith will grow exceedingly by the word of God; that the efforts which have been blessed thus far in the enlightenment of the mind upon the Life theme, may be more effectual and prosperous. The old friends, it is hoped, will all attend service there; and that new ones will come. Those who have in the providence of God obtained this fine temple in which "the words of this life" are to be preached will exert themselves to provide in the supply of gospel labor, those men who are able rightly to divide the word; and may they come in the fulness of the blessing of the divine light.

In this step our brethren address themselves to the object of bringing a much larger number of people into contact with the grand and harmonizing truths which we give the world, upon Life and immortality in Christ. To this end, all interested should take hold with renewed vigor, and by every reasonable sacrifice and all possible labor, strive to accomplish an object so desirable.

Especially should we pray for the outpouring of the divine Spirit. This we need with renewed unction, that the cause may succeed—and let us never forget that it is for the glory of God alone, we are to work. Nothing of self or for self should be found. May the presence of the Holy One of Israel abide upon the Church, which shall now take another and a more prominent position in the Lord's vineyard! And may the truth become the conviction and salvation of thousands by means of this instrumentality!

W. S. Campbell.

Old Hundred in Camp.

A letter from Gen. Sherman's army down about the Kenesaw Mountains, said:

"At early dawn this morning (July 3d), before the troops were fully awakened from their slumbers, the melodious notes of 'Old Hundred,' given forth by one of the brigade bands, rang out upon the air, and were echoed by the green capped hills beyond. Soldiers intently occupied in preparing the morning meal stood still and listened to the melody, and instinctively joined in it.

"It flew from regiment to regiment; brigade after brigade took it up, and ere the notes of the band ceased to reverberate, five thousand were raised in 'Praise God from all blessings flow.' A moment after all was still. Breakfast was taken; and so silently did the veterans of many battle fields break camp and fall into line, that everybody remarked it, and complimented them for their conduct. I have heard 'Old Hundred' often when the huge lungs of the organ seemed inspired with life, and a congregation joined their melodeous voices; but never until to-day did I hear it sung with the full inspiration of the soul."

Love to Christ.

A converted Hindoo came one morning to the missionary, bringing his brass idols, and, throwing them on the ground, said—

"Enough of these; I have done with them, and wish to have no more to do with them. I have read much and learned much in my heathen books, but I have found no rest. In Christ alone is rest."

He also took from his neck a silver chain, bearing the name of his god, and, casting it on the ground, said—

"Enough. Nothing but sin has cleaved to me all the while I have kept this close to me. Please, sir, take it. I know of something better—the love of Jesus. O how different from all this! I know I must be persecuted by my friends and relatives, but I don't mind that."—Well Spring.

Letters and Extracts.

Mrs. N. M. Henry.

By a letter received at this office, we learn this sister has been sick at Webster City, Iowa. The date of the letter is Feb. 20, and was written by her dictation. She says:

"I have been stricken down with congestion of lungs and brain while carrying the glad tidings of life to the 'regions beyond.' I am very weak, and this is written by dictation—my amanuenses, kind, loving woman, who, with her noble hearted husband, the prominent Physician in this City, took the sick stranger in, and cared for me with most unremitting attention day and night; and I feel it is through their kindness and care, under the mercy of God, that I am living. I know you will say, God bless them, as will many others of my numerous friends. I thought, night before last, I was dying; then I dozed—the Lord seemed to stand by my bed: he looked so kind and pitiful—laid his hand caressingly on my head, repeated the words, 'Say ye to the righteous, it shall be well with him: but woe to the wicked, for it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him.' I awoke better. My symptoms have improved ever since. My commission has extended. I shall live to preach Jesus, the life and light of the world. Pray for me."

Accompanying the foregoing, is the following by Mrs. C. Crapper. She says:

"Dear Mrs. Henry has informed you of her health by me, acting as her amanuensis, and I feel like saying a few words in regard to her in her affliction and affluence: not that I would say she is laboring for and receiving the riches of this world—I mean her great success in her benevolent occupation. Her success here has never been equalled before. I am not a believer in her faith; or, in other words, an adventist; and, of course, I have a good opportunity of knowing what people think of her and her labors. She has been as near death as she could be and live; still we may become very low and yet the feeble breath of life be renewed with careful nursing. Mrs. H. has been with us some two weeks, and was taken sick here, at our house; and we have cared for her as if she were our own sister. She has had the attention of myself and husband day and night, and I suppose you can rejoice with us now for her recovery, though she can not yet sit up; but we feel in hopes she will be able to do so in a few days."

Shall We Go Forward?

Br. Storrs:—I read your paper carefully, and am exceedingly interested in its perusal. I find in it so many quotations from scripture, and difficult passages elucidated, that I am led more than ever to search the scriptures to see whether these things are so. I am not fully persuaded in my own mind with regard to the views of all the writers; but I am seeking for light and endeavoring to come to a knowledge of the truth.

I see in several of your papers mention is made of a Sister Henry who is living in the west, and is trying to do good as a public speaker. I would like to know if it is the same sister Henry that used to welcome me so cordially to that happy pilgrim's home in Blanford, Mass., where I have spent so many happy hours, and where as often as I knocked at the door I was greeted with a soul cheering smile and warm pressure of the hand from each member of the family? Where I was so often invited to a table spread with good things, and where we were wont to kneel together, and offer our prayers to the Father of spirits in unison of soul. There, too, I met good brother Hancock, the blind preacher, who, when I took my last leave of the place, pressed me to his bosom and gave me the christian salutation of olden times. My soul often goes back to those happy scenes, and I love to dwell upon them as bright spots in the dark pathway of my existence. It seems that the sister has passed through sore trials; but if she maintains as much buoyancy of spirit as she used to, under persecution in Massachusetts, she will pass triumphantly through them all.

I have for many years been a student of science and philosophy, and I have always thought that it was the privilege of intelligent minds to make progress in all matters that engaged the intellectual faculties. While we are discovering new truths, receiving new light, and making progress with regard to all other subjects, why must we be stationary on the subject of theology? Why must we be pinned down to the creed of our childhood and not dare to entertain a doubt of any of its tenets, however repulsive to our sympathies or antagonistic to our reason?

There is a great deal of slavery in the world besides that "sum of all villainies" which the God of justice is now putting down with such terrible havoc of humanity. Those that have named the name of Christ are not all free from the shackles of superstition, bigotry, and the traditions of men. We are told that the truth shall make us free, and that if any man do His will he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God. We may be required to break away from popular errors and embrace unpopular truths.

May God enable us to find the highway of holiness and walk therein.

Yours in christian fellowship.

Willard Griffin.

West Granby, Conn.

Note by the Editor:—We suppose "Sister Henry," now living in the west, is the same that Eld. Griffin used to meet at her home in "Blanford, Mass." Though Br. G. has been, or is now a Methodist Preacher, we hope he may soon see his way clear to go out with the glorious truth of life to dying men only through our Life-giver.

We can assure Br. G. we are "not fully persuaded with regard to the views of all the writers" in the Herald; nor would we be willing to be responsible for all those views; but we believe in having a paper as free as possible for the mutual exchange of thoughts; yet this freedom has its limits. Some writers would not only injure the truth, but themselves, if their communications were made public. It requires no little patience to go through the examination of some; and others, it would cost more time to fit them for the compositor than to write articles of equal length. But we try to treat all fairly: still we may fail. Most who write us are willing to submit their articles to the judgment of the Editor, and we intend to be as liberal as possible to all.

From M. M. Young.

Br. Storrs:—My mind has been somewhat exercised this morning on the glorious theme of Life only in Christ; and I never could obey the injunction of the apostle in 1 Tim. iv. 16, so well as now: "Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear to all: take heed unto thyself and unto the doctrine; continue in them, for in so doing thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee."

The noble theme of life and immortality through Christ, is sweet to my taste, and I do not wonder the Psalmist said it was sweeter to his taste than honey or the honey comb. My faith is brighter this morning, in these truths, than when I first believed. I have not found it true yet, that those who believe in these glorious truths are drying up, but the contrary. As far as my experience goes, the stronger the faith, the nearer we come to Christ.

If I am correct in my experience, I have been made to see that man is nothing but weakness; and the power of Christ shines forth in redeeming us from the grave in such a manner as I never saw before. It exalts Christ and places man in his proper place.

My mind never rested so firm in this blessed truth as now. I take great pleasure in conversing on this subject; and I am often led to remark, Oh, why is it that men will neglect offered mercy, and risk their eternal all upon nothing, when our heavenly Father has done so much for us, and provided such a glorious plan of redemption?

I left my place of business a few days since at noon, and walking up Maine St., I saw a picture in the window which attracted my attention. I stept up to the window to see what it was. It proved to be the President and the goddess of Liberty, seated in chairs opposite each other; her hand rested upon her knee, with the President's hand clasped in hers. Beneath them was written, "With all thy faults, I love thee still" O, what a sensation of feelings rushed through my mind. With all our honored President's faults the nation loves him still.

Now this may be applied in a number of cases. I will mention some as they passed through my mind. It will apply in our families. With all our faults, still we love them. And with all the faults we have, dear brethren, still we love each other. And to cap the whole train of thoughts, God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

With all our faults God loves us still. O, how I wish that the poor dying children of Adam could see and feel these glorious truths as I feel them. They would not rest one moment till they sought Christ and found him precious. O turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die? Yours, in hope of life in Christ alone.

Chelsea, Mass.

From William Lucas.

Peekskill, N. Y., March 1, 1865.

Br. Storrs:—I have been very much profited and encouraged by you and others in the journey of life. I have read almost every thing written by you, and much written by others, on the subject of no immortality only through Christ. And I think I should feel very ungrateful if I did not say some thing in the way of thanking you and others for all that has been written and has proved a blessing to me. I must say to one and all, I thank you. Ignorance, vice, and poverty were the companions of my childhood and my manhood: but the great Giver of all good has seen fit to give me an inquiring mind. About twenty years ago I saw your views of Immortality only through Christ. I then began to talk upon that subject; and so ignorant that any child almost might have been an over-match for me, on almost any subject. But I thought I was right; and I think so yet. Although I am so ignorant that I cannot read, write, or talk grammatically, yet I am not afraid to hold up my head and speak for the truth. They refuse to have me as a member in their churches; and some times call me crazy; and some times a fool; but these things do not harm me. I am doing battle almost alone in this place; but I am not discouraged. I hope to meet many of the lonely and the lowly in the morning of the resurrection. It encourages me to read the letters of such in the Herald of Life. You that can write grammatically and encouragingly, write on, and cheer the lonely and lowly: you will reap your reward when the lonely ones meet. I am a reader and subscriber to the Herald of Life, although my name does not appear on your list. I have my own reasons for that being so; reasons which I do not wish to tell. I am trying to live in opposition to every wrong, and particularly in opposition to intemperance, slavery, and Spiritualism. These are the great evils of the day, and should be fought manfully.

Yours in hope of eternal life, by a resurrection from the dead, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Another Letter From Elizabeth Smith.

Lyons, Iowa, Feb. 14, 1865.

Father Storrs:—I want to tell you about a conversation I had a few weeks ago with the Methodist minister, residing in this place. The churches are having a union protracted meeting; preaching one evening in one church, and the next in another. One evening I went into inquiry meeting [which is just before the evening service] with a young friend of mine, who wished to go. The meeting was in the Congregational church. The Methodist minister came and sit down beside me, saying, that he supposed I was a member of that church. I told him no; that I was a member of no church. He wished to know why? and I told him. He is quite well acquainted with father and mother, and knew their belief; but as I did not often attend his church, he knew nothing particularly about me. He thought, of course, that I was in error. I told him, all I wished was to know the truth. He seemed pleased, and commenced a conversation on my supposed error. I could not tell you word for word what he said, but will try and give you the sentiment.

I wanted to know, how he knew we had immortal souls; and that I could not see that the bible taught any such thing; but rather, that man was made out of the dust of the ground and God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; that was the way God made him. But he said, we knew it ourselves; that we were conscious of it by our being thoughtful; because we had something within us which could think and reason. I said, so has a dog, and that they also must have immortal souls. He replied, that sometimes he thought, himself, that may be they had. He seemed to query about it. So I asked him, why the Lord did not say that the penalty of the law was everlasting life in misery, instead of death, if that was what he meant? He said, that everlasting death did not mean to be put out of existence, but that man was dead in trespasses and sins; and being shut out from God was a continuance of that death; and that was what it meant.

There was considerable said by us both, and he thought if I would only look at in the right light I would easily understand; but said that I confused things, and did not look at them in a right manner. I replied, I thought, that was what he was doing.

I gave him all the bible which came to my mind, which he could not easily overthrow, and let him think, by my silence and attention while he was talking, that I was almost convinced; then, all at once, I would come out on him with the texts which were presented to my mind, which seemed to confuse him, as if they came unawares, and were troublesome.

We parted in a pleasant manner, saying myself, I should be pleased to renew the conversation at some more convenient time, as all I wished to know was the truth. He has promised to come and see us a number of times; but I guess his soul tells him it is dangerous to meddle with things too far above us; that we should be content with what knowledge is given us by God, and not be trying to find out his secrets. All that struck me as peculiar about our talk was, the query he made about the animals. What foolish ideas vain man will indulge in, instead of searching for the hidden wisdom of God's book.

APPOINTMENTS.

Eld. D. S. Holt will preach in Springfield, Mass., March 12th and 19th, in Rice's Hall.

Eld. Barnet Matthias will preach in Philadelphia, March 12th.

Dr. John Billings' Post Office address is Corinna, Me.

S. A. Kemp, Florida, Mass, writes:—I enclose five dollars. Three to be applied to the credit of David H. Baker, Italia, Kansas, for Vol. ii. of Herald of Life. The remainder to the "knocker's fund." Keep knocking.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

A Word to Correspondents.

"Each writer is required to state his own views on the topic he takes up, without a direct personal controversy with any other writer in our columns. This course does not restrict liberty of expression, but will save personal feelings."

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance Bible vs. Tradition, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the Herald of Life, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

Our Israelitish Origin.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. Wilson, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

Article I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

Note.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—Ed. of Her.

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of Dodworth's Hall, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening; afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That Leonard C. Thorne act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "Life and Advent Union," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

Diptheria.

I am happy to announce to the readers of the Herald of Life, that I am in the possession of a remedy that is a sure cure of Diptheria. I have used it for at least ten years in the treatment of this terrible disease, and have treated scores of cases (some of which had been given up by other Physicians) with entire success, not having lost a single case.

It cures the most malignant cases as certainly as the simplest forms of the disease. It is also purely Homeopathic.

Now I propose, for the sum of $1, to send to any who may desire it, a vial of this medicine, containing sufficient, at least, to cure half a dozen cases, with full directions for its use. The medicine can be sent by mail to any part of the country, and will keep any length of time without deteriorating in any latitude.

Address, Dr. A. Decker,
Newark, N. J.

P. S.—In all cases where the medicine fails to cure, the money will be refunded by notifying me of the fact. To the poor, who are not able to pay, free.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, The Righteous only will live again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with ut egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Poetry.

GETHSEMANE.

BY MARIA S.

Lines suggested by Br. W. S. C.'s sermon, preached in Philadelphia, Feb. 5, 1865. "He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

Supper was ended, and with bowed head
The suffering Saviour led his chosen band
Forth from the city. Kedron's ripling stream
Was passed; and near the shades of Olivet,
(That bold and grand upreared her rugged head)
He drew, and entered sad Gethsemane.
"Tarry ye here and watch, while yonder I
Pour out my soul in prayer." 'Twas thus he spake
Unto the favored three, and left them there.
Never before had those old Olive trees—
Beneath whose shade, at sultry noon he oft
Was wont to linger—witnessed such a scene.
Prone upon the earth, in untold anguish,
Knelt the Holy One. Sore travail rent his Guiltless soul. Deep birth-throes for the life of Ruined man. "My Father, O my Father!"
Hear Him cry, "If it be possible to.
Let this bitter cup be from me borne, O!
Let it be;—If not, Thy will be done."
'Twas more than faltering human soul could bear,
The form Divine was bowed beneath the weight
Of agonizing woe. And while he sweat [ed
Great drops of blood, slow trickling down, and rais-
His weeping eyes, the white-winged messenger
Of love, from the eternal Father's throne,
Was hovering near, to strengthen and sustain
The crushed and bleeding One.

And strength was given
To drain the bitter cup, e'en to its dregs.
The agony is past. The travail of
His soul is gone. And he is satisfied,
Since through his death and rising from the tomb,
Poor fallen erring mortal man may live.
O! wondrous plan,—That opens wide to us
The gates of Everlasting Life.

Believe,
And thou shal live: Ransomed, redeemed, a life
That ne'er shall end. Believing not thou'rt doomed
To death, forever from the presence of
The Lord, forgotten shalt thou be.
O fearful doom!

AN ADDRESS TO THE HERALD.

DEAR HERALD OF LIFE:—How curious that you should adopt such a curious name with which to elbow your way through such a theologically ring-streaked, spotted and speckled mass of living humanity, as that moving on the present stage of action; as noted for diversity of religious beliefs, as Jacob's flocks for diversity of colors when he started from his father-in-law's house of servitude.

Trusting you are fully prepared to surmount every obstacle, allow me to note a few.

First and foremost: A muscular brother, who, lording it over God's heritage, says, "Friends, I tell you, you are wrong: there is no soul or vitality in the hobby you are riding. I know it." A sectarian sister abuses you for trying to make her household believers in Voltaire's infidelity, not realizing that if the christian world had always lived in the enjoyment of the faith once delivered to the saints, infidelity, like a parasite, could never have affixed itself to and mingled with every sectarian organization of the age.

A sectarian brother tells you, or your readers, "If the bible does not teach the endless misery of the wicked in brimstone and fire he don't want a bible in his house!" And yet, this brother's love for intoxicating liquors is such that his usefulness, as a follower of the meek and lowly one, is perfectly nullified by this habit. He says further "If the wicked are not raised from the dead, let us eat, drink, and enjoy ourselves to the utmost."

What inate agony of mind pierces our very being to hear a praying man thus indirectly admit that he knows nothing of the christian's hope. How forcible the words of Jesus, Ye would not come unto me that ye might have life. What next attracts your attention, dear Herald? One which requires the utmost charity. Yes, what is it? A preacher of the truth as it is in Christ, who needs to be reminded of the apostle John's words, "He that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure," by abstaining from all that which pollutes, poisons and shortens life. Does he palliate his sin by saying that habit and his physician prescribe it as a necessity. Tell him that the apostle Paul says, "Through Christ strengthening me, I can do all things."

Ought we not in laboring for the good of others to be actuated by the same spirit, and combine purity of thought and life with the teachings of the word of God, that we may in all pureness commend by well ordered lives and Godly conversation, eternal life to the attention of our fellow men?

The next and last stumbling obstacle that we shall now speak of, to the spread of truth, is, that sickly, religious sentimentalism which seems to feed on nothing but that "the wise shall understand:" spending weeks, months, and years in trying by human wisdom to fathom divine and Almighty wisdom in regard to the times and seasons. It does seem to me that Jesus when he comes and finds some, in his name, alleviating the miseries and woes of poor bleeding, suffering humanity, and pointing the poor weary sin-sick soul to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, with extended arm and beaming eye, would say, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," &c. Is not that a morbid christianity which finds its only vitality in what are called "time movements"? the most prolific source of that hatred and contempt with which we have had to contend in advocating the destruction of the wicked, and the glorious truth of no life in the future to any but those who by patient continuance in well doing have sought for glory and immortality. To them he will render eternal life.

Because we desire an event ever so much, is it the part of common sense or the wisdom that cometh from above to pry into that which has nothing to do with that development of character which is to fit us for the joys of the redeemed? Let us therefore combine our energies in striving to redeem our heavenly Father's name from reproach, by doing all that we can to oppose error and superstition, and tearing away the veil of wrong ideas which seems to blind the minds of the world in regard to the gospel of the Son of God.

And now, my dear Herald, I bid you God-speed. You and I have enjoyed many a precious hour in communing on the things pertaining to the kingdom of God; and my daily prayer is, that your columns may be filled with that, and that only, which is dictated by the Holy Spirit; and that those who direct you may be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. P. S.—I see by the New York papers that Petrolium stock companies are very much the rage; and that they promise great dividends. Will you have the kindness to subscribe for me three $1 shares in the—"Preacher's horse stock company;" and when the stockholders meet, and the dividends are declared in the kingdom, wont there be more joy than over any earthly dividends? THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL.

ITS SECRET MOTIVE AND ITS EFFECT ON EUROPE.

The London Spectator gives a curious explanation of the secret motive of the Pope's Encyclical. It seems that the Vatican had expected secret assurances of support in the new order established by the Concordat from the Austrian and Spanish governments, and were prepared to welcome the vote of the Italian parliament, accepting a convention, by a circular to the Catholic powers placing the Holy Chair expressly under their protection, and thus offer to Napoleon the alternative of either replacing Austria in Italy, or of appearing to the French Catholics as the man who intercepted necessary relief from reaching it. But the answer from Austria was unfavorable, avowing that the doctrine of intervention precluded that power from affording material assistance to Rome. The Austrian ambassador, moreover, in communicating this answer, "spoke of the Italian instead of the Piedmontese kingdom, and described its government as one with conservative elements entitled to respect. Don Pacheco almost at the same time brought a reply very similar in form from Madrid, and the Papal court chafed into rashness resolved to condemn non-intervention authoritatively as an heretical practice. It was not of course possible to denounce the principle alone, for it is exclusively secular, and, moreover, an encyclical must always appear exempt from immediate and earthly motive. The Pope's advisers therefore bethought themselves of the string of propositions prepared for anathema two years before, and resolved on issuing them with the theory of non-intervention among them. So irritated, moreover, were they, that they departed for the first time in the history of modern Papacy, from the principle that the Catholic church shall only condemn ideas, not special acts springing out of ideas, the theory being that the morality of individual or exceptional cases can not be reduced to rule."

How the Pope's course will affect the devotedly Catholic powers remains to be seen; but the French government and people are more set than ever against him. The encyclical is regarded as a blow aimed at the entity of the state, devotion to which is the ruling passion of the French people. The reply of the emperor has been defiant.

"As his first reply he made Prince Napoleon, the sworn foe of the Papacy, vice-president of the privy council, and as the second forbade the bishops to circulate the encyclical among the cures of the dioceses under their rule. He has, moreover, been obeyed, for not to mention Paris, which is always ruled by a prelate of Gallican sentiments, the Archbishop of Cambrai, a strong Ultramontane, has contented himself with a protest, and the Bishop of Moulins, Monseigneur de Dreux Breze, a descendant of the immortal grand chamberlain of Louis XVI., has only so far defied the law as to read the encyclical from his pulpit, the order only prohibiting its circulation. Among the people it has produced either no effect, or one so little expected that orders have been issued to the religious press to explain away the encyclical as containing only propositions recognized by the church in all ages. The Voltarians are of course delighted, and the only really religious party in France in the English sense of the phrase—the men who desire to unite Catholic unity with freedom—are grievously cast down, M. de Montalembert even repudiating publicly a statement that the decree had in any way changed his views. Further, the encyclical has undoubtedly struck a severe blow at the temporal power. A section of the opposition had intended to appeal strongly to the jealousy of Italian unity always latent in France under cover of a strong protest against the evacuation of Rome, but the Pope has broken the swords of his friends. They are before and beyond all things French statesmen, and French statesmen can not defend the principles of the middle ages. Even M. Thiers will not venture to assert that ecclesiastical should control civil authority; even M. Guizot's mouthpiece can not support the assertion that it is heretical to desire the Pope to reconcile himself with civilization; even M de la Rochejaquelein will not admit that political non-intervention is a principle to which it is impious to adhere. One immense difficulty in the emperor's way, the secret desire of the large class which cares about policy rather than creeds that he should remain at Rome, is removed by their indignation at the Roman pretensions, and the effect of the encyclical therefore has been to smooth the way to the downfall of the temporal power. For the first time it seems probable that, let the Holy Chair stand as firm as it may, the throne of Rome is shaking. If the emperor is enabled by the Pope himself to withdraw his troops, and Austria pleads non-intervention, and Spain 'with all respect to the Holy Father,' recognizes accomplished facts, and Russia is irritated, and England calmly stands aside watching, not without glee, the application of the peine forte et dure to her old enemy, and the Pope can raise no army, and Italy remains ready for an agreement, and the Roman people retain for two more years the hate which has been unquenched for fifty, what is to prevent the result of which Protestants, warned by long historic experience, in their hearts despair?"

The prevailing opinion in Europe, even among Catholics, is that the effect of the encyclical will be to accelerate the disorganization of the Papal power.—The Methodist.

THE ARMIES OF THE BIBLE.

Few persons are aware of the immense numbers composing the armies of the warlike ancient nations mentioned in the Scriptures, or of the almost incredible multitudes slain in their battles. Indeed it is scarcely equalled by anything in profane history. The slaughter of thousands by Saul, and ten thousands by David, was celebrated in song. 1 Sam. xviii. 7. The destruction of twenty five thousand (Judges xx. 35), thirty thousand (1 Sam. iv. 10) mem in battle in the ranks of but one of the fiercely contending forces, was of common occurrence. Even this number exceeded the number killed in any one fight thus far during the whole war for the Union of these States. And yet our losses and carnage has seemed frightful. And what a bloody strife when the victorious army of David slew of the Syrians "forty thousand horsemen" (2 Sam. x. 18), or it may be "forty thousand" footmen 1 Chron xix. 18. In one battle there fell of the Ephramites forty-two thousand (Judg. xii. 6). At another time the Jews slew of their enemies seventy-five thousand (Es. ix. 16), a number equal to the whole army of Gen. Sherman. In one day in a bloody battle fought between Israel led on by Ahab, and the hosts of Syria under Ben-hadad and thirty-two kings with him, the former slew of the latter one hundred thousand armed men. 1 Kings xx. 29. The host was equal to the entire army of Gen. Meade at the sanguinary battle of Gettysburg. It was also equal to the slain at Waterloo. See, too, Judges viii. 10, which records the destruction of "one hundred and twenty thousand men that drew the sword," by the hand of the warrior Gideon. Observe also 2 Chron. xxviii. 6, where it is stated an equal number of Judah were put to death in a single day, every one of them "valient men.".

But what shall we say of the standing army of Jehosaphat the lofty king of Israel, whose armed hosts numbered over one million one hundred and sixty thousand souls? 2 Chron. xvii. Need we wonder that all the surrounding kingdoms feared Israel and Israel's God? What nation now on earth, save it be our own, has another such an army? Three hundred thousand was a very common number of the armed men of the ancient Jews (Num. xxxi. 36; 1 Sam. xi. 8; 2 Chron. xvii. 14 and xxv. 5, etc.), yet this is a number nearly equal to the whole population of the State of Vermont. At one time in the days of the Judges xx. 2, four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword went out to fight against Benjamin. David's "valient men that drew the sword" even exceeded the armed hosts of Jehosaphat. We are told in 2 Sam. xxiv., that with Israel and Judah combined it amounted to one million three hundred thousand, while another account in 1 Chron. xxi. 5 makes one million five hundred and seventy thousand. What a host of warriors! Zerah, king of Ethiopia, on one occasion came out against Asa the pious king of Judah with an army at his heels consisting of one million of men and three hundred chariots. 2 Chron. xiv. To oppose this great multitude, king Asa had but five hundred and eighty thousand men of valor. But Asa "cried unto the Lord his God," and then, though his foes were two to one, set himself in battle array, and achieved a great victory, the Ethiopians being utterly overthrown. "The Lord is a man of war!"

But of all ancient battles, that which took place B. C. 957, between Judah and Israel, as recorded in 2 Chron. xiii., exceeds all others in carnage. The armed hosts went out under their respective kings with four hundred thousand and eight hundred thousand on a side. Twelve hundred thousand men on one field of battle, engaged in close, mortal combat! The slaughter seems almost past belief. But thus reads the oracles: "There fell down slain of Israel (500,000) five hundred thousand men." This vast number probably equals the entire male population of the greatest city on this continent, viz., New York. It exceeds the number slain by Julius Cæsar, who killed at one time 400,000 Usipetes, and at another time in one battle 480,000 Germans; and this last mentioned battle exceeds in the multitudes slain any other I can find recorded in profane history. Still the battle of the Hebrews I have last named outnumbers it in the list of its dead! What a wonderful book is the Bible!

It is a terrible thing for men and nations to go to war. "For the indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies: he hath utterly destroyed them; he hath delivered them to the slaughter." Isa. xxiv. 2. The time is just at hand when the Lord God will "make wars to cease unto the end of the earth." Ps. xlvi. 9. Merciful Father in heaven, speed on the day!

Then shall wars and tumults cease,
Then be banished grief and pain,
Righteousness and joy and peace
Undisturbed shall ever reign.

"THE ART OF MONEY GETTING."

It is necessarily a daily care with the man of modest pretensions and limited means, how he shall provide in these times for the proper support of himself and family; and in these times too, it is no sinecure of an office to get money Some get rich from what is called "good luck" and but few—very few from what is known to be hard word—the laborer is not the getter of wealth; he, as a general thing is the instrument by which the rich are made richer—but it will not always be so.

My attention was attracted the other day while looking over the daily paper, by a notice that a celebrated showman would deliver a lecture on "the art of money getting," in the church of a certain Professor whose anxiety is evidently greater to get out of debt—or, at least, see the debt of his church canceled, than it is to get rid of some of those monstrous errors he is the teacher of. I judge thus, because I am somewhat aware of his position in the great controversy which is going on, and will go on until the last vestage of the folly taught shall find no place nor hearer. I am not surprised at the course pursued by the Professor, for in these times the course pursued by preachers and people is, to my mind, unquestionably a reversion of the order of God in the promulgation of his word. I have yet to learn the right or duty of any who call themselves christians, to first get into a debt so heavy that the great aim, and to appearances, is how to get out. If then an individual christian is unwarranted by the word of God to do thus, I ask by what argument can it be proven the duty of a body of christians doing so? Men change—truth never; and the principle laid down by the apostle Paul, "owe no man anything," can not be too strictly attended to, if we wish to steer clear of shoals and rocks on which the hopes of, ah! how many have been dashed. But, says the apologist for church debts, and he probably though unwittingly quotes the Jesuitical sentiment, to which they—the Jesuites—resort ad libitum "The means are justified by the end;" their end is, to proselyte by adding to the Roman Church deluded admirers. Now it is a question I have settled for ever, for myself, that this is as speciously false in sentiment as it is in fact; and if the great end for which the proclamation of the Good News was kept in view, viz.: to lead men out of error and bondage and introduce them into light and liberty—I say if this was the most prominent characteristic of our efforts there would be no boasting about "our steeple," of "our church" being forty feet higher than some other building of like character! No, these things would not be, and I am now more than nine-tenths convinced that no christian body would thus talk. We live in a time which is truly beautiful; and the greater the show, the greater the patronage. My daily prayer is for the uprooting of all this nonsense; and I may say, deep darkness.

The following is the advertisement spoken of:

BARNUM UP TOWN.—P. T. Barnum, Esq., delivers his celebrated lecture on "The Art of Money Getting," in Prof. Matteson's church, Forty-first street, near Sixth avenue, this (Wednesday) evening at 8 o'clock. Tickets 30 cents, to help cancel church debt.

A MINISTER IN A DILEMMA.

It is well known to all who have read the life of Edwin Irving that his prayers were unreasonably long. Dr. Chalmers complained, when he came to preach the dedication sermon at his new church in London, that Mr. Irving prayed over an hour, and wearied the people before the time for the sermon. The following ludicrous incident shows how this habit once brought a minister into trouble:

For a considerable time he had what he called an early prayer meeting once a week, which prayer meeting was open to any who chose to attend it. The hour at which it commenced was six in the morning. Many dissenting ministers whose duties in their respective chapels, prevented their hearing him preach on the Sabbath day, were induced by their anxiety to see and hear him speak to attend his early prayer meetings.

On one occasion, the Rev. Mr. ——, a popular dissenting minister, made his appearance at Mr. Irving's house precisely as the clock struck six in the morning. After a pasalm had been sung, Mr. Irving requested one of his elders to address the throne of grace. The party having done so very briefly, another psalm, of the Scotch version of the psalms of David, was sung, when Mr. Irving himself engaged in prayer. The reverend gentleman continued in the exercise about fifteen minutes without the slightest symptoms of drawing to a conclusion.

The dissenting minister being at the time connected with a theological institution, had a class of pupils to meet precisely at seven. It was now within twenty-five minutes of the time, and as, after leaving Mr. Irving's house, it would require a quarter of an hour of the most rapid cab-driving to carry him to the place where his class met, so as to be in time, he became exceedingly fidgetty at the circumstance of the reverend gentleman continuing so long; still he was unwilling to disturb the meeting by rising and leaving the room in the middle of Mr. Irving's prayer.

He determined on waiting a little longer, in the anxious hope that the reverend gentleman would every moment relieve him from the embarassing situation in which he felt himself to be placed, by bringing his devotions to a termination. The next time he took out his watch it was within five minutes of the latest moment he could remain. Imagine his feelings when Mr. Irving seemed still so earnestly engaged in prayer as not to hold out the most slender hope of concluding for a considerable time to come. Two minutes more elapsed, and still no appearance of Mr. Irving coming to a close. The dissenting minister could bear it no longer, but rising from his knees, he escaped to the door of the room, which was partially open, and made his way down stairs in the quietest possible manner.

He had just reached the street door, and was in the act of lifting the latch, when a large Newfoundland dog, which Mr. Irving kept in the house at the time, sprang upon him, and placing one of his forepaws on either shoulder, forced the reverend gentleman down to a crouching position, with his head against the door. The animal fortunately, did not bite or in any way hurt Mr. ——, but kept him in the position just mentioned for at least five minutes, when Mr. Irving having concluded his devotions, one of his servants, on coming down stairs, released him from the exceedingly awkward and unpleasant predicament in which he was placed.—Selected.

LESSONS OF EARTH.

BY S. N. C.

'Twas a peerless lily floating
Down a calm pellucid stream;
Spotless, snow-like petals floating,
In unclouded morning beam.

Silently it floated—sweetly
Folded in magnificence;
Golden-winged the hours fleetly
Mingled joy and radiance.

E'er the noon of that bright dawning,
Clouds and tears a shadow gave,
Rolled the unrippled stream of morning,
Now in many a gathering wave.

And the lily—lily sunlit—
Heaven-blest; star-watched—zephyr-kissed
Should the whelming waters crush it,
Perishing in wild abyss?

Snatched I then the pure frail lily,
From the waves—in madness swept;
And I gazed upon it sadly,—
To its heart a blight had crept.

In the blissful radiant morning
All beclouded e'er its noon,—
Storm-lashed streamlet—lily blighted
Read I then each mortal's doom.

THE LAMP.

There was once a king who had some sons, and he promised to give each of them a kingdom. But he wished them to travel for some time. And they asked the king which way they should travel. And he said he would give them a lamp which would rest and shed its light on the right path.

They went on for some time very happily, and when they were in difficulty they took out their lamp, and it never failed to show them the road and though it did not always the pleasantest path, yet they were enabled to overcome the difficulties they met with, and still went on peacefully.

But after a time they began to be unkind to each other, and they forgot their father, and did not like to be guided by the lamp. So they took some clay, and covered up one side of the lamp, that it should shine the way they wished; and then, at last, they covered up the lamp altogether, and chose only the pleasantest path. But there is often a thorn under the rose, and so they found it. They got into a great deal of trouble. A friend met them, and told them that they were in the wrong road; and when he looked at their lamp he saw that it was all covered up. He took off the clay, and it showed the right way, as before.

Now what does this friendly lamp mean?

O, the Bible! I knew that in a minute. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." Ps. cxix. 105. How nicely this verse suits the parable!

Yes, dear reader, it does; but will it apply to us? Are we making God's word our guide? You are young, but you have as much need to be led in the right way as a grown up person, for children are easily drawn aside. Take this lamp with you, and follow its light, and you will go safely and happily through life.

But how can any body cover up the lamp? The Jews covered it up with their traditions. "Ye have made the word of God of none effect," said our Saviour, "through your traditions." And sin, and prejudice, and pride hide the light of truth from the minds of many persons now. Pray the Holy Spirit, that he, by his blessed teaching, may make you understand the Bible; and also to incline your heart to obey its precepts. This will be a nice short prayer for you, "Cause me to know the way wherein I should walk." Ps. cxliii. 8.

THE WRONG TURNING.

When I was a boy—but that is a long time ago, for many a crop of corn has been gathered into the garner and many a fall of snow has covered the hills and the valleys since then; ay! and many a friend and companion has been carried to the cold grave; but, as I said, when I was a boy, my father sent me on an errand to a farm house a few miles in the country. "You must go," said he, "straight along the turnpike road, till you come to the second milestone, and then, passing the big house with the rookery in the elm tree, you must take the first turn to the right, which will lead you to farmer Gilbert's house; but mind, whatever you do, be sure that you do not take the wrong turning."

Boy like, I was so pleased with the prospect of a pleasant walk into the country, that I did not attend so carefully as I ought to have done to the directions which my father gave me; so, that, when I had passed the second milestone, and arrived at the big house with the rookery in the elm trees, I could not at all remember whether I was to take the first turn to the right hand or to the left. After puzzling for some time, I made upmy mind to go to the left. I did so and there by took the wrong turning.

Well, on I went, as I thought, for farmer Gilbert's till the lane got very narrow, and the road very dirty. At one part there was a gate across it, and in getting over the gate I did not perceive that the bottom hinge was off it; no sooner had I mounted the gate than it swung on one side, and flung me into the mire, and a fine dirty state I was in. A dog came growling out of a cottage by the roadside; to get rid of the dog I clambered over the hedge, and in my haste, almost tore off the skirt of my jacket. With the intention of defending myself from the dog when I should return, I pulled out my pocket-knife to cut a stick; but in doing this I cut my finger, and dropped my knife into the ditch, and could not find it again. After all my misfortunes, no farmer Gilbert could I find. Indeed it would have been strange if I had, for every step I had taken since leaving the turnpike road had led me further and further from his house. At last, I asked a man, who was working in a field, to tell me the nearest way to farmer Gilbert's, mentioning at the same time which way I had come. "I do not wonder," said the man, "at your being puzzled; why, my lad, you have taken the wrong turning."

I soon set off back again, blaming myself for not having paid more attention to the directions of my father. I found no further difficulty in my way to farmer Gilbert's, and having done my errand, I returned home, heartily repenting the error I had committed in taking the wrong turning.

No sooner did my father see me, than he began thus: "Why, Robert, where have you been? You have been long enough to do the errand twice over; what a pickle your shoes and stockings are in; and the skirt of your jacket is almost off! What have you been about?"

I then told my father the whole of my mishaps, just as they had occurred to me: how the gate had flung me into the mire; how the dog had attacked me; and how I tore my jacket, cut my finger, and lost my pocket-knife, and I acknowledged that all these things had been brought about by my foolishly taking the wrong turning.

"Ah! my lad," said my father, "you are not the first, by a great many, who have smarted by neglecting their father's directions, and by taking the wrong turning.

All of us who live in the world have an errand to perform, and have to find our way to heaven. The path of duty is the road along which we go; and the Bible contains the instructions of our heavenly Father, giving us the plainest directions, that we may not be pained and perplexed by losing our road. Those who attend to these directions find their way easily: but those who neglect them get into a thousand troubles. When travelling heavenward, it is a terrible thing to take a wrong turning.

"As the young are travellers as well as the old, it is necessary that they should be be led and guided, according to their ages, until they are able to read and understand the directions given in the Scriptures. When children are old enough to comprehend God's holy word, that word should be their guide continually; and woe be to them if they neglect it; for if, in looking about you in the world, you behold want, misery and despair, in almost every case they have been brought about by people taking the wrong turning!"

Poetry.

OUR COMING KING.

BY S. N. C.

Soon Christ will come again,
Soon, soon He'll come to reign,
My soul responds, "Amen,"
So let it be.

Yes, He will come with power,
Fair Eden to restore,
And give from that glad hour
Freedom to me.

Freedom from death's embrace,
Freedom from sin's disgrace,
All its effects erase,
Sorrow and pain.

With a strong hand He'll bind
That foe of all mankind:
Satan shall never find
Victory again.

Then shall we see and know
Why we had such a foe,
Why were our wrongs below
Thus multiplied.

Why Jesus left his home,
Came from his Father's throne,
Trod this curs'd earth—alone,
Why Jesus died!

Soon He'll to us relate,
Why we have thus to wait,
And fully vindicate,
God's ways to man.

Then seeing eye to eye,
Cleared up all mystery,
We will extol for aye,
His wondrous plan.

Then with a sweet accord,
Sound, sound the truth abroad,
Which from the blessed word
Opes to our view.

Freely do we receive,
So should we freely give,
All who believe shall live
And praise Him too.

Now let our hearts rejoice,
And with a joyful noise,
Echo with cheerful voice
Redemption nigh.

Haste! haste, we almost hear
His chariot wheels so near,
Look up with holy fear
Earth's King espy.

Ten thousand in his Train,
Earth joins her glad refrain,
Nations hearing his fame
Their offerings bring.

Seeing His matchless power,
They wonder and adore,
And own forever more
Their Lord and King.

WAS THE FLOOD UNIVERSAL?

Our reason for introducing this question is the use made of it by the apostle Peter. 2 Peter iii. 5, 6, 7. "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by (or according to) the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; by which the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished. But the heavens and the earth which are now, by (or according to) the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." This paragraph has been applied by some to the time yet future, when the Lord shall come to reign on the throne of his father David; but it will be seen, before we close, that it has no such application.

In chapter ii. 5, allusion is also made to this subject: "And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing the flood upon the world of the ungodly." Let us now turn to the account given of the flood by that divine historian Moses. "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth," and he said, "I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth, both man and beast, and the creeping animal, and the fowls of the air." Again he says—"The end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with violence through them: and behold I will destroy them from the earth." Once more he says—"And behold, I, even I do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, in which is the breath of life, from under heaven: and everything that is on the earth shall die." These references may be found in Genesis, vi.

In order to understand this subject fully, we must,

1st. Attend to the meaning of the terms earth and world, and learn their signification.

2. We must know the purpose of God in sending the flood.

Now the Greek word ge, earth, has the following meanings: the land, the earth, the world, the inhabitants of the earth, a land, region, tract, country, territory, Canaan or Palestine, a city, the inhabitants of any region or country: land which may be tilled, soil, field, the fruit or produce of the earth; the ground, i. e., to be inferior, imperfect, transient, perishable.

And just here, I will remark, that the word is, comparatively, but seldom applied to the whole globe in the scriptures. It is generally used in a limited sense, as the context in any given case will show. I hope to prove this in regard to the flood.

The word kosmos, world, signifies order, regularity, regular disposition; ornament, decoration, embellishment; the world, universe, the earth, globe, a region of country; Palestine, the inhabitants of the earth, human race; the many, multitude, public; a multitude of things; vast collection or aggregate; from the Hebrew the present world, or age, or period of the world, as marked by imperfection, wickedness and vice. The men of this world, as imperfect, ignorant and vicious; the things of this age or world, as being frail, transient, &c.

I shall first attend to the term earth, as used by Moses and Peter.

Does the term earth, as used by Moses, mean the globe, or only that extent of its surface which was then populated?

We have already given you the meaning of the original word, by which it is manifest that we are supported in the limited use of the word. And now the question arises, was it necessary, in order to accomplish the purpose of God, to envelop the whole globe in water?

It is evident to my mind that the term earth, in reference to the flood, imports no more than the land, country, or territory then inhabited. This view is sustained by Peter when he speaks of God "bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly." If the question, then, be asked, upon what world did God bring the flood? the answer is, in the language of Peter, "upon the world of the ungodly." This limits the flood to that portion of the "earth" which was then populated; which, perhaps was not more than one-fourth of the globe.

The purpose of God was to "destroy the word of the ungodly;" and to say that he could not do this, without enveloping the whole globe with water, is to limit his power. A large portion of the globe is, at the present time, under a "flood," but the whole globe is not.

Peter speaking of the scoffers of his day, says: "For this they willingly are ignorant of, that, according to the word of God, the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; by which (water) the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished." The world still stands "out of the water and in the water:" and it would be a comparatively easy matter to deluge any single country on the globe by upheaving the earth beneath the vast deep, and causing the water to flow over the land. This could be done without producing a universal flood. It could be accomplished by convulsions of the earth—a principle by which numerous islands have been formed in the Pacific, and other oceans. In many places on the globe these physical changes, on a small scale are continually taking place. In some the ocean recedes from the shore, thus increasing the quantum of land or earth; in others it encroaches upon the land. In some cases the earth is elevated for miles in extent, in others, depressed. These are practical examples, and display the philosophy of the subject.

In the first chapter of Genesis we have this account: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep." In this place the earth is represented as being covered with water. At verse 9 we read: "And God said, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear." In chapter ii. we read of a river which "went out of Eden to water the garden;" this was divided into four heads. The name of the first is Pison; the second Gihon; the third Hiddekel; the fourth Euphrates. Thus we find the earth, it is presumed, at the flood; for we have no indication of any physical changes in the earth before the flood. There is no proof that it rained before the deluge, the earth, at that time, being in this respect like the land of Egypt. Eygpt is watered by the Nile; Eden was watered by a river divided into four streams; and, in addition to that, in as much as "the Lord had not caused it to rain upon the earth, there went up a mist" which settled in the form of dew upon the earth and the productions of the earth.

It is objected to my view of this matter, that the whole globe bears marks of having once been covered with water. This position is freely granted; but it does not in the least militate against the truth of my position. I have already shown by reference to Genesis that the earth originally was entirely enveloped with water; but it does not follow, therefore, that it was so at the flood. This is quite another question. There is a geological page in God's Book of Nature which teaches us that the fossil remains which are fonnd on the earth's surface, as well as embedded in its bowels, are much older than the flood; yes, as old as the creation. Besides, water is not the agent by which bones, shells, &c., &c., become petrified. Heat, caloric, electricity—this is the wonder working agent in these productions. There is little doubt but the centre of the earth is filled with liquid fire; and being thus pent up in the bowels of the earth, the volcanoes are only so many safety valves through which the superabundant heat may escape.

As our object is more to call attention to the subject than to elaborate it, we will briefly state the reasons on which our view of this case is based:

1. The terms earth and world are more frequently than otherwise used in a limited sense. Examples of this may be found in the predictions concerning Babylon, Ninevah, Edom, and Jerusalem, to which we may refer again.

2. The purpose of God did not require the complete deluge of the globe, it being merely to destroy "the world of the ungodly;" which world did not embrace the globe.

3. The ark, though large, could not have contained sevens or pairs of all the animals on the globe, and the fowls of heaven. It would have been a physical impossibility.

4. Mount Ararat is said to rise 12,000 feet above the levil of the sea, and Moses states that the waters prevailed "fifteen cubits upwards." We suppose, then, that the waters covered Mount Ararat about 28 feet. This would not have covered the highest mountains on the globe.

5. A distinguished philosopher has calculated that there is not water enough on the globe, including the vapors of the atmosphere, to cover the earth, with its present size, more than an inch in depth.

6. If a sufficient quantity of water could be collected on the earth's surface to envelop the globe, and cover the highest mountains, its increased gravity would be such as to disturb the harmony of the Solar System.

7. In this case, the motion of the earth on its axis, from west to east, would have produced such a current westward, that, instead of the ark resting on Mount Ararat, it would have been carried to the Western Continent. This current would absolutely have been irresistible. Like a mighty tornado it would have swept every thing before it.

8. As proof that the earth itself was not destroyed, as some suppose, the dove, sent forth by Noah, finally returned with an "olive leaf plucked off," thus showing that the trees were yet standing. And modern travelers inform us that, there are trees in Mexico and France, the yearly growth of which is clearly indicated by their external appearance; and that these indications prove them to be much older than the flood.

Thus we have given the heads of the reasons on which we rely in this matter; and, if we have not proven our position, we have, at least, furnished a subject for examination and reflection.

THE DOOMED CITIES AND DEAD SEA.

ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, M. A., Canon of Canterbury, in his work entitled "Sinai and Palestine," republished by Redfield, thus speaks of the cities of the Plain and the Dead Sea:

The name of Sodom (burning) if it be not derived from the subsequent catastrophe, shows, like the "Phlegræan" fields of Campania, that the marks of fire had already passed over the doomed valley. The name of "Bela," the old name of "Zoar," was understood by Jewish tradition—perhaps fancifully, yet certainly in accordance with probability—to allude to the fact of its frequent subversion by earthquakes. In what precise manner "the Lord overthrew the cities" is not clearly indicated in the records either of Scripture or of natural remains. The great difference of level between the bottoms of the northern and the southern ends of the Lake, the former being a depth of thirteen hundred, the latter only of thirteen feet, below the surface, confirms the theory that the southern end is of recent formation, and, if so, was submerged at the time of the fall of the cities, and that the vale of Siddim was the whole of the bay south of the promontory which now almost closes up its northern portion. But as Reland long ago pointed out, there is no reason, either in Scripture or history, for supposing that the cities themselves were destroyed by submersion, or were submerged at all: and the mode of the catastrophe is emphatically and repeatedly described to be not water but fire. Further than this it is impossible to determine without more exact knowledge than we now possess.

A great mass of legend and exageration, partly the effect, partly the cause of the old belief that the cities were buried under the Dead Sea, has been gradually removed in recent years. The glittering surface of the lake, with the thin mist of its own evaporations floating over its surface, will now no more be taken for a gloomy sea, sending forth sulphurous exalations. The birds which pass over it without injury, have long ago destroyed the belief that no living creature could survive the baneful atmosphere that hung upon its waters. And, although we can not accept, without further confirmation the traces of sites which M. De Saulcy believes that he has recently discovered, yet there is nothing increditable in the fact that he should at least have found what were considered as the vestiges of the five devoted cities in the time of Josephus, Strabo, Tacitus, and of the writers of the new testament, "set forth for an example, suffering the vengence of eternal fire"—not beneath the waters of the lake, but on its barren shores.

But it has still its manifold interest, both physical and historical. Viewed merely in a scientific point of view, it is one of the most remarkable spots of the world. First, it may be regarded as one of the most curious of inland seas. It is thirteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean Sea, and thus the most depressed sheet of water in the world; as the Lake Sir-i-kol, where the Oxus rises,—is the most elevated. Its basin is a steaming cauldron,—a bowl, as it has been well described, which, from the peculiar temperature and deep cavity in which it is situated, can never be filled to overflowing. The river, itself exposed to the same withering influences is not copious enough to furnish a supply equal to the demand made by the rapid evaporation. Further, this basin is the Gordian knot of all the theories which have been raised to account for the phenomena of the Jordan valley. From the moment that Burckhardt discovered the valley of the Arabah between the Dead Sea and the Red Sea, an hypothesis was naturally formed that this had originally been the outlet of the Jordan into the latter sea, till its waters were detained by the sudden formation of the Dead Sea in the same convulsion, as it was supposed, that overthrew the five cities. But this theory is no longer tenable, since it has been found that the waters of the Arabah flow into the Dead Sea from a watershed almost midway between the two seas, and that the Gulf of Akaba is thirty-five feet higher than the Mediteranean, namely, more than thirteen hundred feet above the Dead Sea and Jordan valley. It is clear that the cavity of the Dead Sea belongs to the same general conformation of country that produced both the valley of the Jordan and the Arabak, and that therefore its first formation must be traced to a period long before historical times. A convulsion of such magnitude as not only to create a new lake, but to depress the valley of the Jordan many hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean, and elevate the valley of the Arabah considerably above that level, must have shattered Palestine to its centre, and left upon the historical traditions of the time an indelible impression, of which it is needless to say, not a trace is actually to be found. It seems to be concluded as most probable, that the whole valley, from the base of Hermon to the Red Sea, was once an arm of the Indian Ocean, which has gradually subsided, leaving the three lakes in its bed, with their connecting rivers.

But, in connection with the Sacred History, its excessive saltness is even more remarkable than its deep depression. This peculiarity is, it is believed, mainly occasioned by the huge barrier of fossil-fish which closes its southern end, and heightened by the rapid evaporation of the fresh water poured into it. Other like phenomena, though in a less striking form exist elsewhere. In the old world there are two great series of salt lakes to be found. One is that which extends along the table lands of Central Asia, of which the chief are the Caspian, the Aral, the Urumia, the Roozla, and the Elton. The other is that which, beginning in the Verde Islands, appears at irregular intervals along the great African Desert, till it terminates in this—the last and most eastern of the series. In the New World, the Great Salt Lake of Utah, by its physical likeness to its Syrian prototype, has actually confirmed the belief of the Mormon settlers, that on its shores they have found a second Land of Promise, and in its river a second Jordan. But without entering into its wider relations, this aspect is important as that which most forcibly impressed the sacred writers. To them it was the "salt sea," and nothing more. They exhibited hardly a trace of the exagerations of later times. And so it is in fact. It is not gloomy, but desolation, which is the prevailing characteristic of the Sea of Death. Follow the course of the Jordan to its end. How different from the first burst of its waters in Mount Hermon, amongst the groves of Dan and Paneas! How different from the "riotous prodigality of life" which has marked its downward course, almost to the very termination of its existence? Gradually, within the last mile from the Dead Sea, its verdure dies away, and the river melts into its grave in a tame and sluggish stream, still, however, of sufficient force to carry its brown waters far into the bright green sea. Along the desert shore the white crust of salt indicates the cause of its sterility. Thus, the few living creatures which the Jordan washes down into its waters are destroyed. Hence arise the unnatural buoyancy and the intolerable nausea to taste and touch, which raise to the highest pitch the contrast between its clear, bitter waves, and the soft, fresh, turbid stream of its parent river. Strewn along its margin lie the most striking memorials of this last conflict of life and death; trunks and branches of trees, torn down from the thickets of the river jungle by the violence of the Jordan, thrust out into the sea, and thrown up again by its waves, dead and barren as itself. The dead beach—so unlike the shell-covered shores of the two seas between which it lies, the Sea of Tiberias and the Gulf of Akaba—shelves gradually into the calm waters. A deep haze—that which, to earlier ages, gave the appearance of "the smoke going up for ever and ever,"—veils its southern extremity, and almost gives it the dim horizon of a real sea. In the nearer view rises the low island close to its northern end, and the long promontory projecting from the eastern side which divides it into its two unequal parts. This is all that I saw, and all that most pilgrims and travelers have seen of the Dead Sea. Beyond, at its southern end, rises the mountain of rock salt; and on its sides are still seen the columner fragment or fragments standing out from it, doubtless the same appearance as that which Josephus describes as the pillar of Lot's wife, existing in his own day, and seen by himself.

RIGHT AND ITS REWARD.

Plato defined man as "the hunter after truth." Said another philosopher—"Were the Almighty holding in his right hand 'truth,' and in his left hand 'search after truth,' to offer me the one I might prefer, I would, in all humility, but without hesitation, choose the latter."

That would be a wise choice. There is more living pleasure in acquiring, than in securing possession. Energy is a condition of happiness—a law of human development and life. Action produces pleasure by unfolding our faculties, thus becoming its own end—action augmenting the power of action—energy. Such is our nature. This is true of all creatures. The bird is wrought to ecstacy by its own song, and by its swift, circling flight;—the lamb by its free, innocent gambols in the field. The infant heart gushes over with delight in his artless gesticulations. And, if we be not overcome by fatigue, prostrated by disease, or afflicted with incurable dulness, action is our normal habitude. Thus has God added good to our severe doom. We are condemned to labor, but labor is our bliss, inaction our sorest calamity.

In the intellectual world, the least of our gains is the truth that we seek; the greatest is in the discipline thereby secured. It is not merely in the problems of Geometry as truths, that the advantage of pursuing that science consists; but in the culture, the intellectual use and appliance of power, by which to go through the whole mathematical system, or any other mental process in the fields of philosophy and of logic; and when some degree of facility is attained in the difficult process of investigation, there is the delight attending mental conquest, the conscious progress of the mind, the diminishing of obstacles, the larger field already traversed, and the clearness with which truths, after protracted study on our part, open into vision and beauty. All these become, to the earnest seeker for truth, a present blessing; so that he feels the prompting of no higher ambition than that of constant struggle and successive victory. It is his joy, not so much to excel others, as to increase his own energy, to secure a real development of his own mental powers.

We can imagine a man deeply engaged in secular enterprise; actuated, not at all by a desire for riches in themselves, but by a love of action—a satisfaction in seeing wealth diffused—great works progressing, and the public reaping advantages from his skill; and that aside from the profit accruing to him through an earnest and severe appliance, he experiences a precious reward in the very thought and labor, in the success of his plans, in the consciousness of right motives, though there be no approving voice nor accordant spirit in the hour of trial.

And, surely, if our natural involuntary movements, and the action of our intellects, are attended with satisfaction, if it contributes greatly to our happiness to be engaged in some honorable, worldly course, much more must the keeping of God's law carry along with it a constant and ample reward. As in the natural world, obedience to law is healthful, so in the moral kingdom obedience to the divine statutes and word, has a present and great reward.

The language of holy men is—"How I love thy law; it is my meditation all the day." "I will delight myself in thy statutes which have loved." "The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart."

The rewards of obedience are not only remote, but immediate. There is connected with fidelity a "current as well as conseque satisfaction," just as there is to the ear on which sweet sounds vibrate, a present pleasure; and to the eye that looks on a fine painting, or a glowing landscape, a regalement from its light and shade; and to the inmos soul, when feeling the joyous pulsations of human sympathy, or of nature, a responsive emotion of delight! And sometimes, when the heart of the godly man meditates on the justice, or forgiving mercy of God, on the beauty of his works, and the glory of hi character, does it bubble up and overflow with a pleasant but boundless happiness, as if he were living in all time, and expanding into all-glorious life; as the lover of nature sometimes loses himself, rapturously and willingly in the sense of existence, in the infinite unfolding of her laws, in the thoughts of God and eternity, in the associations and glorious ideas which she suggests to him?

The prevailing element in the satisfaction attending religious duty, is the inherent sense of right. We are sure that it cannot be othwise than right to obey God. Such a conviction is inseparable from our creatureship. There is therefore within us a felt complacency toward goodness—toward what we know to be right. Not that we claim any thing for our obedience—not that we rest our salvation on it; we are taught otherwise, and believe otherwise; but our moral nature renders a complacent testimony to right, so that doing a good deed, and cherishing a right temper are in themselves benedictions. Paul knew this kind of happiness when he said, "Our rejoicing is this, the testimony of a good conscience." And what better can we ask in the discharge of duty, than this assurance—"I have done right! I have obeyed God. Truth looks down on me from Heaven with an approving smile. Justice holds her even balance before my eyes. Goodness sits enthroned in my view. Eternity opens its gates, and sends forth its ages for my vindication and triumph! and God holds out to me the garlands of paradise!"

We shall have no occasion to seek happiness, when with a true and humble heart we can lay our head on the pure breast of nature, or kneel before the altar of God, or meet the gaze of humanity, and say, "I have done right; I have been true to myself, my fellow-men, and my God, in this thing. I have obeyed conscience and the Bible. Here is my law; it does not condemn me. I trust its vindication—'Let my sentence come forth from thy presence: thine eyes behold the things things that are equal.'"—Am. Presbyterian.

SUGGESTIONS ON THE JUBILEE PERIOD.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

Is the period of the Jubilee forty-nine or fifty years?

I do not write to favor Mr. Thurman's or Mr. Stevenson's view. I have no faith in the commencement of the period as Mr. Thurman gives it, when the year is more than half expired—the tenth day of the seventh month. I am not persuaded of the truth of Mr. Stevenson's position, yet, so far as I understand the subject, there is far more reason in the effort to ascertain the time, by his collecting chronological and historical testimony, than by Mr. Thurman's mode. But the strength of either theory is affected by the testimony which the Jubilees are made to give; for here, if the Jubilee period (admitting that the Jubilee is the fiftieth year) is fifty years long, it makes one year's difference each time, and in the grand period ninety-eight years; or, if we begin the Jubilee period in the middle of the first year, a difference of forty-nine.

Now the question is, did the Jews understand this period to be forty-nine or fifty years? and did they reckon fifty years in the fact—the keeping of the appointed Sabbattic year?

In the first place, we will calmly look at the testimony, Levit. xxv., having no theory of our own to support, but simply suggesting a view, which may elucidate this question, and aid the flock to elaborate the truth. There is no testimony, that I know of, either sacred or profane, to show that the Jews understood this period as forty-nine or fifty years; and no evidence that they ever kept it at all. I presume they never did. If it was attempted it must have been after the effort of Ezra to restore the ancient order, and, remember, that it was that the land might enjoy her Sabbaths that the people were carried away into captivity; and this Jubilee was a "sabbath to the land."

It were to be regretted that we have nothing by which to show how the Jews understood this, in their practice; for they, being the people to whom the command was issued, would understand the application of the language to the usage; and especially since it was a political institution, a part of the civil polity of the country, they could not materially err. Unfortunately we are left without any such evidence, except that which is found in the administration of Joshua, in the first year of the possession of the land.

Thus premising we approach the testimony.

Levit. xxv. "When ye be come unto the land which I give you, then shall the land keep a sabbath unto the Lord."

The first year was sabbatic. The first sabbath after in the series was to be the seventh year from the first sowing year. The second sabbath, in character was to be the forty-ninth year. "Thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years—and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years." That is the period. Then follows the direction of blowing the trumpet of the Jubilee; which all must see should be in the forty-ninth year, and may be appointed at that time, because the sowing for the harvest of the forepart of the second year would take place in the fall of first year.

The fiftieth year was a hallowed year: a sabbath, and a Jubilee, in which every man returned to his possession the same as it was on the first year. Now, observe, that the forty-ninth year, being a sabbath and the fiftieth year being a sabbath, two sabbatic years occur together. If we could find, in all history, evidence of the keeping of these Jubilees at all, we would urge this question, Did the people ever keep two sabbatic years in succession? But we ask if they could have understood the command in that way?

The year before the sabbatic year; the sixth, and consequently, the forty eighth, of the seven times seven period should bear enough for itself, for its following year, the sabbath, and for the eighth or fiftieth; for it was to bear a three years] supply. Now, if the eighth year be a Jubilee, which is a sabbatic year too, and they can not sow for the succeeding year, the ninth, or fifty first, how shall the supply of the fifty-first — the first year of the next period, according to this view—be obtained? for not until the middle of the year after the fiftieth could they sow; and hence, could get no harvest till the forepart of the fifty-second, which would be the tenth from the last division of the forty-nine years.

This fact precludes the possibility of such an understanding of the period as to make it fifty full years. Hence there might have been a lapping over of the time, so as to have obtained harvests for the next succeding year, or second of the next Jubilee period.

I take the ground, therefore, that the fiftieth year was the first of the second Jubilee period, as we find the Christian Sabbath, which is the first day of the week, and the eighth day, if the week commences on Sunday. I claim that the first year of the establishment of the Israelites in Canaan was a Jubilee year; that the forty-nine years, after that year, made a perfect Jubilee—the fiftieth being the first of the second period, as the first year was the year of rest to the land; but to accommodate them as to harvests, the Jubilee trumpet was sounded in the fall of the year.

We will now turn to the position of the Israelites under Joshua, who would be charged with the execution of this command and would comprehend its import. He certainly would not make fifty-one years for the first Jubilee, as he certainly would be compelled to do, if he took in the fiftieth year after the commencement of the first sowing year; for "six years shalt thou sow;" or fifty and one-half, if the sowing commenced in the autumn of the first year, or, thirdly, the period has no importance as data by which to compute time.

Josh. v. 9. "This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. And the children of Israel kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month, and they did eat of the old corn of the land, and on the morrow, after the passover, neither had the children of Israel manna any more, but they did eat of the fruit of the land that year." I suppose we are to understand the fruits which had been stored for them by the inhabitants who were driven out. And this, we think, is taught in the assurance that they did eat of the old corn of the land. The eating of the old corn and of the fruit which had been stored, gave the Sabbatic character to that year, and it was also in character a Jubilee.

God said, "I have rolled the reproach of Egypt off you this day." What was that reproach but their bondage? Not till then did their captivity cease. They entered the land and it was done. Every man, then, had his possession, for the land was given them. The second year, therefore, the forty-nine years began.

It should be remembered that the beginning of the year with the Jews was the passover—the fourteenth day of the month Abib. That was the beginning of the Cycle of seven times seven, and of the grand Cycle of forty-nine times forty-nine.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MARCH 15, 1865.

Life Believers in New York.

The friends of the blessed truth of "Life only in Christ," in this City and vicinity, will open religious services in DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, nearly opposite Eleventh Street, next Lord's day, March 19. Preaching at half past ten o'clock A. M., at 3 P. M., and at half past seven in the evening. The public are invited to attend.

The Christian Passover.

The Life believers in New York and Brooklyn, with scarcely an exception, are of one mind on this question. The commemoration of our Lord's death is, in the very nature of the case, and in harmony with all other memorial of events, an anniversary celebration. Therefore, the doing "this in rememberance of" Christ's death, and to "show forth his death till he come," is our object; and, by Divine permission, it will be attended to in New York on its anniversary; which, this year, falls on Monday eve, April 10th. The friends abroad who have not the opportunity to attend to it at home, are invited to be with us on the occasion; which we trust will be one of much interest. The gathering in the evening will be at an early hour. A moderate repast will be provided for the opening of "the feast," and such other matters attended to as shall be suitable to the occasion. The closing service will be eating the bread and drinking the wine in commemoration of our Redeemer's broken body and shed blood. All who love the Saviour are welcome to participate with us at their and our Lord's table. Let each exam ine himself, or herself, and see that the feast is kept so as to honor our Lord. The place of celebration will be given next week

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time and place of this Conference was not fixed at the Second one, held in Providence, in January; so it was left to be determined at some other time and place. The Third Conference has been invited to meet in this city; but there seems no other way to determine the time than for it to be done by the Officers of the "Life and Advent Union" residing here. They have accordingly fixed the time for its commencement Sunday April 23, at Dodworth's Hall, No. 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the "first day," and to be continued as far into the week as may be thought best; probably through Monday and Tuesday. The question will then come up in relation to the contemplated Camp-meeting next fall. Some have suggested that more frequent conferences, grove-meetings, or tent-meetings, in locations where it may be desirable to hold them, would be less expensive and more useful than a camp-meeting. Especially, is it thought that such meetings should be held the coming summer and fall west of New England, and as far into the western States as possible. This view has our hearty approval. New England has had labor almost exclusively on the life theme. Let the West now be cultivated; and soon the South will be open, where we must proclaim "Life only in Christ," to the "Freedmen," and they will receive it. They have had "torment" doctrine preached to them and practiced on them till they will be gladly emancipated from it, and bid it an eternal farewell, and know that whom the Son makes free, they are free indeed. The "vilest slavery that ever saw the sun" is not so vile as the future torment theory would be if carried into practice either in an eternal or a temporary manner, as contended for by the advocates of such theories. Let the lovers of truth leave others to look after "loaves and fishes," and let us go to our work in earnest, and cause the words of life to be scattered far and wide. Let there be no more funds unnecessarily expended in traveling over this old eastern ground, but let us send out into the West and South. Shall it be done? It must be, if we are faithful to our trust.

Say to the People, Go Forward.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

I would suggest a careful consideration of the remarks in the article upon the "Third Quarterly Conference"—I concur in respect to holding conferences in the west—and the occupancy of the field now opening in the South. It is perfectly manifest that we are called to push into those parts of the field where we find an open door. And being a missionary institution, can we not hope to effect great good, in the name of the Lord, by operating among the Freedmen of the South? Will they not readily receive the doctrine of God our Saviour, upon eternal life? I have been much exercised of late on this question. I have no doubt that the first suggestion of this labor in the Herald of Life, caused a thrill of interest in many hearts, who wish only to be consecrated to God and his work. Is there not a great door and effectual opening in this direction.

Let us hear from some of the strong ones on this subject. The attention of philanthropists and christians of every class is now turned to those delivered from bondage as a field of usefulness. Shall we be behind when we have the most blessed views of the divine gospel to offer to these perishing people?

May the Lord direct, and stir up the missionary spirit—lead us, as in days bygone, to go forth everywhere preaching the word. If others will engage on abstract questions, and occupy the time and interest of the church with abstruse subjects (accusing us, at the same time, of hobby riding) let us go forth bearing precious seed to the benighted; and without doubt we may return with sheaves—an abundant harvest. The truth will be blest when in God's providence it is adapted, and grand results may be hoped for, even from small efforts, when the divine lead is followed.

There is a conviction upon many minds that a broader and more fruitful field is embraced in the mission of the Life and Advent Union, than we see yet developed. God has not called us in vain. If we labor in vain, it will be because we digress from the line of the calling. Let us stand with our loins girded, waiting to cast in the seed to the inviting furrow; or, sickle in hand, to reap the harvests which already adorn the ripened field.

Many people in the West will receive the truth, and aid in its support, as soon as it is brought to them. Indeed, there are many inquiring now, and being aided in their convictions, by the limited amount of labor which can be bestowed. We need conferences, in every place, in the Middle and Western States where we can possibly get up a meeting. If we can manage to get a meeting started, we can doubtless get hearers and bring some to believe.

I have not felt very favorably impressed with the idea of a camp-meeting at Groton Junction, Mass; since it was appointed there; especially on account of the expense, which will necessarily attend a large meeting in such a locality. Shall we convince many or a few even, of the truth, is the question?

Such a meeting can not be held without a great outlay. Were it not better to hold conference or grove meetings of two or three days each, in localities where we can get a hearing, and where the meetings would be self supporting—and save so great an expense as we know a camp-meeting would involve—to increase the publishing fund, or in other ways, to spread the truth in sections more promising than this particular part of New England?

I wish to advise for the best, and while a great pleasure would be given to me and many others to meet in such a gathering (if we should have it) we could all forego such enjoyment if the cause should require our action in another more important and more hopeful avenue of success.

To commence a mission to the Freedmen would, in my estimation, present an enterprise to the christian heart that would offer considerations of labor, joy, glory, and triumph, far outweighing the highest expected consequences of such a meeting or many of them.

I earnestly hope that as the cause becomes a more perfect reality, and a more precious representation of truth and the gospel to some, it may be to all. It belongs to all. All must labor to advance it. All will then share in the labor, and each bear a most joyful part in the reward and glory. Rouse, all ye sons of faith.

"The Lord's Supper Question."

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

As the assult on the yearly commemoration has been accompanied by the use of the first person singular, and as my name has been used, I diverge for the moment from my usual custom, and "follow copy." In his second article, Section 5, Br. Weudell says:

> "At present, it will be best to confine attention to the conclusive evidence which I believe the eleventh chapter of 1st Corinthians affords against the annual theory. It accords best with my views of religious controversy to settle one point at a time. Without a shadow of a doubt, I believe that a 'frequent celebration' of the Supper is expressly authorized by 1 Cor. xi. 17–34."

Now I feel extremely accommodative on the question, and shall not complain of the manner in which Br. W. dictates how his opponents shall argue. I might say to the foregoing, Why did you not take up the main question, instead of discussing the practice of an early church? Why do you insist that we shall leave our position and discuss your objection? If either side has a right to dictate, it is the one that is attacked. The challenged has the choice of weapons. I might further ask, If you wished to "settle one point at a time," why did you condemn our position in toto? Why have you anticipated the settlement of the whole subject by affirming that our "view has no foundation in the Bible," and that it "flies in the face of some of the clearest utterances of the Word of God"? Why have you decided that "some of our number have erred in this matter of the Lord's Supper"? Why were you so anxious to state that "the Life truth is likely to be disparaged in the minds of its opposers" by our view? Did you wish in this way to gather a momentum that would carry you "through" our "troop" and "over" our "wall" by sheer force of will? And when your "venerated" respondent merely stood his ground and defended the Christian "passover," why have you endeavored to introduce a needless "great obscurity" by substituting the word "supper?" (See Art. 2, Sec. 5.) You know as well as I do that the "tug of war" will come on this very point. The difference between us is with reference to the question whether the Lord's supper is the Christian passover or not? Please take notice of your flagrant misconduct on this point (logically speaking). We have not attacked you. You have attacked us. The first six lines of your article testify to this. I might still further inquire, Why did you wait until the eve of our annual commemoration before you made your assault? Did you this for effect? Could you not have begun sooner, or postposed it till after the April celebration? Did you dream that we were "the host of Midian," and you the "cake of barley bread"? And did you think that we, like Midian, would be frightened by a harmless noise? But I let it all pass, and freely forgive you, as I wish to be forgiven. To the point.

You say that the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper is expressly authorized by 1 Cor. xi. 17–34. Your exact meaning is fully stated in your first article, thus:

> "The frequent celebration of the Eucharist, by the Corinthians, was justified by the Apostle, and thus had the divine sanction."

At the outset, I protest against the word "Eucharist." It is harmless in itself, but savors too much of human superstition to be allowed. We have a right to the word "passover" because it belongs to the subject; but "Eucharist" is a foreign word, and I take it from you as "unscriptural" in this discussion.

Your argument is suspended by what may appear to you a strong cable, but it looks to me like

> "The spider's most attenuated thread."

I refer to the assumption that whatever was justified by Paul therefore had the divine sanction. Where did you learn this? I will yield to no one in reverence for Paul's opinions; but I cannot admit what he never claimed. I do not believe that he had the divine sanction in everything he said and did. Whenever he defended his authority it was either on the ground of written, or of direct revelation. In his celebrated trial at Jerusalem he appealed to no divine saction but "the law and the prophets." This was written revelation. Besides this, he received a direct revelation from Jesus Christ to which he appeals in his letter to the Galatians (i. 11, 12). But he doubtless said and did many things without the divine sanction, of which the seventh chapter of this same first epistle to the Corinthians is direct proof. If any man might claim infallibility among the apostles, Peter would be the one (Matt. xvi. 19); but we are familiar enough with his career to know that he was far from it. One instance will be sufficient here. When Paul withstood him to the face, which had the "divine sanction?" My answer is, that neither had it; for neither claimed it. But Paul had the argument, and that was enough. Peter was evidently at fault; and who shall say that Paul was not subject to human infirmity as well?

Just here I bethink me of your repeated quotation of Paul's words in 1 Cor. xi. 23: "I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you." In your second article, Section 7, the words "of the Lord" are emphasized. You evidently understand this to imply a direct revelation on the subject. It is not your fault that you have made this inference; but it would be my fault if I did not correct it. The original is apo tou Kuriou—from the Lord. Now the preposition for "from" —apo—forbids the interpretation referred to. Apo is used to prevent any such inference. Winer, in his "Grammar of the New Testament Diction," refers to this very text thus: "Not—the Lord himself has directly, personally, in a revelation, communicated it to me." Sixth Edition, Section xlvii. If such had been the Apostle's meaning, he would have used para. See, for example, John x. 18, Gal. i. 12. He merely quoted the words of the Lord which he had received from those who knew of the facts recorded by Luke, ch. xxii. 19, 20. Whatever Paul inferred from these words is one thing—what the words mean is another. With all respect to Paul, and every other child of God, I claim the privilege of interpreting my Lord's words as the circumstances of the case seem to require. Thus the assumption of "divine sanction" is "put to flight." Where now is the "argument on which you repose the utmost reliance"? Where now is your "express authority"? Where now is your "minor premise"?

Leaving your "minor premise" to pick itself up as it can, I will consider your conviction that Paul "sanctioned" the "frequent celebration." I, for one, am willing to admit that the Corinthians did what you claim. It may not be absolutely certain, but it may be a fair inference. But I do not yet admit that they had Paul's sanction. It cannot be allowed that his "silence" was his "sanction." His silence may have been a permission, but it was not a sanction. It is singular that this very eleventh chapter contains another instance of permission without sanction. The third verse reads: "But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head." From this text we learn (1) that it was the custom in the Corinthian church for women to pray and prophesy in their meetings; (2) that Paul reproved the irregular way in which this was done among them. Now according to your logic Paul sanctioned the prophesying of women. But I deny that he sanctioned it, for in ch. xiv. 34, 35, he directly prohibits it. After speaking of the order to be observed in prophesying, he adds—"Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." Thus, in the first part of the chapter under consideration, Paul reproves the disorderly method of doing what he elsewhere expressly prohibits altogether. He first exposes an irregularity and afterwards condemns the whole thing, regular and irregular. Now suppose the prohibition had not been written, would the "silence" of Paul in xi. 5 have been a "sanction" of that which we know he disapproved? And if not, is the "silence" on another point in the same chapter, viz., the proper time of commemorating our Lord's death, to be used as an approval of the times actually selected? Yea more, into "sanction?" And still further—to touch a point already disposed of—into "divine sanction"? Surely we need a repository of logical spectacles, when there is such a weakness of logical eyes.

Neither is Paul's sanction involved in verse 26. His object is to discover to their understandings the heinousness of their offences, by referring to the true meaning of the supper. It is a commemoration of the Lord's death, and therefore is a sacred thing. If any partake unworthily, the whole affair is degraded, Christ insulted, and crucified in mockery. "As often" as "this bread" is eaten and "this cup" drunken the Lord's death is commemorated; but how often it should be commemorated, he does not say. We are driven back to our Lord himself for this information; and when my brother gets ready to go back with us to Luke xxii. 8–20 he will find himself on the "impregnable foundation" of the christian passover. So much for the eleventh chapter of 1 Corinthians, and its "conclusive evidence against the annual theory."

In the latter part of Section 5, of the second article, my brother says:

> "If we admit the truth of the yearly view, how strange it is, that, while the Jewish passover is expressly prescribed by Moses as an institution to be observed 'from year to year,' the time for attending to the Lord's Supper---its counterpart, as is claimed, in the gospel age---should nowhere be stated with equal explicitness in the New Testament! It is hoped that the readers will give proper weight to this consideration."

The last sentence I heartily endorse, for my brother has stated an argument for us. The very fact that no change of time was made by our Lord, when he changed the mode of observing the passover, shows that the original time was not altered. Why should the time be re-stated?

It is not necessary that I should follow Br. W. through all the windings of his second article. I have noticed his arguments, and that is enough. But one thing is certain. The Lord's Supper was the Passover, altered to correspond to the fact of the Lamb slain. If it is observed at all, the action of our Lord is our guide. Here we stand. Jesus showed how and when to observe the Christian Passover. If our view is not accepted, there remains no other. We do not "prepare a dilemma for a brother whose logic has conducted him to false conclusions." The dilemma is already prepared in Luke xxii. 19. To observe, or not to observe—that is the question.

God Unchangable.

THOUGHTS BY WILLIAM PAYNE.

If there are any after thoughts with God, or if he has to learn wisdom, like us, by experiments and failures, then might some show of reason be offered for the many ifs and buts presented by the various votaries of truth concerning man, his creation, trial, fall and redemption. According to the ideas of some, the allwise God met with a grand failure at the outstart, and then went to work to devise another plan that should be an improvement on the former: whereas, the latter was instituted before the former was projected.

Two purposes, or a twofold purpose was in the mind of God: a temporal and an eternal one. The first was in the first Adam, which terminated in his case just as the allwise God expected it would; for, the Lamb was slain, in God's purpose, from the foundation of the world; therefore, the serpent's work must first be manifested, in fact, before the manifestation of the Son of God, in fact, to destroy that work. Adam was made subject to vanity; he was made mortal; and, what will appear shocking to some, he was made a dying creature; but so long as he had access to the tree of life, death could not touch him; for, I verily believe, he ate of that tree as freely as he wished too: am sure I should, if I had been in his place; especially after the good and gracious God had said of EVERY tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; and of course the tree of life was included.

But Adam must be put upon trial; therefore one tree in the midst of the garden is selected. He must not touch that; for, if he does, death will follow. Now comes the wily serpent; not to father Adam; no, no; he knows better than that; but to mother Eve. Yes, he understood how to work then; so he does to day; that old serpent is not dead yet; but thank God he is doomed, and that to be destroyed. Well, did he gain his end? Yes, he did; and I guess he thought it would be all right. Alas, for poor Adam, he must have loved Eve; for with eyes wide open, and undeceived, he was willing to follow her right into her transgression, let the consequence be what it might. Now the die is cast; the story told; and no longer having access to the tree of life, nature follows its course and down to the dust they go.

I think it a wrong idea that if they had eat of the tree of life it would have made them immortal. It was not in the plan of God that immortality should come that way, or by the first Adam: this was reserved for the second Adam to bring, as a crowning glory in God's eternal purpose, to all those who, when the trials ends, shall be found in harmony with the mind and will of God.

I do not find that the Lord gave a promise of immortality to Adam on any condition; or even named such a thing. Had he not transgressed he would have continued to live by virtue of the tree of life, which he had free access to; and when the poet sings, "bring back life's healing tree," I can look forward to the time when it will reappear; not for the benefit of the immortal saints, for they will be far beyond its use; but for others yet in mortality, when the present problem has reached its culmination.

Oh, how I love to think and meditate upon these soul inspiring things. I love to think of God as he who is working all things after the counsel of his own will; as he who knows no failure nor is or can, by the puny arm of mortal man or satan's more artful working, be thwarted in any of his purposes. No, if he failed once, what guarantee have we that he will not fail again? Then, ye who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the blessed hope, where is the strong consolation you read of? Where the comfort derived from the precious words, they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand; my Father, which gave them me, is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hands? I say, if the first developed plan proved a failure, on God's part, then what is spoken for our comfort and consolation, concerning the second, has not a grain of either in it. For one, I like to get amongst the sure things. I want to find out where the foundation is; for if the foundation be destroyed, what shall the righteous do? Therefore we may safely say to those who have embraced the rock, for want of a shelter—The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. Yes, no matter how deep the depths of satan may be; however he may seek to undermine our hope; God, thy Rock, has an arm that reaches deeper yet. "Underneath are the everlasting arms." Oh, what a mighty thought is that!

I now submit the above to your inspection; if there is a thought worth carrying into the Herald of Life, please give it a place there; if not all shall be well. Yours still in hope of life.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thos. W. Smith.

This brother, writes us from Alden, Iowa, under date of Feb. 27. After speaking of the sickness of Sister Henry (an account of which we published last week) he says:—"She is receiving the best of care from Br. Mafflt's family and the kind-hearted neighbors. Let brethren remember her at the throne of grace. How painful it would be to her, and to us also, if she should die so far from her home, husband, and children. We pray that God may remember her in mercy, and spare her for years of usefulness in the cause of truth and humanity. I expect to start in a day or two to an appointment, some 60 miles from here, in Tama Co."

[Two days later Br. Smith writes as follows:

Storm-staid, after all. Such a fine day yesterday, I was calculating on a pleasant day to day (Mar. 1) for a trip to Tama Co., to attend a meeting with Bros. Brayton and Churchill, able advocates of no future life for the ungodly. But I am disappointed, as a severe storm is prevailing. High wind and snow driving with lightning speed; and so thick that we cannot see fifty yards from the house. We would perish if we should venture across the prairies; for the wind would be in our faces all the way. . . . I have just been looking over the last Herald, and reading "Tidings from Philadelphia." How glad I am that there is now a place where the believers in no life out of Christ can meet unmolested, and where they can breath a free air. I am always rejoiced to hear from Philadelphia, my native place, and where I spent my days till 23 years old. I left there for the West nearly four years ago. While in Philadelphia, I was connected with the "1st Independent Christian Church, Kensington," Eld. J. G. Wilson, Pastor. I was so much engaged in the Sabbath School cause that I very seldom could break loose to visit other meetings. I found time occasionally to visit 9th and Spring Garden, which was then under the control—pretty much—of those who sympathize with the Crisis. At that time I knew but little of the so called Advent body. However, I heard some speak rather censoriously of a few "disorganizers," or "seceders." These, I suppose, from what I have since learned, were "non-resurrectionists." I knew nothing of that question then, (about four and a half years ago). I was just learning the Life and Death question. About this time, in connection with Eld. John Conrad, and a few others, we formed a little society at 16th and Thompson Sts., and afterwards removed to Master, near 17th, where I formed an acquaintance with Br. Charles H Sutton, who preached for us two or three times, much to our edification. I suppose he remembers me. I remember well his standing in the corner, with his well-worn Bible. Congregations were rather small there, Charlie! I hope Br. Sutton, White, or some one else, will visit that excellent, open-hearted lover of truth, Br. John Conrad (1825 Lee St., between 18th and 19th Sts. and Chestnut and Market) and invite him to their meeting corner of 9th and Callowhill Sts. I think he will embrace the view of no life out of Christ, and would be a valuable help in their meetings.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR:—Our friends in Philadelphia will see that one of their sons is in the field, and in the right place. We hope they will aid him by their prayers and contributions. His most immediate necessity is the horse, and some kind of a carriage to enable him to travel, where any other mode of conveyance would be both expensive and uncertain. He seems to have a heart to the work, and let us do all we can to help him on. Sixty-two dollars have been put into our hands for this purpose, and others, no doubt, intend to have "shares" in this "Horse Stock Company," as one good brother calls it. Other Preachers are being raised up in Iowa to carry forward the glorious truth of "Life only in Christ." Let us thank God and take courage. Vain are all human efforts to arrest the progress of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ."

polity of the country, they could not materially err. Unfortunately we are left without any such evidence, except that which is found in the administration of Joshua, in the first year of the possession of the land.

Thus premising we approach the testimony.

Levit. xxv. "When ye be come unto the land which I give you, then shall the land keep a sabbath unto the Lord."

The first year was sabbatic. The first sabbath after in the series was to be the seventh year from the first sowing year. The second sabbath, in character was to be the forty-ninth year. "Thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years—and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years." That is the period. Then follows the direction of blowing the trumpet of the Jubilee; which all must see should be in the forty-ninth year, and may be appointed at that time, because the sowing for the harvest of the forepart of the second year would take place in the fall of first year.

The fiftieth year was a hallowed year: a sabbath, and a Jubilee, in which every man returned to his possession the same as it was on the first year. Now, observe, that the forty-ninth year, being a sabbath and the fiftieth year being a sabbath, too sabbatic years occur together. If we could find, in all history, evidence of the keeping of these Jubilees at all, we would urge this question, Did the people ever keep two sabbatic years in succession? But we ask if they could have understood the command in that way?

The year before the sabbatic year; the sixth, and consequently, the forty eighth, of the seven times seven period should bear enough for itself, for its following year, the sabbath, and for the eighth or fiftieth; for it was to bear a three years] supply. Now, if the eighth year be a Jubilee, which is a sabbatic year too, and they can not sow for the succeeding year, the ninth, or fifty first, how shall the supply of the fifty-first — the first year of the next period, according to this view—be obtained? for not until the middle of the year after the fiftieth could they sow; and hence, could get no harvest till the forepart of the fifty-second, which would be the tenth from the last division of the forty-nine years.

This fact precludes the possibility of such an understanding of the period as to make it fifty full years. Hence there might have been a lapping over of the time, so as to have obtained harvests for the next succeding year, or second of the next Jubilee period.

I take the ground, therefore, that the fiftieth year was the first of the second Jubilee period, as we find the Christian Sabbath, which is the first day of the week, and the eighth day, if the week commences on Sunday. I claim that the first year of the establishment of the Israelites in Canaan was a Jubilee year; that the forty-nine years, after that year, made a perfect Jubilee—the fiftieth being the first of the second period, as the first year was the year of rest to the land; but to accommodate them as to harvests, the Jubilee trumpet was sounded in the fall of the year.

We will now turn to the position of the Israelites under Joshua, who would be charged with the execution of this command and would comprehend its import. He certainly would not make fifty-one years for the first Jubilee, as he certainly would be compelled to do, if he took in the fiftieth year after the commencement of the first sowing year; for "six years shalt thou sow;" or fifty and one-half, if the sowing commenced in the autumn of the first year, or, thirdly, the period has no importance as data by which to compute time.

Josh. v. 9. "This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. And the children of Israel kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month, and they did eat of the old corn of the land, and on the morrow, after the passover, neither had the children of Israel manna any more, but they did eat of the fruit of the land that year." I suppose we are to understand the fruits which had been stored for them by the inhabitants who were driven out. And this, we think, is taught in the assurance that they did eat of the old corn of the land. The eating of the old corn and of the fruit which had been stored, gave the Sabbatic character to that year, and it was also in character a Jubilee.

God said, "I have rolled the reproach of Egypt off you this day." What was that reproach but their bondage? Not till then did their captivity cease. They entered the land and it was done. Every man, then, had his possession, for the land was given them. The second year, therefore, the forty-nine years began.

It should be remembered that the beginning of the year with the Jews was the passover—the fourteenth day of the month Abib. That was the beginning of the Cycle of seven times seven, and of the grand Cycle of forty-nine times forty-nine.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MARCH 15, 1865.

Life Believers in New York.

The friends of the blessed truth of "Life only in Christ," in this City and vicinity, will open religious services in DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, nearly opposite Eleventh Street, next Lord's day, March 19. Preaching at half past ten o'clock A. M., at 3 P. M., and at half past seven in the evening. The public are invited to attend.

The Christian Passover.

The Life believers in New York and Brooklyn, with scarcely an exception, are of one mind on this question. The commemoration of our Lord's death is, in the very nature of the case, and in harmony with all other memorial of events, an anniversary celebration. Therefore, the doing "this in rememberance of" Christ's death, and to "show forth his death till he come," is our object; and, by Divine permission, it will be attended to in New York on its anniversary; which, this year, falls on Monday eve, April 10th. The friends abroad who have not the opportunity to attend to it at home, are invited to be with us on the occasion; which we trust will be one of much interest. The gathering in the evening will be at an early hour. A moderate repast will be provided for the opening of "the feast," and such other matters attended to as shall be suitable to the occasion. The closing service will be eating the bread and drinking the wine in commemoration of our Redeemer's broken body and shed blood. All who love the Saviour are welcome to participate with us at their and our Lord's table. Let each exam ine himself, or herself, and see that the feast is kept so as to honor our Lord. The place of celebration will be given next week.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time and place of this Conference was not fixed at the Second one, held in Providence, in January; so it was left to be determined at some other time and place. The Third Conference has been invited to meet in this city; but there seems no other way to determine the time than for it to be done by the Officers of the "Life and Advent Union" residing here. They have accordingly fixed the time for its commencement Sunday April 23, at Dodworth's Hall, No. 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the "first day," and to be continued as far into the week as may be thought best; probably through Monday and Tuesday. The question will then come up in relation to the contemplated Camp-meeting next fall. Some have suggested that more frequent conferences, grove-meetings, or tent-meetings, in locations where it may be desirable to hold them, would be less expensive and more useful than a camp-meeting. Especially, is it thought that such meetings should be held the coming summer and fall west of New England, and as far into the western States as possible. This view has our hearty approval. New England has had labor almost exclusively on the life theme. Let the West now be cultivated; and soon the South will be open, where we must proclaim "Life only in Christ," to the "Freedmen," and they will receive it. They have had "torment" doctrine preached to them and practiced on them till they will be gladly emancipated from it, and bid it an eternal farewell, and know that whom the Son makes free, they are free indeed. The "vilest slavery that ever saw the sun" is not so vile as the future torment theory would be if carried into practice either in an eternal or a temporary manner, as contended for by the advocates of such theories. Let the lovers of truth leave others to look after "loaves and fishes," and let us go to our work in earnest, and cause the words of life to be scattered far and wide. Let there be no more funds unnecessarily expended in traveling over this old eastern ground, but let us send out into the West and South. Shall it be done? It must be, if we are faithful to our trust.

Say to the People, Go Forward.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

I would suggest a careful consideration of the remarks in the article upon the "Third Quarterly Conference"—I concur in respect to holding conferences in the west—and the occupancy of the field now opening in the South. It is perfectly manifest that we are called to push into those parts of the field where we find an open door. And being a missionary institution, can we not hope to effect great good, in the name of the Lord, by operating among the Freedmen of the South? Will they not readily receive the doctrine of God our Saviour, upon eternal life? I have been much exercised of late on this question. I have no doubt that the first suggestion of this labor in the Herald of Life, caused a thrill of interest in many hearts, who wish only to be consecrated to God and his work. Is there not a great door and effectual opening in this direction.

Let us hear from some of the strong ones on this subject. The attention of philanthropists and christians of every class is now turned to those delivered from bondage as a field of usefulness. Shall we be behind when we have the most blessed views of the divine gospel to offer to these perishing people?

May the Lord direct, and stir up the missionary spirit—lead us, as in days bygone, to go forth everywhere preaching the word. If others will engage on abstract questions, and occupy the time and interest of the church with abstruse subjects (accusing us, at the same time, of hobby riding) let us go forth bearing precious seed to the benighted; and without doubt we may return with sheaves—an abundant harvest. The truth will be blest when in God's providence it is adapted, and grand results may be hoped for, even from small efforts, when the divine lead is followed.

There is a conviction upon many minds that a broader and more fruitful field is embraced in the mission of the Life and Advent Union, than we see yet developed. God has not called us in vain. If we labor in vain, it will be because we digress from the line of the calling. Let us stand with our loins girded, waiting to cast in the seed to the inviting furrow; or, sickle in hand, to reap the harvests which already adorn the ripened field.

Many people in the West will receive the truth, and aid in its support, as soon as it is brought to them. Indeed, there are many inquiring now, and being aided in their convictions, by the limited amount of labor which can be bestowed. We need conferences, in every place, in the Middle and Western States where we can possibly get up a meeting. If we can manage to get a meeting started, we can doubtless get hearers and bring some to believe.

I have not felt very favorably impressed with the idea of a camp-meeting at Groton Junction, Mass; since it was appointed there; especially on account of the expense, which will necessarily attend a large meeting in such a locality. Shall we convince many or a few even, of the truth, is the question?

Such a meeting can not be held without a great outlay. Were it not better to hold conference or grove meetings of two or three days each, in localities where we can get a hearing, and where the meetings would be self supporting—and save so great an expense as we know a camp-meeting would involve—to increase the publishing fund, or in other ways, to spread the truth in sections more promising than this particular part of New England?

I wish to advise for the best, and while a great pleasure would be given to me and many others to meet in such a gathering (if we should have it) we could all forego such enjoyment if the cause should require our action in another more important and more hopeful avenue of success.

To commence a mission to the Freedmen would, in my estimation, present an enterprise to the christian heart that would offer considerations of labor, joy, glory, and triumph, far outweighing the highest expected consequences of such a meeting or many of them.

I earnestly hope that as the cause becomes a more perfect reality, and a more precious representation of truth and the gospel to some, it may be to all. It belongs to all. All must labor to advance it. All will then share in the labor, and each bear a most joyful part in the reward and glory. Rouse, all ye sons of faith.

"The Lord's Supper Question."

BY JOSEPH T. CURRY.

As the assult on the yearly commemoration has been accompanied by the use of the first person singular, and as my name has been used, I diverge for the moment from my usual custom, and "follow copy." In his second article, Section 5, Br. Wendell says:

> "At present, it will be best to confine attention to the conclusive evidence which I believe the eleventh chapter of 1st Corinthians affords against the annual theory. It accords best with my views of religious controversy to settle one point at a time. Without a shadow of a doubt, I believe that a 'frequent celebration' of the Supper is expressly authorized by 1 Cor. xi. 17–34."

Now I feel extremely accommodative on the question, and shall not complain of the manner in which Br. W. dictates how his opponents shall argue. I might say to the foregoing, Why did you not take up the main question, instead of discussing the practice of an early church? Why do you insist that we shall leave our position and discuss your objection? If either side has a right to dictate, it is the one that is attacked. The challenged has the choice of weapons. I might further ask, If you wished to "settle one point at a time," why did you condemn our position in toto? Why have you anticipated the settlement of the whole subject by affirming that our "view has no foundation in the Bible," and that it "flies in the face of some of the clearest utterances of the Word of God"? Why have you decided that "some of our number have erred in this matter of the Lord's Supper"? Why were you so anxious to state that "the Life truth is likely to be disparaged in the minds of its opposers" by our view? Did you wish in this way to gather a momentum that would carry you "through" our "troop" and "over" our "wall" by sheer force of will? And when your "venerated" respondent merely stood his ground and defended the Christian "passover," why have you endeavored to introduce a needless "great obscurity" by substituting the word "supper?" (See Art. 2, Sec. 5.) You know as well as I do that the "tug of war" will come on this very point. The difference between us is with reference to the question whether the Lord's supper is the Christian passover or not? Please take notice of your flagrant misconduct on this point (logically speaking). We have not attacked you. You have attacked us. The first six lines of your article testify to this. I might still further inquire, Why did you wait until the eve of our annual commemoration before you made your assault? Did you this for effect? Could you not have begun sooner, or postposed it till after the April celebration? Did you dream that we were "the host of Midian," and you the "cake of barley bread"? And did you think that we, like Midian, would be frightened by a harmless noise? But I let it all pass, and freely forgive you, as I wish to be forgiven. To the point.

You say that the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper is expressly authorized by 1 Cor. xi. 17–34. Your exact meaning is fully stated in your first article, thus:

> "The frequent celebration of the Eucharist, by the Corinthians, was justified by the Apostle, and thus had the divine sanction."

At the outset, I protest against the word "Eucharist." It is harmless in itself, but savors too much of human superstition to be allowed. We have a right to the word "passover" because it belongs to the subject; but "Eucharist" is a foreign word, and I take it from you as "unscriptural" in this discussion.

Your argument is suspended by what may appear to you a strong cable, but it looks to me like

> "The spider's most attenuated thread."

I refer to the assumption that whatever was justified by Paul therefore had the divine sanction. Where did you learn this? I will yield to no one in reverence for Paul's opinions; but I cannot admit what he never claimed. I do not believe that he had the divine sanction in everything he said and did. Whenever he defended his authority it was either on the ground of written, or of direct revelation. In his celebrated trial at Jerusalem he appealed to no divine saction but "the law and the prophets." This was written revelation. Besides this, he received a direct revelation from Jesus Christ to which he appeals in his letter to the Galatians (i. 11, 12). But he doubtless said and did many things without the divine sanction, of which the seventh chapter of this same first epistle to the Corinthians is direct proof. If any man might claim infallibility among the apostles, Peter would be the one (Matt. xvi. 19); but we are familiar enough with his career to know that he was far from it. One instance will be sufficient here. When Paul withstood him to the face, which had the "divine sanction?" My answer is, that neither had it; for neither claimed it. But Paul had the argument, and that was enough. Peter was evidently at fault; and who shall say that Paul was not subject to human infirmity as well?

Just here I bethink me of your repeated quotation of Paul's words in 1 Cor. xi. 23: "I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you." In your second article, Section 7, the words "of the Lord" are emphasized. You evidently understand this to imply a direct revelation on the subject. It is not your fault that you have made this inference; but it would be my fault if I did not correct it. The original is apo tou Kuriou—from the Lord. Now the preposition for "from"—apo—forbids the interpretation referred to. Apo is used to prevent any such inference. Winer, in his "Grammar of the New Testament Diction," refers to this very text thus: "Not—the Lord himself has directly, personally, in a revelation, communicated it to me." Sixth Edition, Section xlvii. If such had been the Apostle's meaning, he would have used para. See, for example, John x. 18, Gal. i. 12. He merely quoted the words of the Lord which he had received from those who knew of the facts recorded by Luke, ch. xxii. 19, 20. Whatever Paul inferred from these words is one thing—what the words mean is another. With all respect to Paul, and every other child of God, I claim the privilege of interpreting my Lord's words as the circumstances of the case seem to require. Thus the assumption of "divine sanction" is "put to flight." Where now is the "argument on which you repose the utmost reliance"? Where now is your "express authority"? Where now is your "minor premise"?

Leaving your "minor premise" to pick itself up as it can, I will consider your conviction that Paul "sanctioned" the "frequent celebration." I, for one, am willing to admit that the Corinthians did what you claim. It may not be absolutely certain, but it may be a fair inference. But I do not yet admit that they had Paul's sanction. It cannot be allowed that his "silence" was his "sanction." His silence may have been a permission, but it was not a sanction. It is singular that this very eleventh chapter contains another instance of permission without sanction. The third verse reads: "But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoreth her head." From this text we learn (1) that it was the custom in the Corinthian church for women to pray and prophesy in their meetings; (2) that Paul reproved the irregular way in which this was done among them. Now according to your logic Paul sanctioned the prophesying of women. But I deny that he sanctioned it, for in ch. xiv. 34, 35, he directly prohibits it. After speaking of the order to be observed in prophesying, he adds—"Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." Thus, in the first part of the chapter under consideration, Paul reproves the disorderly method of doing what he elsewhere expressly prohibits altogether. He first exposes an irregularity and afterwards condemns the whole thing, regular and irregular. Now suppose the prohibition had not been written, would the "silence" of Paul in xi. 5 have been a "sanction" of that which we know he disapproved? And if not, is the "silence" on another point in the same chapter, viz., the proper time of commemorating our Lord's death, to be used as an approval of the times actually selected? Yea more, into "sanction?" And still further—to touch a point already disposed of—into "divine sanction"? Surely we need a repository of logical spectacles, when there is such a weakness of logical eyes.

Neither is Paul's sanction involved in verse 26. His object is to discover to their understandings the heinousness of their offences, by referring to the true meaning of the supper. It is a commemoration of the Lord's death, and therefore is a sacred thing. If any partake unworthily, the whole affair is degraded, Christ insulted, and crucified in mockery. "As often" as "this bread" is eaten and "this cup" drunken the Lord's death is commemorated; but how often it should be commemorated, he does not say. We are driven back to our Lord himself for this information; and when my brother gets ready to go back with us to Luke xxii. 8–20 he will find himself on the "impregnable foundation" of the christian passover. So much for the eleventh chapter of 1 Corinthians, and its "conclusive evidence against the annual theory."

In the latter part of Section 5, of the second article, my brother says:

> "If we admit the truth of the yearly view, how strange it is, that, while the Jewish passover is expressly prescribed by Moses as an institution to be observed 'from year to year,' the time for attending to the Lord's Supper---its counterpart, as is claimed, in the gospel age---should nowhere be stated with equal explicitness in the New Testament! It is hoped that the readers will give proper weight to this consideration."

The last sentence I heartily endorse, for my brother has stated an argument for us. The very fact that no change of time was made by our Lord, when he changed the mode of observing the passover, shows that the original time was not altered. Why should the time be re-stated?

It is not necessary that I should follow Br. W. through all the windings of his second article. I have noticed his arguments, and that is enough. But one thing is certain. The Lord's Supper was the Passover, altered to correspond to the fact of the Lamb slain. If it is observed at all, the action of our Lord is our guide. Here we stand. Jesus showed how and when to observe the Christian Passover. If our view is not accepted, there remains no other. We do not "prepare a dilemma for a brother whose logic has conducted him to false conclusions." The dilemma is already prepared in Luke xxii. 19. To observe, or not to observe—that is the question.

THOUGHTS BY WILLIAM PAYNE.

If there are any after thoughts with God, or if he has to learn wisdom, like us, by experiments and failures, then might some show of reason be offered for the many ifs and buts presented by the various votaries of truth concerning man, his creation, trial, fall and redemption. According to the ideas of some, the allwise God met with a grand failure at the outstart, and then went to work to devise another plan that should be an improvement on the former: whereas, the latter was instituted before the former was projected.

Two purposes, or a twofold purpose was in the mind of God: a temporal and an eternal one. The first was in the first Adam, which terminated in his case just as the allwise God expected it would; for, the Lamb was slain, in God's purpose, from the foundation of the world; therefore, the serpent's work must first be manifested, in fact, before the manifestation of the Son of God, in fact, to destroy that work. Adam was made subject to vanity; he was made mortal; and, what will appear shocking to some, he was made a dying creature; but so long as he had access to the tree of life, death could not touch him; for, I verily believe, he ate of that tree as freely as he wished too: am sure I should, if I had been in his place; especially after the good and gracious God had said of EVERY tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; and of course the tree of life was included.

But Adam must be put upon trial; therefore one tree in the midst of the garden is selected. He must not touch that; for, if he does, death will follow. Now comes the wily serpent; not to father Adam; no, no; he knows better than that; but to mother Eve. Yes, he understood how to work then; so he does to day; that old serpent is not dead yet; but thank God he is doomed, and that to be destroyed. Well, did he gain his end? Yes, he did; and I guess he thought it would be all right. Alas, for poor Adam, he must have loved Eve; for with eyes wide open, and undeceived, he was willing to follow her right into her transgression, let the consequence be what it might. Now the die is cast; the story told; and no longer having access to the tree of life, nature follows its course and down to the dust they go.

I think it a wrong idea that if they had eat of the tree of life it would have made them immortal. It was not in the plan of God that immortality should come that way, or by the first Adam: this was reserved for the second Adam to bring, as a crowning glory in God's eternal purpose, to all those who, when the trials ends, shall be found in harmony with the mind and will of God.

I do not find that the Lord gave a promise of immortality to Adam on any condition; or even named such a thing. Had he not transgressed he would have continued to live by virtue of the tree of life, which he had free access to; and when the poet sings, "bring back life's healing tree," I can look forward to the time when it will reappear; not for the benefit of the immortal saints, for they will be far beyond its use; but for others yet in mortality, when the present problem has reached its culmination.

Oh, how I love to think and meditate upon these soul inspiring things. I love to think of God as he who is working all things after the counsel of his own will; as he who knows no failure nor is or can, by the puny arm of mortal man or satan's more artful working, be thwarted in any of his purposes. No, if he failed once, what guarantee have we that he will not fail again? Then, ye who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the blessed hope, where is the strong consolation you read of? Where the comfort derived from the precious words, they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand; my Father, which gave them me, is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hands? I say, if the first developed plan proved a failure, on God's part, then what is spoken for our comfort and consolation, concerning the second, has not a grain of either in it. For one, I like to get amongst the sure things. I want to find out where the foundation is; for if the foundation be destroyed, what shall the righteous do? Therefore we may safely say to those who have embraced the rock, for want of a shelter—The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. Yes, no matter how deep the depths of satan may be; however he may seek to undermine our hope; God, thy Rock, has an arm that reaches deeper yet. "Underneath are the everlasting arms." Oh, what a mighty thought is that!

I now submit the above to your inspection; if there is a thought worth carrying into the Herald of Life, please give it a place there; if not all shall be well. Yours still in hope of life.

Letters and Extracts.

From Thos. W. Smith.

This brother, writes us from Alden, Iowa, under date of Feb. 27. After speaking of the sickness of Sister Henry (an account of which we published last week) he says:—"She is receiving the best of care from Br. Maffit's family and the kind-hearted neighbors. Let brethren remember her at the throne of grace. How painful it would be to her, and to us also, if she should die so far from her home, husband, and children. We pray that God may remember her in mercy, and spare her for years of usefulness in the cause of truth and humanity. I expect to start in a day or two to an appointment, some 60 miles from here, in Tama Co."

[Two days later Br. Smith writes as follows:

Storm-staid, after all. Such a fine day yesterday, I was calculating on a pleasant day to day (Mar. 1) for a trip to Tama Co, to attend a meeting with Bros. Brayton and Churchill, able advocates of no future life for the ungodly. But I am disappointed, as a severe storm is prevailing. High wind and snow driving with lightning speed; and so thick that we cannot see fifty yards from the house. We would perish if we should venture across the prairies; for the wind would be in our faces all the way.... I have just been looking over the last Herald, and reading "Tidings from Philadelphia." How glad I am that there is now a place where the believers in no life out of Christ can meet unmolested, and where they can breath a free air. I am always rejoiced to hear from Philadelphia, my native place, and where I spent my days till 23 years old. I left there for the West nearly four years ago. While in Philadelphia, I was connected with the "1st Independent Christian Church, Kensington," Eld. J. G. Wilson, Pastor. I was so much engaged in the Sabbath School cause that I very seldom could break loose to visit other meetings. I found time occasionally to visit 9th and Spring Garden, which was then under the control—pretty much—of those who sympathize with the Crisis. At that time I knew but little of the so called Advent body. However, I heard some speak rather censoriously of a few "disorganizers," or "seceders." These, I suppose, from what I have since learned, were "non-resurrectionists." I knew nothing of that question then, (about four and a half years ago). I was just learning the Life and Death question. About this time, in connection with Eld. John Conrad, and a few others, we formed a little society at 16th and Thompson Sts., and afterwards removed to Master, near 17th, where I formed an acquaintance with Br. Charles H Sutton, who preached for us two or three times, much to our edification. I suppose he remembers me. I remember well his standing in the corner, with his well-worn Bible. Congregations were rather small there, Charlie! I hope Br. Sutton, White, or some one else, will visit that excellent, open-hearted lover of truth, Br. John Conrad (1825 Lee St., between 18th and 19th Sts. and Chestnut and Market) and invite him to their meeting corner of 9th and Callowhill Sts. I think he will embrace the view of no life out of Christ, and would be a valuable help in their meetings.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR:—Our friends in Philadelphia will see that one of their sons is in the field, and in the right place. We hope they will aid him by their prayers and contributions. His most immediate necessity is the horse, and some kind of a carriage to enable him to travel, where any other mode of conveyance would be both expensive and uncertain. He seems to have a heart to the work, and let us do all we can to help him on. Sixty-two dollars have been put into our hands for this purpose, and others, no doubt, intend to have "shares" in this "Horse Stock Company," as one good brother calls it. Other Preachers are being raised up in Iowa to carry forward the glorious truth of "Life only in Christ." Let us thank God and take courage. Vain are all human efforts to arrest the progress of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ."

From A. F. Cressy.

SHELBURN FALLS, Mass., Feb. 25.

BR. STORRS:—I feel constrained to write a few lines for the Herald. I am now nearly alone, here, in the faith of future life only through Jesus. Br. Houghtaling having left the place. Still the leaven of truth is at work. There are two or three who live a few miles out of the place, who have embraced the truth in the love of it. Thank the Lord. What we need in this part of the Lord's vineyard is an able preacher to give us the meat that is now due the Church. We have never had any preaching here on the life theme. If Br. Bishop could make it in his way to come through this part of the country, I feel satisfied he would be instrumental in doing much good. There are a plenty of preachers who come this way, who seem to anticipate such an event; and who spare no pains to pre-occupy the minds of the people with what they term "the absurdity" of the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked. But still, in the face of all the obstacles which have been thrown in the way, I feel that in the hands of an efficient preacher the truth would prevail, and God would be glorified. Pray the Lord to send laborers into his vineyard. Let the laborers now in the field lose no time in distributing the words of eternal life; for, truly the harvest is great but the laborers few.

From Mrs. Carrie C. Belden.

NEW BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 26, 1865.

BR. STORRS:—As I seldom have the pleasure of meeting with the dear brethren and sisters of "like precious faith," I avail myself, joyfully, of the sweet privilege accorded to us of communicating with each other through the medium of the "Herald of Life;" if perchance I might speak a word of comfort or good cheer to even one of the lonely ones scattered abroad.

It is nearly eight years since I first embraced the blessed "Advent Doctrine;" but not until recently the thrice blessed truth, "Life only in Christ." For some months I studied upon the question, Will the wicked dead be raised to life? but there were some passages of scripture that I could not harmonize with the idea that they would not, and until I heard Br. Wendell lecture in Winsted (God bless him for his labor of love) was not fully convinced that the wicked would have no resurrection. But he explained the hard texts so clearly that I could resist my convictions no longer, but was constrained not only to accept of the Truth, but publicly to give my testimony in its favor; and now as I dwell upon the blessed theme, the light shines brighter and brighter; and how my heart thrills with joy when I think of those precious words of Jesus, "I am the resurrection and and the Life;" for I have laid beneath the cold clods of the valley one of my loved ones, and the snows of a second winter now cover with its white mantle the lowly mound that hides him from my sight. But, thanks be to God, I expect to meet him again when the "LIFE-GIVER" comes; for I trust he has fallen asleep in Jesus, and in that day will be one of the number that shall "hear and live."

For myself, I feel a longing desire to become perfectly pure and spotless in the sight of God. I want to keep all of His commandments that I may have a "right to the Tree of Life and enter in through the gates into the City." And I would ask God's blessing to rest upon dear Br. Storrs, and abundant grace to sustain, and means to carry forward the great and glorious work, in which he is engaged.

And now, in conclusion, may I say to you, in the words of the Beloved Disciple, "Little children, abide in Him; that when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming."

Your Sister, striving for "Eternal Life."

From Eld. Thomas T. Jenks.

[The following letter from our new co-laborer in the good cause—Eld. Thomas T. Jenks—is wholly of the enjoyable kind. Its hopeful words have gladdened me and mine—let them now go to the larger "happy family" who read our "welcome visitor," the HERALD OF LIFE. Our late excellent Conference at Providence seems to be bearing good fruits in the experience of Br. Jenks. To the Lord be the praise; and let us his servants use all diligence to make multitudes more "love the doctrine of No Life out of Christ." It is a most precious thing to fall in love with—so accordant is it, in all its bearings, with the character of the Blessed One whose boundless compassion for a perishing race sent the LIFE-GIVER into the world. May the time hasten when our dear brother shall be "prepared" to unfurl the glorious Life banner wherever he goes. He will find much enlargement of heart in witnessing to a truth that so exalts Christ and illustrates the fact that "GOD IS LOVE." R. W.]

MOUNT CARMEL, CONN., March 1, 1865.

BR. WENDELL:—If I am not mistaken, I promised to write you after my return home. I will do it now, after so long a time. Let me say, first of all, that the Conference at Providence was one of the best meetings I ever attended. I left it feeling greatly blessed—my faith and spiritual strength renewed. I must say that I love the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ." Yes, brother! and I love also those dear brethren and sisters who have embraced it. Although they have many trials, yet they are a happy family. O! how I should appreciate it if I could mingle with them from Sabbath to Sabbath. However, I will not complain, for I have one welcome visitor—the HERALD OF LIFE. Through its pages I hear from Brethren Storrs, Wendell, Curry, Campbell, Bishop, and many others, to the joy of my soul.

But I was going to tell you about my journey. I had a very good visit among my friends. But I found but little interest in the Life theme; they were not inclined to entertain the subject. I found, however, in the town of Florida, Mass., where I formerly preached, one brother who is a full believer in the Life doctrine—Br. S. A. Kemp. He is a man of business and influence. He was in the Legislature two years ago, and heard Br'n Storrs, Curry, and others on the Life theme. He thinks that all of one-fourth of the members of the Baptist church in Florida discard the immortal-soul theory. Brother, that would be a good place for you to labor. I believe the fields are white, ready for the harvest. Will you not make it in your way to visit them soon? The beautiful scenery and the Tunnel works will pay you, could you take the time. You would find a pleasant home with Br. Kemp, and, I think, never regret making the journey.

I preached twice on my tour—once in Petersham, to an attentive congregation, among whom were many anxious sinners. I preached once in Florida, and had a very good time indeed. I did not present the Life theme, as I was not prepared to do so, though I touched upon it, before closing, in a manner that might stir up thinking ones.

I was kindly received every where I went. They made me many little presents, so that I returned a number of dollars richer in pocket than when I left home. Bless the Lord for his goodness to poor me. You remember I told you I could not well spare the money for such a journey; but I ventured, and the Lord provided. I found my family well on my arrival home; they were cheered in learning of my prosperous journey. I should be happy to see you at my place;—yourself and all of like faith are welcome. I would like it if you could come this way and preach once or more. My wife wishes to be remembered to you. Excuse this hasty epistle, and please write me. Your Brother, in the Hope of the Gospel.

From Mrs. Sarah M. Marsh:

WIDOW OF THE LATE ELD. JOSEPH MARSH.

BR STORRS:—I have long been desirous to express my unfeigned gratitude to the kind brother whose christian benevolence remunerates you for sending the Herald of Life to me; and I should have made an effort to do so, some time ago, had I not lost his address by distributing my papers among as many as I can induce to read them. Oh, that people, especially professors of Christ's religion would open their eyes to the harmony and beauty of the great plan of redemption from sin and death through faith in Christ's resurrection from the dead, and the promise of God made to the prophets. I can see no foundation on which to build the faintest hope of future life outside of faith in Christ, the LIFE-GIVER. And if he be not risen from the dead, then is our faith vain, and endless nothingness is our final state.

But as my object now is, to recount some of the many mercies of my heavenly Father, in this, to me, dark and trying time; will you allow me also to offer my most grateful acknowledgements to our ever faithful and tried friend, Elder R. V. Lyon for his acceptable gift of ten dollars to assist me in paying for a set of plain grave stones, to mark the distant resting place where his true yoke fellow in the gospel, and my lamented husband, Joseph Marsh, sleeps in Jesus. Though we laid him down among strangers and far from his loved home, we are persuaded that Jesus will have his lowly grave in remembrance, and raise him up at the last day; when with all the faithful and pure, he will receive the crown of righteousness, for which he suffered and labored so long and faithfully. To be one of that number is my daily prayer, and chief concern, lest by any means I should fail to attain to the resurrection of the dead.

Thanks be to God and to all the dear brethren and sisters for all their kindness shown to me, however unworthy to receive it. All have been kind and some have been liberal in supplying my necessities; for which may the Lord reward them: I fear to contemplate what my condition might have been, had it been otherwise, still I believe that he who has declared, "my grace is sufficient for thee," will so temper the chilling winds of adversity, that those who trust in him, may be able not only to withstand them but to rejoice, knowing that the time of our deliverance draweth nigh. I think however, that I need not be charged with possessing a murmuring spirit, or with an intention to complain, if I say that the change wrought in my condition is most painful, and my circumstances very trying. I find it far from pleasant, at my time of life, with broken health, and a weary spirit, to seek an abode and employment among strangers, or wherever my services may command a small remuneration, sufficient for my needs, which, thank God are not very numerous—but when I call to mind the manifold mercies of God, not to me only, but to all who trust in him, the sufferings of the blessed Saviour, who though rich, for our sakes became poor, patiently enduring toil, want, and a shameful death, "for the joy set before him," and when I remember with what firm and unwavering faith my dear husband joyfully committed his soul to the God who gave it, fully assured that he would care and provide for those he was about to leave "for a short time," and when I think of the patient endurance of the thousands of God's dear saints who were tortured and slain, not accepting deliverance, "that they might obtain a better resurrection," I feel like humbling myself as in the dust, at the cross of Christ, crying unclean and unworthy: knowing also, that these light afflictions, which are but for a moment" are not worthy to be compared with the eternal weight of glory reserved for those faithful ones who endure all hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ.

Of a truth, I love the Herald; and though I know not one in all this proud city that loves the doctrines taught and truths defended in it, I believe it has friends and subscribers here; but they are strangers to me. Oh how precious must be the privilege of meeting together, to those of like precious faith, to discuss in the lovely spirit of Jesus the things pertaining to the life which is to come, through faith in God. I was greatly perplexed with doubts for some time, but found that prejudice and early impressions were their only foundation. If there are any others whose doubts are preventing the 'true light' from shining with its pure lustre, I most respectfully beg to recommend to their candid perusal, the lately published tracts written by Elder R. V. Lyon—"The Ancient Faith"—"Did Christ Redeem all Men?" and "The Coming Struggle." These can be obtained of him at Suspension Bridge, N. Y.

How happy it would make me to see you once more in this life, I can not express. But if by patient continuance in well doing, I may be so happy as to receive immortality at the coming of our Lord, I feel that an eternal life will not be too long to render praise and thanksgiving to him who hath saved us from everlasting destruction.

I must sincerely ask pardon for having so frequently referred to myself; and yet I want to mention in addition that as many friends and brethren may remember, there are several small sums still due me on our old books: some for the paper then published by my husband, and some for books sold; all of which have been so often called for without any favorable result, that I have little or no hope of being more successful now; yet if there is one delinquent or one unfortunate friend who feels willing after so long a time, to pay all, or a part of what is justly our due, they may rest assured it will find a grateful recipient if sent to my address—Rochester, N. Y.

MARCELLUS, ONON. CO., N. Y.,

BR. STORRS:—How I prize the "Herald of Life!" I love to dwell on the harmonious key of God's plan—"Life only through Christ;" and while reading an article in the Voice of the West, Feb. 7, on "Our Position," I wondered how the Editor could avoid the inevitable conclusion of his own ground, viz., No future life for the wicked. He says "We can only hope to live again through Christ. And if Christ was not raised, then there is no resurrection—and they that have fallen asleep in Christ have perished"...."The only hope of man, then, is in the resurrection. If there is no resurrection, then there is no future life."

The argument is this: We can only hope to live again through Christ. But Christ is a "free gift;" hence none but those who accept of Christ, or are in Christ, can live again. The only hope of man is in a resurrection. But no one can be saved unless possessing the Spirit that raised up Jesus. The wicked do not possess this Spirit: therefore, they can have no resurrection. How simple, yet how conclusive. I have found a number in this place who have gladly listened to this, to them, new doctrine. Men, who for years have scoffed at religion, pause and listen with eager interest to this system which places the Almighty in a new light, and places religion in the light of reason, justice, and love. To those who ask what good arises from this doctrine? I would say, Go preach it to the Infidel, the Universalist, and the skeptic, and the good result will be manifest. I pray our kind Father to aid you in your arduous labors for the advancement of truth.

LIBERTY WETHERBEE, Newburg, Me., writes:—I have been laboring in new places this winter and the truth has taken deep root in some hearts; prejudice is giving way, and the people have an ear to hear. In North Newburg from twelve to twenty have set out to serve the Lord. Most of them have been Roman Catholics; but God has been so good as to open their understandings on these last day truths. They say, they never saw such a beauty in God and his word before as they do now. Life only in Christ has brought them from their old traditions; and a happy company they are in Christ. I have also been laboring in Bradford some five days, afternoons and evenings, and the Lord is truly at work. Crowded congregations came to hear, and some ten have started to serve the Lord. God is still at work. As I had an appointment in another direction, I was obliged to leave them, but promised them I would return and shall do so, and remain with them a week, if the Lord will. Brn. Larzell and Hanson are defenders of the truth in those parts. They are disciples indeed and in truth. I see I am subject to this Draft; and for aught I know, I may be drafted. If so, or not, my trust is in the Lord, but He knows I have no love for war, nor taking carnal weapons, and the reason assigned is, because the New Testament is utterly against it. I wish you would send me a few of your Tracts.

[NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have sent a hundred Tracts, by mail, to Newburg, Me. Trust in the Lord, brother; and if you are "drafted," Government will not oblige you to use "carnal weapons," but assign you to some position of a non-combatant, and thus you may carry the message of life to a region where, perhaps, it would not go otherwise. May the Lord make you strong to do his will. Fear not.

A. G. HUNSON, Minnesota, writes:—I send $3,25 for one copy of "Life only in Christ," and one copy of Herald of Life for a new subscriber. A Lawyer, of some note lectured at Preston, who has been a Congregationalist. He told me he was first set to thinking by the remarks of an old farmer; and he now saw the Bible as he never saw it before. We know not what a word fitly spoken may do. Yesterday I listened to the remarks of a Crisis man on the resurrection. He insisted all would be raised as they went down; with the same bodies, and the same diseases. I call it nonsense. God speed you in promulgating the truth.

Obituary.

Brother GEORGE W. RAMSDELL, of Marblehead, Mass., died at Fort William Hospital, Va., Feb. 21st, of typhoid fever, after an illness of four days, aged 30 years, 3 months, and 4 days. He went into the army a few months ago as a one year volunteer.

Br. R. professed faith in Christ in 1854 and has ever since maintained a sterling Christian character. We have the testimony of his Chaplain, in a letter to his friends, that there was not a man in his command that could say aught against his name, and that he died as he had lived—a Christian. At the last annual gathering of the Salem Church at Br. Elam Burnham's, in Hamilton, last summer, before leaving, remarks were made by nearly all the brethren and other gentlemen present. Our dear brother Ramsdell was there, and spoke of the many happy seasons he had enjoyed with the brethren on such occasions, "but," said he (in substance), "some that have usually met with us are not here to-day. They have gone and left us. They sleep in Jesus. And I have thought that, before another year shall roll around, some of us may be called to lie down beneath the cold clods of the valley. We know not whose turn it may be next; but let us all be faithful, so that, if we never more should meet together here, we may be gathered an unbroken band in the heavenly kingdom."

The body of our brother was embalmed and sent home. His funeral was attended by Br. Rufus Wendell, who spoke words of comfort to the afflicted from 1 Corinthians xv.

JOHN GOODWIN, 2d.

To the foregoing tribute, my love for the memory of our deceased brother prompts me to add a few words. Br. R. was an excellent man, and a most tender and affectionate husband and father. There lies before me a letter which he wrote Jan. 27th to one of our Salem brethren. In it he alluded to his ardent desire to meet his old friends again, and then said:

"But I remember that some have already fallen in life's great battle. Their memories we cherish, and we hope yet to meet them in the world where sorrow and suffering will be known no more forever. I am glad that your meetings are so interesting, and hope they will continue so, for there is still room that more may come and learn the way of life and salvation, through Christ who suffered and died that we may receive life, and that everlasting."

Br. R. was one of the earliest patrons of the HERALD OF LIFE and loved the truths to which it is devoted. He leaves a wife and three children. May dear sister be abundantly sustained by divine grace in this great trial. I confidently believe her loved companion sleeps in Jesus and will rise to immortality when the LIFE-GIVER comes. R. W.

A Romantic History.

Doctor Mary E Walker, who is well known to many of our citizens, writes us from Chattanooga an account of a singular case of female martial spirit and patriotic devotion to the flag. Frances Hook's parents died when she was only three years old, and left her, with a brother, in Chicago, Illinois. Soon after the war commenced, she and her brother enlisted in the 65th "Home Guards," Frances assuming the name of Frank Miller. She served three months and was mustered out, without any suspicion of her sex having arisen. She then enlisted in the 9th Illinois, and was taken prisoner in a battle near Chattanooga. She tried to escape, and was shot through the calf of one of her limbs, while said limbs were doing their duty in escaping. The rebels searched her person for papers, and discovered her sex. The rascals respected her as a woman, and gave her a separate room while in prison at Atlanta. During her imprisonment she received a letter from Jeff. Davis, offering hear a lieutenant's commission if she would enlist in their army. She had no home and no relative, but said she preferred to fight as a private soldier for the Stars and Stripes rather than be honored with a commission from the rebs. About two weeks ago she was exchanged. The insurgents tried to extort from her a promise that she would go home and not enter the service again. "Go home!" she said; "my only brother was killed at Pittsburg Landing, and I have no home—no friends!" Dr. Walker describes Frank as of about medium height, with dark hazel eyes, dark brown hair, rounded features, and feminine voice and appearance. Dr. W. is well versed in human nature, as well as anatomy, and she believes that justice to the young woman in question requires that she should be commissioned a a lieutenant in the army. The Doctor also argues that Congress should assign women to duty in the army, with compensation, as well as colored men, averring that patriotism has no sex.—Washington Republican.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points: but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

Diptheria.

I am happy to announce to the readers of the Herald of Life, that I am in the possession of a remedy that is a sure cure of Diptheria. I have used it for at least ten years in the treatment of this terrible disease, and have treated scores of cases (some of which had been given up by other Physicians) with entire success, not having lost a single case.

It cures the most malignant cases as certainly as the simplest forms of the disease. It is also purely Homeopathic.

Now I propose, for the sum of $1, to send to any who may desire it, a vial of this medicine, containing sufficient, at least, to cure half a dozen cases, with full directions for its use. The medicine can be sent by mail to any part of the country, and will keep any length of time without deteriorating in any latitude.

Address, DR. A. DECKER, Newark, N. J.

P. S.—In all cases where the medicine fails to cure, the money will be refunded by notifying me of the fact. To the poor, who are not able to pay, free. A. D.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 380 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with out egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE LORD'S SUPPER QUESTION.—NO. 2.

BY RUFUS WENDELL.

1. It will give me great pleasure to see "the logic" of what I have written, and may yet write, on this question, rigorously "tested" by the defenders of a yearly observance. The truth in the case can suffer no damage in the ordeal of kind-spirited criticism; and, as the importance of the subject will be generally acknowledged, it is evidently desirable that the right way shall be made plain to all. The work of investigation will be facilitated, if each writer on the subject, by the exercise of the requisite carefulness, shall, so far as possible, accurately represent the positions and reasonings of those whose opinions are to be controverted. Polemic encounters with men of straw—a religious newspaper being the arena—are not merely a waste of time: they commonly involve the more serious consequence of causing needless annoyance to those who find themselves presented in a false light. Scrupulous caution in this regard, moreover, besides being demanded by the principles of justice, finds its immediate reward in the clearer and stronger impression which is certain to be made on the mind of the reader.

2. The stricture, that my former article was "a labored effort," appears to me unwarranted; but the admission of its entire correctness would in no degree militate against the soundness of my argument. "Labored" is defined thus: "Bearing marks of constraint in execution;—opposed to easy or free; as, a labored style." The reader will judge whether my "effort" has had the right adjective applied to it. But the point is of no consequence, so long as the fact remains that a "labored effort," in numberless instances, is the encomitant of a noble and righteous cause. As to "so much emphasizing of words," I think my article is not to be condemned by the average usage in controversial writings. Be this as it may, the point is one about which tastes differ, even among those capable of framing arguments which involve "inferences" of the utmost "reliability." In a word, my argument in "Number 20" may be both "labored" and "emphatic," and yet be true. The candid inquirer after truth, therefore, ought not to suffer such features, should they appear in any thing offered in support of a writer's opinions, to cast "doubt" upon any "inferences" that would otherwise be regarded as conformable to the principles of valid reasoning. The standard by which "logic" is "tested" should not itself crumble to pieces before the slightest assault of fair criticism.

3. It is a mistake to say that I have "scouted" the idea that the Lord's Supper is the continuance of the Passover." To "scout" is "to sneer at; to treat with contempt; to reject with disdain; to hoot at." The mere definition of the word acquits me of the imputation here disclaimed, unless I am to be held responsible for what I have never written, or said, or thought. The view alluded to is one from which, upon what I deem sufficient grounds, I respectfully dissent; but I shall not be likely to "scout" it, so long as it is held to be Bible truth by brethren whom I both honor and love. "How forcible are right words." (Job vi. 25.) They at no time are more needed than when we are preparing a dilemma for a brother whose "logic" we believe has conducted him to false conclusions.

4. On no account would I have brethren entertaining the annual theory surrender one jot or tittle of honest conviction on the Supper question, for the purpose of "smoothing the way for others to come among Life-believers." Such a time-serving policy is not hinted at in my article, and I therefore fail to perceive the particular need of reprobating it in any fair examination of my "logic." I will have no part in asking brethren to act contrary to their convictions of truth, on this subject or any other; my only legitimate work is to change their convictions, if I can, by an appeal to the oracles of God. If what I write shall, however, tend only to place the "yearly-celebration" theory "on a more impregnable foundation than ever," be it so: I shall have the consciousness of having done what I believed to be my duty. My very decided impression is, that the "impregnable foundation" will be discovered, before this investigation concludes, underneath the time-honored view of a frequent observance.

5. It is claimed, in the examination of my "logic," that the Apostle Paul kept the Jewish Passover feast; whereupon my esteemed respondent proceeds as follows:—

> "If he kept the yearly feast, we want and must have some proof besides inferences that he 'eat the Lord's passover' oftener than yearly, or that he sanctioned such a procedure. The fact of there being but one text, from which to make such an inference, is strong evidence against the position of partaking of it as frequently as any one pleases."

In this citation there is either a typographical error or great obscurity. No one maintains or believes that Paul, or any body else, ate "the Lord's passover" oftener than once a year. I assume, therefore, that the word "passover" is a misprint, and that the intended word is "Supper." In reply to the above extract, as thus amended, I have to say that the advocate of a yearly observance of the Eucharist is in error, if he supposes that his dissenting brother has "but one text" from which to infer that the Apostle attended to the ordinance "oftener than yearly," and "that he sanctioned such a procedure." The fact of bringing but one witness into court, is no evidence that others just as good have not been left behind. There are texts of the character demanded, whose aid I have not yet invoked: in due time they will be forthcoming. At present, it will be best to confine attention to the conclusive evidence which I believe the 11th chapter of 1st Corinthians affords against the annual theory. It accords best with my views of effective religious controversy to settle one point at a time. If I am wrong in believing—as, without a shadow of doubt, I do believe—that a "frequent celebration" of the Supper is expressly authorized by 1 Cor. xi. 17–34, I am yet not so blind as to suppose that passages of Scripture, which are in themselves of no weight, can become serviceable in argument by the mere process of multiplication. A rope of sand would not gain strength by indefinite extension.

Just now I prefer to stand on my chosen ground. If I am driven from that, or if it becomes apparent to our readers that every attempt to dispossess me of it must fail, it will then be seasonable to ascertain what deductions other inspired testimonies will justify. In this connection, however, I would venture to remark, that the notion of a "frequent celebration" of the Lord's Supper, if it had but a single plain text in its favor, would, nevertheless, have a majority of one over the annual theory! If we admit the truth of the yearly view, how strange it is, that, while the Jewish passover is expressly prescribed by Moses as an institution to be observed "from year to year," the time for attending to the Lord's Supper—its counterpart, as is claimed, in the gospel age—should nowhere be stated with equal explicitness in the New Testament! It is hoped that the reader will give proper weight to this consideration.

6. I shall welcome any attempt to meet squarely the argument of my former article. This has not yet been made—why I know not. The major proposition of that argument—"Whatever the earliest Christian churches did, with divine approval, was RIGHT"—will, I doubt not, be instantly admitted by my brethren on the other side. My minor proposition was as follows: "But the Lord's Supper was observed with divine approval, oftener than once a year, by one of the New Testament churches." In their treatment of the two points involved in this second premise, it is now seen that the holders of the yearly view are not agreed among themselves. On the one hand (as was shown in my former article), it is admitted that a "frequent celebration" prevailed at Corinth, while it is denied that the frequency of the observance was "warranted" by the Apostle. (From persons holding the matter in this light no notice of my article has yet appeared.) On the other hand, a "frequent celebration" by the Corinthians is implicitly denied; and we have the statement that the dissentients from the doctrine of Life only in Christ, "have one or two texts tenfold stronger in proof of the resurrection of the wicked dead, than 1 Corinth. xi. is of the frequent celebration of the Lord's Supper." The venerated author of this assertion refrains from any attempt to show wherein I have too readily persuaded myself that the chapter referred to contains "proof" which can not be found there. I feel confident that no proper scrutiny of my "logic" could be chargable with such an omission. To say that reasons offered in support of a certain position have "entirely failed to convince us," is one thing—but not always the right thing. What the present instance calls for is evidence, either that those reasons are false, or, if true, that they do not sustain the conclusion based upon them.

7. Another important omission in the treatment of my "logic" should be mentioned. Let the usage of the Corinthians, in respect to the time of eating the Lord's Supper, have been what it may, I want to know whether their act of coming together, at such times as they did assemble for the purpose named, was sanctioned by the Apostle. On this point my respected critic is silent. It is, however, one of altogether too much consequence to be ignored in a fair investigation of this question; and I have a right to insist that the "logic" of my article, so long as this point receives no attention, is not "tested," but evaded. The injunction to "tarry one for another" (1 Cor. xi. 33) must be admitted to have reference to either a yearly or a more frequent observance. If to a yearly, I freely allow that it sanctions the annual theory;—if to a more frequent, will the sanction be conceded by those who now think an observance "oftener than yearly" is not taught in the chapter? It will be worth the reader's while to keep his eye on this point.

The statement, that the "Corinthian church was not one of the earliest churches," if correct (which I would say it is not), in no wise affects this question: it was a New Testament church, and that, for all the purposes of this discussion, is enough. Nor is the subject before us affected in any manner by the fact that the church at Corinth was not "as perfect as might be." What it behooves us to understand is the extent of its imperfection on this subject of the Lord's Supper; and on this point, Paul—who "received OF THE LORD that which (he) also delivered unto" the church—gives us definite information. He does not say that the Corinthians ate the Supper too often; hence the importance of ascertaining whether or not they ate it oftener than once a year.

8. It is now proper that I should attend to the manner in which my "logic" has been "tested." And in the first place, a misstatement of my position demands correction. I am cited as having "affirmed that what was practiced by 'the earliest churches,' and 'had divine sanction,' must be 'RIGHT.'" Here I am made responsible for a "must be," whereas my article had it "was." The difference is important. "Must be" is in the present tense; not so the word which I employed. What the Lord approves, is always right at the time of such approval. Applying this principle to the Corinthian church, I affirm that the frequent eating of the Supper, by that church, was "right" because it had the divine sanction. Now I feel well assured that no intelligent believer in the yearly observance of the Eucharist, will for a moment allow the two-fold claim, (1) that the Corinthians observed the ordinance "oftener than yearly," and (2) that the Apostle justified them in doing so. Should both of the points be admitted, it will then be time enough for me to show—if it be denied—that we have, at this day, precisely as good a right to discard the yearly observance, as the church at Corinth could possibly have had. But all this is perfectly consistent with the concession, which I freely make, that not every thing which was practiced by the earliest christians, with divine sanction, would be lawful in the church at the present time. And this remark brings me directly to the circumstances, in New Testament history, by which it is sought to involve me in the dilemma of either surrendering my argument or adopting the yearly-observance theory. That such logic, as it is now my business to examine, should enter into this controversy, excites my deepest surprise. I will not say that it puts my view of the Lord's Supper "on a more impregnable foundation than ever," but I do say that its utter fallaciousness can be easily shown.

9. In reference to my article, it is said:—

> "According to the logic relied on, if we prove that the earliest Christian church celebrated the Passover feast after our Lord's death, and that by divine sanction, then, unless it can be made to appear that some other, or any other time is just as valid—by an equally clear divine sanction—to Him who instituted the Supper, it follows, THAT is the time of its celebration."

The fact, in the history of Paul and "the earliest Christian church," introduced by the foregoing remark, is recorded in Acts xxi. 17–26. Asking the reader to peruse the passage carefully, in connection with Acts xv. 5–31 and xvi. 3, I submit the following observations.

The way in which my "logic" is attempted to be turned against me is this: It is presumed that I will admit that certain ones among the earliest Christians continued, after our Lord's death, to observe sundry customs and ordinances of the Mosaic economy, and among them the Passover Supper. Well, I do admit this, of course. It is further presumed that I will admit that such observance had divine sanction, and was, therefore, RIGHT. This I also admit. What next? Why, I am asked to make the further concession that, according to my argument, if the observance in question was right eighteen hundred years ago, it for the same reason "must be" right to-day; and, from these considerations, I am to be held responsible for the proposition, that "the Passover Supper" is now "a divine institution;" and thus "we"—i. e. the advocates of a yearly observance of the Eucharist—"have all we can desire by the logic given us"! And is it true that my reasoning thus plays into the hands of the view which I reject? With emphasis, I answer, No, it does not. This I proceed to show.

(1) If I have proved by my "logic" that the "Passover" is now "a divine institution," what evidence does that fact afford that the Lord's Supper is to be eaten yearly? None whatever. The identity of the two institutions is not to be assumed, but proved. But the proof happens to be the other way!

(2) The observance now under consideration did not apply to the Gentiles. Acts xxi. 25 settles this point, for it says—"As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded [see Acts xv. 28, 29] that THEY observe NO SUCH THING." Here, then, is a dilemma, for our yearly-observance brethren, which they have perhaps never considered. In Apostolic times, there was no obligation resting on converted Gentiles to "keep the law" (Acts xv. 24.) Were they, on that account, not to eat the Lord's Supper? Let the practice of the Corinthians answer the question. My "logic," therefore, can, at best, be of no service in proving from Acts xxi. that any but Jewish converts to Christianity should, now-a-days, observe a "yearly feast" of any kind.

(3) In conclusion, I remark that there is no parallel between the sanction given to the observance of the Lord's Supper among the Corinthians, and that which was accorded to the observance of Jewish "customs" in Acts xxi. In the former case, the approval related to an ordinance of Jesus Christ, which was to continue in His Church until the period of His second coming. Hence the importance it has for us. In the latter, it related to matters which constituted the overlapping of an expired or expiring dispensation. It was simply a temporary concession, permitted by the Lord, to sturdy prejudices which could not instantly yield to the sway of the new and better order of things. While the divine approval made the observances alluded to right among Jewish christians, for a season, the whole tenor of Gospel teaching assures us that they were not to be permanent in the Church. The destruction of the Temple was near at hand, and with that event it is easy to see how the prejudices I have named would melt away among Jewish converts. Paul circumcized Timothy; and yet we know that, as a Christian, he attached no value to that institution. His letter to the Galations gives us his mind on the subject. Indeed, it may be of importance to our Passover brethren to remember that the Apostle was "afraid" of those very churches because they "observed days, and months, and times, and YEARS." (Gal. iv. 10, 11.) I fail to see that his admonition is wholly inapplicable to those who now think they have a yearly institution based upon "an impregnable foundation." But the Lord is judge in this matter. May He lead us into all truth, and bring us at last to His eternal rest. Amen.

MORE LOGIC.

If an "argument may be both 'labored' and 'emphatic,' and yet be true;" so its being "both" does not make it true; and it may show, when very much emphasized that its author doubts the intelligence of his readers, as if they could not judge of the force of an argument. Like the painter, who had tried his skill in painting a horse, but doubted if anybody would recognize it as that animal, and so wrote underneath, "THIS IS A HORSE." Such kind of composition we have seen enough of, both in ourself and others. It adds nothing to the value of an article nor to the credit of its author.

A quotation from our article, in No. 20, on "The Logic Tested," is made by respondent, after which he says:

> "No one maintains or believes that Paul, or any body else, ate 'the Lord's passover' oftener than once a year." He adds, "I assume, therefore, that the word 'passover' is a misprint, and that the intended word is 'Supper.'"

We assure our logician that there was no misprint in the case, and that his "assumption" harmonizes very well with some of his other assumptions. It may be more than doubtful if some of them are not just as baseless as this. We used the word we intended, and ask no apology from any quarter. "Christ our passover is sacrificed for us." Had that "the divine sanction," think you? We do not read of Christ our "Eucharist;" and we reject the term in this controversy; but Christ our passover; and of course "The Lord's passover" is what we eat, and do it in remembrance of Him who became our passover, and of his death for our deliverance from death; and we attend to it as all other memorials are attended to, viz., on the anniversary of the event, and not a hap-hazard any time, as frequently as we please; which amounts to no time at all, "without a shadow of a doubt," in our mind. However, there being no proof in bold assumptions, the no "shadow of a doubt" will pass for its value, which is just none at all, let who will use it; especially, when equally intelligent brethren, to say nothing of full as many years having passed over their heads, are treated to an exordium, and told they hold a "view which has no foundation in the Bible," and, "which flies in the face of some of the clearest utterances of the Word of God;" and, by suggestion, that the "practical influence must be injurious to the cause of Christ!" And all this, before he begins his argument; thus prejudging the case for his readers, and giving them to understand that he, himself, being "without the shadow of a doubt," must, of necessity, be infallible, so that they shall be led to receive his view unquestioningly. Such is the appearance of the matter.

We do not wonder the writer has the "deepest surprise" at the "logic" introduced "into this controversy." His logic is quite as surprising to many, as any use made of it can be to him.

The "dilemma" which our oponent thinks he has placed us in, by his appeal to Acts xv. 28, 29, is to us no dilemma at all: we had fully "considered" that text when we tested his logic. Our object was not to prove the yearly observance of the Lord's passover from the fact that the church at Jerusalem kept the law and customs of Moses; but to show that his logic, carried out, would justify Christians in doing things which he would have to admit militated against his premise; and he has, in fact, admitted it in his last article; but he seeks to avoid the crushing conclusion by a play upon two verbs, viz., "was" and "be." He had stated definitely, "Whatever the earliest Christian churches did, with divine approval, was right." We proved that the earliest Christian church kept the passover feast; and that therefore, according to his logic, it must be right. He at once admits it was right eighteen hundred years ago, but contends his logic only covers the "was," and not the "must be." In our mind this logic is about equal to the difference between "six" and a "half dozen," and was entirely an afterthought: but we shall leave it to others to decide.

"The indentity, of the two institutions [the passover and the Lord's supper] is not to be assumed, but proved;" he says; and adds, "but the proof happens to be the other way!" Whether this is so will be seen by an article on the subject by J. T. C; which please examine.

THE POWER OF FAITH.

BY MARIE S.

Many years ago, on the banks of the Rhine—that river that winds its way so calmly on to meet the broad bosom of the North Sea—in the wide and pleasant mansion of a wealthy farmer, was born a wee baby boy. With what fond delight did the happy parents gaze upon their tiny treasure, and how their hearts exulted, as, day by day, they watched the unfolding of the little intellect, and the expanding of his feeble powers. As he became more and more dear to them, many were the prayers that ascended from that mother's heart, as she lingered by his cradle bed, that her darling son might be early taught to know and feel a Saviour's love, for little Wilhelm was blessed with a praying mother.

As soon as his infant lips could frame a sentence, she taught him the simple evening and morning prayer, and daily did the sweet childish words ascend to Him who loves and blesses little children, and says, "Suffer them to come unto me." Little did that loving mother imagine through what trials and sufferings would her prayers be answered. Wilhelm's home was a lovely spot, surrounded by spacious gardens of fruit and flowers, and shaded by grand old trees. Nothing ever pleased him so much as to be allowed to gambol and play in these beautiful grounds: his bright black eyes would sparkle with delight, and he would shake the dark ringlets from his noble brow as he bounded along, when, after the day's tasks were finished, and while the slant rays of the setting sun gilded the placid surface of the river, bathing the whole scene in their golden light, his mother would go out with him among the flowers, and down the shady paths, until they reached a favorite mossy seat, that overlooked the rippling water. She would then take him on her knee, and talk to him of sacred things; and as the sun went down, and the twinkling silver stars came shinging out, one by one, she would tell him of the star that guided the wise men of the East until they found the Holy Babe lying in Bethlehem's lowly manger; she would explain to him that it was God's beloved Son, that He came into this world to suffer and die that we might live, and that her little boy must love and obey this blessed Saviour if he would go and dwell with him forever.

Little Wilhelm never forgot the pious lessons taught in the calm twilight hour at his mother's knee; they sank deep into his heart, and in after years brought forth much fruit. When he was about ten years old, he was one day at play with some of his little companions in his father's barn on the fresh made hay. They had frolicked a long time, and becoming wearied with their sports were about to descend from the loft, when, by some misstep, Wilhelm stumbled and was thrown violently down upon the lower floor. Fortunately for him, the floor was piled with hay, and though he struck upon his head, he soon regained his feet, and laughingly exclaimed that he was not hurt.

Soon after this a weariness began to creep over him; he would complain of being tired, and would wonder why he did not love to run and play as he used to. One evening after he had disrobed ready for his little cot, as he knelt by his mother's knee to repeat his evening prayer, she placed her hand on his head, and from thence it glided to the back of his neck, where to her astonishment she discovered a lump that seemed to proceed from some injury of the spine. She at once questioned him, but at first he could not remember of any hurt he had received; at length, however, he recalled the fall on the hay, and telling her when it occurred, she found it was from that time her dear boy had begun to droop. A physician was immediately called, and every thing was done that skill and affection could devise, but all of no avail. Day by day he grew weaker and feebler, until at length he could not step a step, or rise from his easy chair. The injury to the spine, slowly but surely had paralyzed the lower limbs.

The physician said he could do nothing more for him than he had already done, and that for life poor little Wilhelm would be a hopeless cripple. I need not tell you what a crushing blow this was to those fond parents who had looked with such pride on the manly form of their beautiful boy, and pictured to themseles the happy day when he should arrive at noble manhood's prime, and they should see him going forth into the world in all his strength and beauty. It seemed almost too much; but the mother's heart had learned lessons of heavenly wisdom; she soon ceased to murmur, and bowed in prayer that this great trial might not be without a blessing to the suffering one.

For a long time Wilhelm was inconsolable; he could not bear the thought that he would never again mingle in the joyous sports of his schoolmates; that he could no more ramble beneath the shady trees, and cull the first opening flowers for her who was dearer to him than all the world; and his rebellious spirit rose against that God who had thus heavily laid his hand upon him. His mother saw with grief how unreconciled he was to his lot, and she sought in every way to amuse him, and draw him away from his unhappy thoughts. He had the free use of his hands and arms, and she taught him to knit and sew, to while away the tedious hours. When he was tired of doing that, she brought his books, of which he was very fond, and among them she placed his Bible, for she felt if he could only learn to know and love its precious truths, he would have a firm support, something upon which to lean and be sustained. This great affliction, which she so uncomplainingly bore, preyed upon the health and strength of that devoted mother, who had for sometime been failing, and she feared that ere long she would have to leave the weak and dependant boy, around whom the tendrils of affection had so closely twined, and more earnestly still did she plead, that he might be supported from on high. From infancy Wilhelm had been familiar with the Bible, and had always loved to hear its stories, though he had never felt any particular interest in its holy teachings, but now with less to take up his mind, he commenced to read its sacred pages, and God's Spirit began to strive with him. He sood found how wicked and sinful had been his repinings, and that God was a God of love and mercy, who does not willingly afflict, nor grieve the children of men.

After many prayers and tears, he was enabled to cast himself entirely on the Lord, and God accepted the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart. O then, what peace and joy filled his heart. He felt that he had indeed an unfailing solace in all his sufferings, which at times were very severe. Where he had before been fretful and peevish, now a heavenly patience shone in his daily life, and it was indeed a pleasure to watch over and care for him.

It had now been a year since he had walked. His father often carried him in his arms to rest and relieve him, always at night carrying him up stairs to his cot, and bringing him down to join the family in the morning. For a long time, the loving boy had noticed with pain and anxiety the increasing feebleness of his mother, until at length the unwilling conviction was forced upon him that he was to be left without a mother's care. The thought itself was agony. How could he live without the gentle voice and tender careful touch of that idolized mother. If he was only well: if he could only walk, it would not be so hard; but in his helpless state, how could he endure it. In his distress he turned to his God, that never failing source of comfort; and as he recalled the many precious promises he had so learned to love and prize, he remembered this one, "Whatsoever ye ask in faith believing it shall be done for you." Instantly his childish but unwavering faith grasped it, and pouring out his soul in prayer, as he lay upon his bed waiting for his father to carry him down, he pleaded, that God, his Father, would strengthen his limbs and enable him to walk; and he solmenly promised, if so, he would devote his whole life to His service. Strange as it may seem, his prayer was answered; he felt in himself that he could walk, and rising, he dressed and descended the stairs without assistance, feeble it is true at first, but he continued to gain.

His mother's joy was full; she felt she could now die, since her dear son was not only a sincere christian, but was being restored to health and vigor. Peacefully she went down the dark valley: and what a solace and comfort it was to Wilhelm to be able to watch over and care for her in her weakness and decline, as she had done so long for him. He was now able to go out into the garden, and every day extending his walk, he gathered the choicest blossoms to cheer the sick room of the dying one. She did not live long. In the calm and holy twilight hour, that reminded Wilhelm of the peaceful evenings spent with her on the mossy seat by the river, she gently fell asleep in Jesus, to wake again in the resurrection of the just.

Faithfully did Wilhelm fulfil the promise made to God, upon his bed. He became strong and vigorous, and the remainder of his youth was spent in preparing to be a missionary to those who "sit in darkness and the shadow of death," doing all the good in his power to those by whom he was surounded, as he passed along.

Arriving at the age of manhood, with the same unwavering faith and trust, he went bravely forth to a distant land, where, after laboring a few years, he fell a martyr to the cruel malice of the people whom he was striving to benefit. Surely a crown will be his reward.

Children this is no fancy sketch, it is a true story; and I have written it out for you to read, that you may see the power of faith. If you love the dear Saviour as little Wilhelm did, you too have the same promises, and can have the same faith that he had. Ever go to God, your kind heavenly Father, in all your troubles, and rest assured He will never turn a deaf ear to your cry. But perhaps you do not know him. Oh then, will you not come to him now, before the cares and perplexities of life shall cause you to forget altogether the hallowed story of the Babe of Bethlehem? Jesus is waiting to receive you. Come then, before your are any older. Should the eye of any anxious mother fall on these lines, let this simple story stimulate you to greater faith and more earnest prayer for the little ones whom God has given you, that they may be gathered into his fold as lambs of his flock. "The prayer of faith availeth much."

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—It will be seen, by the following note, that the authoress of the foregoing is the widow of Wilhelm; and being a truthful history of facts adds interest to it. All, young or old, will find profit in it.

BR. STORRS:—I have written the enclosed simple story for the Children's Column of the Herald, if you think it worthy of insertion. The subject of the sketch was my own dear companion, who now sleeps in the Holy Land; and it was from his lips, that I learned, and was impressed with the facts of his recovery. Thinking perhaps it might excite faith in the breast of some little one, I have noted it down. Please accept it.

THE BOSTON DISCUSSION.

WEDNESDAY, March 15.

The readers of the Herald will doubtless be gratified to know some of the prominent details of this discussion, on the question "Do the Scriptures teach the non-resurrection of the wicked?" Last evening, at Kast Hall, 7 P. M., a respectable auditory was present to listen to the opening of the debate. Br. Wendell led off on the affirmative in a speech of twenty minutes, followed by Br. Grant on the negative, for the same space, and so on until each disputant had spoken three times, when the meeting was adjourned until 7 P. M. this evening.

The main point of dispute for the evening was the condition of the righteous when they are raised from the dead, the affirmative claiming that at the very moment the righteous are made alive they are immortal, incorruptible, glorified. In proof of this 1 Cor. xv. was adduced; "It is raised in incorruption . . . glory . . . power . . . a spiritual body . . . The dead shall be raised incorruptible." The negative contended that the righteous are first made alive and that the immortalization is a subsequent bestowment. The following text was cited as a proof: "This mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. xv. 53. The position of the negative is substantially the same as the one he held in the "Grant and Curry discussion," two years ago. He repeatedly stated, last evening, that he had seen no reason to change; and when the affirmative quoted from the aforesaid discussion to show the theory of the negative, the latter expressed his satisfaction and hoped that his former argument would be freely referred to throughout the present discussion.

The negative took his former ground that the wicked dead will be restored to life because Justice demands it. All men die in consequence of Adam's sin. As they die through no fault of their own, Justice demands that they shall be made alive again. The affirmative, on the contrary, claimed that life from the dead is a free gift, and through God's pure mercy and love, and that no injustice would attach to the Almighty if the whole race were left in death forever. God does not owe a future life to any one; it is a gift. In reply to this, the negative evaded the issue, and said—It will be just for God to give life to all men if he has promised it. The negative has a peculiar knack of dodging every point that he cannot meet.

The affirmative claimed that life to the wicked dead is either a blessing or a curse. It cannot be a blessing, for it only adds unspeakable misery; as, according to the negative, they are raised to die a second death. And if it is a curse, how can Justice demand it as a debt due? Does God owe a cursed life to any one? The wicked may well say, Save us from justice which, instead of conferring a benefit, only heaps misery on us. Here the negative dodged again, and with muddy clearness, introduced the following illustration. Here are two men in prison. One is innocent of capital crime, and the other is guilty. They are both brought out of prison at the demand of Justice. Justice lets the innocent man go free—his release is a blessing. But Justice demands that the guilty one shall be brought out to have judgment executed on him. The affirmative exposed this subterfuge, which thus changed the issue from—What does Justice owe the sinner? to—What does the sinner owe to Justice?

The negative asserted that the wicked are raised one thousand years subsequent to the resurrection of the righteous. The affirmative in reply maintained that this theory punishes the wicked one thousand years before it judges them, for the negative holds that resurrection must precede judgment. The affirmative and negative agree that the essence of eternal punishment is the loss of what the righteous gain. The emphatic words of the negative are—"The wages of sin is death; not dying, but death, which is the end of dying." "Eternal death is the highest possible punishment. The wicked lose all that the righteous gain." If all their loss is punishment, it follows that their punishment begins at the moment when the good are glorified. Hence they are punished one thousand years before they are judged, if the negative is correct in his position that resurrection must precede judgment.

We shall give a daily report of the discussion in brief.
J. T. C.

SECOND EVENING.

Thursday, March 16, 1865.

Last evening an increased number came to witness the debate, and the interest of the previous evening was exceeded by a still greater interest. It was evident, even to many who sided with the negative on the main question, that he was thoroughly defeated in argument. His manifest evasions of the leading points had a powerful effect on his hearers.

The affirmative pressed Rom. viii. 11 as teaching the literal resurrection, and called upon the negative to give his opinion of the text. The negative responded by denying that it has reference to the resurrection; upon which the affirmative referred him to his (the negative's) Lynn discussion with Moses Hull, in which the negative had cited the text in proof of the resurrection. The affirmative also stated how the negative in a previous discussion (See Grant & Curry, p. 56) had occupied the same position which he has assumed in the present one—that the quickening spoken of in the text is in the present life. Thus the negative had contradicted himself twice; first, in his debate with Hull, and secondly, in the present debate, by swinging back to his old stand of present quickening. To all this the negative merely replied that he did not remember the circumstance referred to in the Grant and Hull discussion. A convenient memory! The best part of this matter consisted in the fact stated by the affirmative that Hull had in the case mentioned hauled the negative up on the very same point by citing the said Grant & Curry discussion.

The affirmative brought up the main point of the previous evening—the negative's theory of the mortal resurrection of the righteous—which theory was characterized as a "miserable fiction." The negative had shown "his utter inability to explain the emphatic language" of 1 Cor. xv., in which are "five flaming swords guarding the precious truth" of the incorruptible resurrection. Vs. 42, 43, 44, 52. The negative had given no explanation whatever of these passages. The latter, in reply, said that "those who heard last evening can judge." The cool way in which perfect silence was thus said to be "heard," would have been ludicrously silly if the subject had been less important.

The negative made an admission which, if persisted in, will overthrow his entire theory of salvation. The corruptible resurrection of the righteous having been exhibited by the affirmative in its native deformity, the negative was pressed into a kind of explanation, in which he said that the righteous put on immortality after they were vivified, or they "put it on in receiving life"—he didn't much care which. We say that this latter admission is a surrender of the argument, and if persisted in, will upset his entire theory of salvation, but he has such a chameleon-like faculty for changing that he may be back on his old ground to-night. After the admission was made, the affirmative remarked that he would not disturb it for fear it might vanish.

In answer to the affirmative's declaration that the theory of the resurrection of the wicked one thousand years after the righteous, punishes the wicked one thousand years before they are judged—the negative asserted that on that principle, the righteous who had died five thousand years before the Second Advent suffer that length of punishment. The affirmative refuted this by simply mentioning the doctrine, held by both disputants, that neither punishment nor reward begins until the appearing of the Saviour. But in his next speech, the negative boldly iterated the same objection, just as if it had not been noticed.

With reference to the negative's theory that the penalty of sin is a second death after a revival from death, the affirmative appealed to 2 Thess. i. 7–10. Are the wicked who are alive at Christ's coming, and are "punished with everlasting destruction"—are they to be revived from death at the end of the thousand years and killed again? If they are not, what becomes of the penalty of sin, as understood by the negative? If they are, what becomes of the expression "everlasting destruction"? To this the negative replied that he is "not settled" as to the meaning of the term "everlasting" in the text. He suggested that the term "everlasting" is often used in a limited sense, and it may be limited here. He did not think that the wicked would be judged and punished at the immediate appearing of Christ. Some time would elapse. This answer was promptly met by the affirmative, who quoted Matt. xxv. 46, and asked if the condemned ones in that verse do not receive their punishment at the same time that the righteous receive eternal life? Where is the room for a judgment long drawn out? The negative admits that "everlasting" is to be understood in the most unqualified sense, as it stands in Matt. xxv. 46. What need then of making it limited in 2 Thess. i. 9? What is gained? And if the generation of the wicked at Christ's coming—the ungodliest generation that will have lived, because of more knowledge—if they have but one death, where goes the negative's theory of a second death after the first?

The affirmative noticed the negative's "loose ideas" of the meaning of some of his judgment passages. In the former discussion (Grant & Curry) he had used the Apostle's quotation—"Every knee shall bow" Rom. xiv. 11—and applied it to the wicked, thus: "He says the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment. So we think. They will have to fall. 'Every knee shall bow.'" Disc. p. 17. If "Every knee shall bow" indicates the damnation of them that bow, then the righteous are damned, for the righteous are certainly referred to by the Apostle in the connection. Notwithstanding this statement of the affirmative, the negative confidently held that the judgment in Rom. xiv. is "compulsory, not pleasant, not agreeable." Thus the negative maintains that the righteous have a judgment which is "compulsory, not pleasant—not agreeable" in one place, and in another, that they are not judged at all, but merely stand for acquittal.

The affirmative quoted Heb. x. 26, 27, to show how one of the negative's judgment texts overthrows his own theory. The negative believes that the wicked are brought to life to receive "judgment, and fiery indignation," and unless they are raised from the dead they cannot receive the said judgment. He also believes that life from the dead is secured to the wicked, as also to the righteous, by Christ's "sacrifice for sins," and that without a "sacrifice for sins," no one would have a resurrection. Hence if any one is raised from the dead it is in consequence of their relation to Christ's sacrifice. It therefore follows that if they cease to hold this relation, if they cease to be affected by Christ's sacrifice for sins, they must fail of a resurrection. So that instead of the text teaching that the wicked will be raised from the dead to receive "judgment and fiery indignation," it teaches that the said "judgment and fiery indignation" will prevent their resurrection. "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins"—and the resurrection is out of the question. Nothing remaineth "but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries." Thus, instead of resurrection preceding judgment, judgment inevitably prevents a resurrection. This point was briefly, but well put. It is a crusher against the negative.

The negative quoted 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, to prove that "the dead in Christ shall rise" before the living in Christ are changed, but this gun was completely silenced by the affirmative who showed that the text teaches no such thing. The idea is that the dead rise before the living are "caught up," not before they are changed.

The negative desired the affirmative to explain "how Christ is the Saviour of all men;" to which the ready answer came back—Give us the passage of Scripture which asserts that he is the Saviour of all men and then we will tell how. This was a settler.

ON THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL:

BY THOMAS READ.

That the various developments of mind are attributes of the body, and belong to man's physical nature, is very apparent; and also that the blood is alive, and communicates life, or soul, to the body in all its members, is equally the language of scripture, and the decision of science. The soul therefore cannot be a being, person, or thing, having independent consciousness. The body of man is a living being, capable of thinking, feeling, and seeing. Now if the soul could think, feel, and see, without the body; there would be two independent beings, constituting but one man, which is absurd. The soul of the flesh is in the blood. For the soul is the life. Let those skilled in Hebrew, point out the difference in the meaning of the expressions.

Gen. xxxv. 18. As her soul was in departing (for she died) she called his name Ben-oni, the son of my sorrow. "Was in departing," implies a state of continued action, in which Rachel had time to converse. How appropriate is this language if she died of hemorrhage. "For the [soul] of the flesh is in the blood." The body is alive, but the body is one, for Paul says, for though there are many members, yet but one body. And the soul is alive, and as to lose the soul is to lose the life, (Luke ix. 25, compared with Mat. xvi. 26) hence the soul is the life of the body.

MORE SCRIPTURE PROOFS THAT THE BODY IS ALIVE.

Rom. xii. 1. Present your bodies a living sacrifice. Then the body is alive. Gen. vii. 21. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth. Then flesh once lived. Rom. vi. 12. Let not sin reign in your mortal body. Luke xii. 4. Fear not them which kill the body. Then the body is alive or it could not be mortal.

This paper is not mortal, therefore it cannot be killed.

Rom. viii. 11. God "shall also quicken your mortal bodies." So then, the body is not only subject to death, but Christ will at the resurrection, restore the body to life again, and the Christian will then become an everliving soul. 1 Cor. xv. 53. When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then death is swallowed up in victory.

That is, all of the christian that is mortal and subject to death, must put on immortality. As only that which is mortal puts on immortality; if the soul be not mortal, it will not put on immortality? It will not become immortal.

Ez. xviii. 27. When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness which he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.

All these texts prove that the flesh, soul, and body, are all alive, and all mortal, and that the soul is not immaterial, and that none of them will become immortal till the resurrection.

FACTS SHOWING THAT OUR MENTAL AND MORAL POWERS RESULT FROM THE MATERIAL MECHANISM OF MAN, AND REQUIRE NO INTERVENTION OF AN IMMATERIAL ESSENCE OR PRINCIPLE.

We will select a few more stubborn facts from the book of nature. Numerous cases are on record where the skull has been fractured, and the brain exposed to pressure. In these cases the patient's intellects and moral faculties, disappeared when pressure was applied to the brain. Pressure on the brain causes the patient immediately to become insensible: stopping even in the middle of a sentence, recovering immediately when the pressure is removed. Here is the clearest demonstration, that moral and mental powers, and consciousness, are the results of material causes, and the soul is thus demonstrated not to be independent and not to be immaterial.

If the mind were immaterial it would never require rest; neither could its consciousness be suspended by sleep. Reflect on the philosophy of sleep. The man in sound sleep, becomes insensible, utterly unconscious. Oh! say you, it is not the immaterial soul that sleeps, it is only the body. Most cheerfully admitted. But then unconsciousness is an attribute of the body, yourselves being judges. Be pleased to acknowledge this and end the controversy.

Let the mental faculties be exercised powerfully, and continuously; and weakness, prostration, or lunacy, is the result. Why? The mind's delicate machinery has been overstrained, and the exercises of reason was dependent upon it. There never has been a case of lunacy unpreceded by loss of sleep. The mind when severely tasked, requires relaxation, or repose, or it soon loses its vivacity. This proves that it is not immaterial. Why does the drunkard feel first, an exhiliration, fitting the mind for greater effort; then confusion, obscurity, and finally, utter unconsciousness, and oblivion of mind? Because he stimulated the circulation of the blood, "and the blood is the life," till this impetuous circulation, pressed upon the delicate organs of the brain, and entirely suspended their action.

In apoplectic and in some other fits, the blood rushes to the brain producing pressure, and total unconscions is the result. In a swoon the blood rushes from the brain, and unconsciousness is produced; as well by the absence of the blood from the brain, as by its pressure. This again proves that the soul is connected with the blood, and that blood and brains are both necessary for the development of mind; and when these are destroyed, there can be no consciousness, and therefore, "the dead know not anything." If the soul, or mind, or consciousness were immaterial, and therefore independent of the organization, they could not be affected by the use of chloroform. But chloroform does deprive men of all consciousness.

If the soul were immaterial, how could a word spoken to the soul, suffuse the cheek with blushes, or the eye with tears? How could the hearing of a shriek causing terror, send the blood to the heart, and pale the face, and cause an universal trembling? From whence comes expression? Is it not the playing of the soul in the eye, and in the muscles of the countenance? Why do we judge of the peculiar characteristics of a man's mind, by the physiognomy? Because a certain combination of the muscles indicating certain emotions, have so often been called into play, that the combination has left an indelible impress. We can sometimes read the very thoughts of the soul in the expression of the eye and the features.

Is not the whole science of phrenology based upon the principle, that every mental and moral faculty, has its appropriate organ in the brain, and is entirely dependent on the material organization for its development? If the soul were immaterial; could the phrenologist delineate its character and powers; merely by examining the external organization? Why is the "immaterial" soul of the brute, less capacious than that of man? Because the organs of the brain are less in number, and in volume, compared with their frames, than they are in men; and consequently their souls cannot manifest so many mental and moral powers.

Thus do facts, stubborn, unyielding facts, as well as the word of the Lord, incontrovertibly prove that the mind, and spirit, and soul, are not immaterial; and that they cannot manifest thought, feeling, knowledge, memory, or consciousness, of any kind, without the material organization; and therefore, "there is no knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave." "For in death there is no remembrance of thee." Isa. xxxviii. 18. "For the grave cannot celebrate thee; they that go down into the pit, cannot hope for thy truth. The living, the living, they shall praise thee, as I do this day."

Disguise it as you may, christians must soon give up the notion of the "natural immortality and imateriality of the soul;" or science will drive the intelligent into infidelity. Or what is more likely to occur, if part of the church persist in advocating known error, the Lord will send leanness upon them; taking away their privileges, and giving them to others that will bring forth the fruits of them. But the days of immateriality are numbered, the soul is mortal, or to speak correctly, man is mortal, all mortal; and notwithstanding the traditions and opposition of men, to this conclusion you must come at last.

Soon may the sun of truth arise upon the church; scattering the dark mists of error, that have so long obscured her glory; preventing her unity and alienating her feelings from her own children; and dissolve the veil from her heart, that has so long prevented the Lord from opening her eyes, that she may behold wondrous things out of his law. Then shall the church come up from the wilderness leaning upon her beloved. Not leaning upon Luther, nor Calvin, nor Wesley, nor Fox; but upon Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God.

A REQUEST.

Will you give us what you think is the true sense or exposition of Heb. vi. 1 to 8.

RESPONSE BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

The apostle urges the church to leave the principles, or rudiments, of the doctrine of Christ and pass on to perfection. It is not to be understood that they were to reject these principles, but simply that they should not be confined to them. It is intimated that if they should not move onward they would lay again the foundation of repentance and faith toward God. It may be that the apostle here intends to say that they would be required to repent again; it is true they would if they were guilty of dead works; but I should understand him to say, "not laying down again the foundation of repentance; i. e., Christ is preached in the first principles or rudiments of the gospel as the ground of repentance and faith; "enough has been said upon these now," together with the doctrines of baptisms, the laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. This foundation has been laid, and "other foundation can no man lay." Let it suffice.

I can not understand the apostle otherwise, as I conclude that he refers to the foundation of all these that had been laid down by the first or rudimental preaching. Let us move on to perfection. Not wait here and lay down this foundation again. These principles having been laid down and fully established, there could be no further necessity of dwelling upon them. Go on to further views of truth—to perfection: and this will we do if God permit.

He plainly hints that to remain thus working, would endanger the mind to backsliding. When for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you, said he to some, and follows up his reprimand by saying, ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. But to know the truth is to be saved.

Now, the apostle does not object to the doctrines here specified; he even intimates plainly that they belong to the doctrine of Christ; for we do not want to lay the foundation of them again. Then it is once laid; and must of necessity be laid in these principles. Nor does he object to the enjoyment of them in the view which we take of the divine plan; nor to our teaching them to others; but objects in reality to our living in such manner and so far back, that we shall be always dwelling upon them, and present a necessity for their re-establishment and proof to us. These things were necessary to our conversion, but need not be found the ever present thing to us. The apostle, we repeat, speaks of the foundation and the laying of it. He was appointed to do it by preaching.

They were not, as the church, to be contending about these doctrines, but to believe them and go forward. I do not know what these verses mean, if they do not teach that we should not be working (the whole thing having been settled by apostolic teaching) to lay the foundation of those doctrines. The philosophical structure of the passage requires it. Paul would not deny any of these doctrines, for he taught them as principles of the gospel.

He does not speak against holding them, but against our being content with them. The doctrines to be believed, and progress to be made, or dead works would follow.

The next three verses present a reason why the apostle urges improvement—increasing faith, and holiness—the danger of falling away, and the terrible state of the apostatized.

At this point we may illustrate the subject by remarking that Peter teaches that if we lack the increase, we are "blind and can not see afar off, and have forgotten that we were purged from our old sins."

If we make no progress we are in danger of falling back; and having been enlightened, how great the darkness if we fall back?

We freely admit, it will be perceived, that Paul, in the fourth verse, gives a reason for the advance of the church from the base line which he has established; which only shows that the refusal to follow Christ, in a further knowledge of his truth and experience of his grace, involves the danger of entire apostacy.

The force of this reason appears in the great fact that a certain exalted position in Christ—one enjoyed and forfeited by a return to infidelity—will effectually bar the mind against all future approaches to him. But we should observe, for a correct view of the subject of this condition, that those who fall away in such manner must have been very highly exalted. If they shall after this become infidels, reject Christ by counting the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, and thus crucify the Son of God afresh; they can not return to their allegiance. Why? They cannot repent and believe. They have no foundation of repentonce or faith, because they have no Christ. "If we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin." That is to say: There is no after sacrifice—no more can be offered. Now having believed in this, and wilfully rejected it, thrown it all away, and adopted a life of infidelity and heathenism, what can remain? If Christ can not avail us by all that he has done, how can we be saved; for he can do no more?

In this last quotation, we see that the will must be involved, which I do not, of course, refer to one act of sin; for all sinful acts are wilful (and if any man—of the church—sin, we have an advocate) but to a life of infidelity and sin after such exalted enlightenment.

The great reason, it will be seen, why one can sin beyond the possibility of recovery to divine favor, is that from his peculiar relation to Christ, by the knowledge of the truth which he has seen, and been subjected to, the force by which Christ could save him to a position, essential to his holiness, which has all been found in vain, and he, by returning to the darkness of infidelity and heathenism, has now no Christ left to do the work for him; and there is no other name by which he can be saved. He loses Christ, and of consequence must be lost; for it is only by holding to him that any can be saved.

The 7th and 8th verses are an illustration of the position taken by the apostle; and a beautiful one it is. "The earth which will not bring forth after the rain," is nigh, already unto cursing, "whose end is to be burned," (because cursed.) So with those who, after all the exhibition of the divine power in them which is supposed here, bring forth no fruit to holiness.

The plain position of the apostle is this: that if a man has been brought to the most complete state of light and truth, even the experience of the power of God in the condition of his own affections, and then becomes a confirmed infidel, he can not repent or be renewed to repentance; from the relation he must now sustain to Christ—without whom, in a different relation, he can not receive the least divine aid in escaping the darkness of condemnation.

THE BLASPHEMER CAGED.

MOSES HULL, the apostate and blasphemer, who strode through New England, for a short time, some few months since, boasting with "great swelling words of vanity," seems to have been fairly caged by the New Covenant, a Universalist paper in Chicago, Ill. Hull seems to be thoroughly hulled, this time, so that nothing is left of him but the cob, and that in a decaying condition. The Covenant handles him thus:

"We should be glad to see Mr. Hull and his theory tried by his own tests. Spiritualists, he claims, are 'true believers' and can accomplish what Jesus said should attend the true believer.' This is Mr. Hull's language, and he adds that christian 'churches can not produce one of the evidences that they are believers.' The change, he admits, is a serious one, and he is therefore willing to test the matter. It is not necessary to call a World's Convention, as he proposes. Call together a few hundred of the people of Kalamazoo and vicinity, and test the matter as far as he is concerned. We admit that 'our church' can not do the things referred to, as we limit the works to the apostolic age. As far as we are concerned, we give it up; but as Mr. Hull claims that he and other Spiritualists can do the works—that they are 'true believers,' and can accomplish what Jesus said should attend the true believer, we propose that he be put on trial. He claims what we do not, and it is fair that he be tried by his own test. This would be entirely satisfactory, and we do not see how he can object to his own rule. What, then, could the true believer do? 'These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt

THE BOSTON DISCUSSION.

WEDNESDAY, March 15.

The readers of the Herald will doubtless be gratified to know some of the prominent details of this discussion, on the question "Do the Scriptures teach the non-resurrection of the wicked?" Last evening, at Kast Hall, 7 P. M., a respectable auditory was present to listen to the opening of the debate. Br. Wendell led off on the affirmative in a speech of twenty minutes, followed by Br. Grant on the negative for the same space, and so on until each disputant had spoken three times, when the meeting was adjourned until 7 P. M. this evening.

The main point of dispute for the evening was the condition of the righteous when they are raised from the dead, the affirmative claiming that at the very moment the righteous are made alive they are immortal, incorruptible, glorified. In proof of this 1 Cor. xv. was adduced. "It is raised in incorruption....glory....power....a spiritual body ....The dead shall be raised incorruptible." The negative contended that the righteous are first made alive and that the immortalization is a subsequent bestowment. The following text was cited as a proof: "This mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. xv. 53. The position of the negative is substantially the same as the one he held in the "Grant and Curry discussion," two years ago. He repeatedly stated, last evening that he had seen no reason to change; and when the affirmative quoted from the aforesaid discussion to show the theory of the negative, the latter expressed his satisfaction and hoped that his former argument would be freely referred to throughout the present discussion.

The negative took his former ground that the wicked dead will be restored to life because Justice demands it. All men die in consequence of Adam's sin. As they die through no fault of their own, Justice demands that they shall be made alive again. The affirmative, on the contrary, claimed that life from the dead is a free gift, and through God's pure mercy and love, and that no injustice would attach to the Almighty if the whole race were left in death forever. God does not owe a future life to any one; it is a gift. In reply to this, the negative evaded the issue, and said—It will be just for God to give life to all men if he has promised it. The negative has a peculiar knack of dodging every point that he cannot meet.

The affirmative claimed that life to the wicked dead is either a blessing or a curse. It cannot be a blessing, for it only adds unspeakable misery; as, according to the negative, they are raised to die a second death. And if it is a curse, how can Justice demand it as a debt due? Does God owe a cursed life to any one? The wicked may well say, Save us from justice which, instead of conferring a benefit, only heaps misery on us. Here the negative dodged again, and with muddy clearness, introduced the following illustration. Here are two men in prison. One is innocent of capital crime, and the other is guilty. They are both brought out of prison at the demand of Justice. Justice lets the innocent man go free—his release is a blessing. But Justice demands that the guilty one shall be brought out to have judgment executed on him. The affirmative exposed this subterfuge, which thus changed the issue from—What does Justice owe the sinner? to—What does the sinner owe to Justice?

The negative asserted that the wicked are raised one thousand years subsequent to the resurrection of the righteous. The affirmative in reply, maintained that this theory punishes the wicked one thousand years before it judges them, for the negative holds that resurrection must precede judgment. The affirmative and negative agree that the essence of eternal punishment is the loss of what the righteous gain. The emphatic words of the negative are—"The wages of sin is death; not dying, but death, which is the end of dying." "Eternal death is the highest possible punishment. The wicked lose all that the righteous gain." If all their loss is punishment, it follows that their punishment begins at the moment when the good are glorified. Hence they are punished one thousand years before they are judged, if the negative is correct in his position that resurrection must precede judgment.

We shall give a daily report of the discussion in brief. J. T. C.

SECOND EVENING.

Thursday, March 16, 1865.

Last evening an increased number came to witness the debate, and the interest of the previous evening was exceeded by a still greater interest. It was evident, even to many who sided with the negative on the main question, that he was thoroughly defeated in argument. His manifest evasions of the leading points had a powerful effect on his hearers.

The affirmative pressed Rom. viii. 11 as teaching the literal resurrection, and called upon the negative to give his opinion of the text. The negative responded by denying that it has reference to the resurrection; upon which the affirmative referred him to his (the negative's) Lynn discussion with Moses Hull, in which the negative had cited the text in proof of the resurrection. The affirmative also stated how the negative in a previous discussion (See Grant & Curry, p. 56) had occupied the same position which he has assumed in the present one—that the quickening spoken of in the text is in the present life. Thus the negative had contradicted himself twice; first, in his debate with Hull, and secondly, in the present debate, by swinging back to his old stand of present quickening. To all this the negative merely replied that he did not remember the circumstance referred to in the Grant and Hull discussion. A convenient memory! The best part of this matter consisted in the fact stated by the affirmative that Hull had in the case mentioned hauled the negative up on the very same point by citing the said Grant & Curry discussion.

The affirmative brought up the main point of the previous evening—the negative's theory of the mortal resurrection of the righteous—which theory was characterized as a "miserable fiction." The negative had shown "his utter inability to explain the emphatic language" of 1 Cor. xv., in which are "five flaming swords guarding the precious truth" of the incorruptible resurrection. Vs. 42, 43, 44, 52. The negative had given no explanation whatever of these passages. The latter, in reply, said that "those who heard last evening can judge." The cool way in which perfect silence was thus said to be "heard," would have been ludicrously silly if the subject had been less important.

The negative made an admission which, if persisted in, will overthrow his entire theory of salvation. The corruptible resurrection of the righteous having been exhibited by the affirmative in its native deformity, the negative was pressed into a kind of explanation, in which he said that the righteous put on immortality after they were vivified, or they "put it on in receiving life"—he didn't much care which. We say that this latter admission is a surrender of the argument, and if persisted in, will upset his entire theory of salvation, but he has such a chameleon-like faculty for changing that he may be back on his old ground to-night. After the admission was made, the affirmative remarked that he would not disturb it for fear it might vanish.

In answer to the affirmative's declaration that the theory of the resurrection of the wicked one thousand years after the righteous, punishes the wicked one thousand years before they are judged—the negative asserted that on that principle, the righteous who had died five thousand years before the Second Advent suffer that length of punishment. The affirmative refuted this by simply mentioning the doctrine, held by both disputants, that neither punishment nor reward begins until the appearing of the Saviour. But in his next speech, the negative boldly iterated the same objection, just as if it had not been noticed.

With reference to the negative's theory that the penalty of sin is a second death after a revival from death, the affirmative appealed to 2 Thess. i. 7–10. Are the wicked who are alive at Christ's coming, and are "punished with everlasting destruction"—are they to be revived from death at the end of the thousand years and killed again? If they are not, what becomes of the penalty of sin, as understood by the negative? If they are, what becomes of the expression "everlasting destruction"? To this the negative replied that he is "not settled" as to the meaning of the term "everlasting" in the text. He suggested that the term "everlasting" is often used in a limited sense, and it may be limited here. He did not think that the wicked would be judged and punished at the immediate appearing of Christ. Some time would elapse. This answer was promptly met by the affirmative, who quoted Matt. xxv. 46, and asked if the condemned ones in that verse do not receive their punishment at the same time that the righteous receive eternal life? Where is the room for a judgment long drawn out? The negative admits that "everlasting" is to be understood in the most unqualified sense, as it stands in Matt. xxv. 46. What need then of making it limited in 2 Thess. i 9? What is gained? And if the generation of the wicked at Christ's coming—the ungodliest generation that will have lived, because of more knowledge—if they have but one death, where goes the negative's theory of a second death after the first?

The affirmative noticed the negative's "loose ideas" of the meaning of some of his judgment passages. In the former discussion (Grant & Curry) he had used the Apostle's quotation—"Every knee shall bow" Rom. xiv. 11—and applied it to the wicked, thus: "He says the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment. So we think. They will have to fall. 'Every knee shall bow.'" Disc. p. 17. If "Every knee shall bow" indicates the damnation of them that bow, then the righteous are damned, for the righteous are certainly referred to by the Apostle in the connection. Notwithstanding this statement of the affirmative, the negative confidently held that the judgment in Rom. xiv. is "compulsory, not pleasant, not agreeable." Thus the negative maintains that the righteous have a judgment which is "compulsory, not pleasant—not agreeable" in one place, and in another, that they are not judged at all, but merely stand for acquittal.

The affirmative quoted Heb. x. 26, 27, to show how one of the negative's judgment texts overthrows his own theory. The negative believes that the wicked are brought to life to receive "judgment, and fiery indignation," and unless they are raised from the dead they cannot receive the said judgment. He also believes that life from the dead is secured to the wicked, as also to the righteous, by Christ's "sacrifice for sins," and that without a "sacrifice for sins," no one would have a resurrection. Hence if any one is raised from the dead it is in consequence of their relation to Christ's sacrifice. It therefore follows that if they cease to hold this relation, if they cease to be affected by Christ's sacrifice for sins, they must fail of a resurrection. So that instead of the text teaching that the wicked will be raised from the dead to receive "judgment and fiery indignation," it teaches that the said "judgment and fiery indignation" will prevent their resurrection. "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins"—and the resurrection is out of the question. Nothing remaineth "but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries." Thus, instead of resurrection preceding judgment, judgment inevitably prevents a resurrection. This point was briefly, but well put. It is a crusher against the negative.

The negative quoted 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, to prove that "the dead in Christ shall rise" before the living in Christ are changed, but this gun was completely silenced by the affirmative who showed that the text teaches no such thing. The idea is that the dead rise before the living are "caught up," not before they are changed.

The negative desired the affirmative to explain "how Christ is the Saviour of all men;" to which the ready answer came back—Give us the passage of Scripture which asserts that he is the Saviour of all men and then we will tell how. This was a settler. J. T. C.

ON THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL:

BY THOMAS READ

That the various developments of mind are attributes of the body, and belong to man's physical nature, is very apparent; and also that the blood is alive, and communicates life, or soul, to the body in all its members, is equally the language of scripture, and the decision of science. The soul therefore cannot be a being, person, or thing, having independent consciousness. The body of man is a living being, capable of thinking, feeling, and seeing. Now if the soul could think, feel, and see, without the body; there would be two independent beings, constituting but one man, which is absurd. The soul of the flesh is in the blood. For the soul is the life. Let those skilled in Hebrew, point out the difference in the meaning of the expressions.

Gen. xxxv. 18. As her soul was in departing (for she died) she called his name Ben-oni, the son of my sorrow. "Was in departing," implies a state of continued action, in which Rachel had time to converse. How appropriate is this language if she died of hemorrhage. "For the [soul] of the flesh is in the blood." The body is alive, but the body is one, for Paul says, for though there are many members, yet but one body. And the soul is alive, and as to lose the soul is to lose the life, (Luke ix. 25, compared with Mat. xvi. 26) hence the soul is the life of the body.

MORE SCRIPTURE PROOFS THAT THE BODY IS ALIVE.

Rom. xii. 1. Present your bodies a living sacrifice. Then the body is alive. Gen. vii. 21. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth. Then flesh once lived. Rom. vi. 12. Let not sin reign in your mortal body. Luke xii. 4. Fear not them which kill the body. Then the body is alive or it could not be mortal.

This paper is not mortal, therefore it cannot be killed.

Rom. viii. 11. God "shall also quicken your mortal bodies." So then, the body is not only subject to death, but Christ will at the resurrection, restore the body to life again, and the Christian will then become an everliving soul. 1 Cor. xv. 53. When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then [illegible] death is swallowed up in victory.

That is, all of the christian that is mortal and subject to death, must put on immortality. As only that which is mortal puts on immortality; if the soul be not mortal, it will not put on immortality! It will not become immortal.

Ez. xviii. 27. When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness which he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.

All these texts prove that the flesh, soul, and body, are all alive, and all mortal, and that the soul is not immaterial, and that none of them will become immortal till the resurrection.

FACTS SHOWING THAT OUR MENTAL AND MORAL POWERS RESULT FROM THE MATERIAL MECHANISM OF MAN, AND REQUIRE NO INTERVENTION OF AN IMMATERIAL ESSENCE OR PRINCIPLE.

We will select a few more stubborn facts from the book of nature. Numerous cases are on record where the skull has been fractured, and the brain exposed to pressure. In these cases the patient's intellects and moral faculties, disappeared when pressure was applied to the brain. Pressure on the brain causes the patient immediately to become insensible: stopping even in the middle of a sentence, recovering immediately when the pressure is removed. Here is the clearest demonstration, that moral and mental powers, and consciousness, are the results of material causes, and the soul is thus demonstrated not to be independent and not to be immaterial.

If the mind were immaterial it would never require rest; neither could its consciousness be suspended by sleep. Reflect on the philosophy of sleep. The man in sound sleep, becomes insensible, utterly unconscious. Oh! say you, it is not the immaterial soul that sleeps, it is only the body. Most cheerfully admitted. But then unconsciousness is an attribute of the body, yourselves being judges. Be pleased to acknowledge this and end the controversy.

Let the mental faculties be exercised powerfully, and continuously; and weakness, prostration, or lunacy, is the result. Why? The mind's delicate machinery has been overstrained, and the exercises of reason was dependent upon it. There never has been a case of lunacy unpreceded by loss of sleep. The mind when severely tasked, requires relaxation, or repose, or it soon loses its vivacity. This proves that it is not immaterial. Why does the drunkard feel first an exhiliration, fitting the mind for greater effort; then confusion, obscurity, and finally, utter unconsciousness, and oblivion of mind? Because he stimulated the circulation of the blood, "and the blood is the life," till this impetuous circulation, pressed upon the delicate organs of the brain, and entirely suspended their action.

In apoplectic and in some other fits, the blood rushes to the brain producing pressure, and total unconscious is the result. In a swoon the blood rushes from the brain, and unconsciousness is produced; as well by the absence of the blood from the brain, as by its pressure. This again proves that the soul is connected with the blood, and that blood and brains are both necessary for the development of mind; and when these are destroyed, there can be no consciousness, and therefore, "the dead know not anything." If the soul, or mind, or consciousness were immaterial, and therefore independent of the organization, they could not be affected by the use of chloroform. But chloroform does deprive men of all consciousness.

If the soul were immaterial, how could a word spoken to the soul, suffuse the cheek with blushes, or the eye with tears? How could the hearing of a shriek causing terror, send the blood to the heart, and pale the face, and cause a universal trembling? From whence comes expression? Is it not the playing of the soul in the eye, and in the muscles of the countenance? Why do we judge of the peculiar characteristics of a man's mind, by the physiognomy? Because a certain combination of the muscles indicating certain emotions, have so often been called into play, that the combination has left an indelible impress. We can sometimes read the very thoughts of the soul in the expression of the eye and the features.

Is not the whole science of phrenology based upon the principle, that every mental and moral faculty, has its appropriate organ in the brain, and is entirely dependent on the material organization for its development? If the soul were immaterial; could the phrenologist delineate its character and powers; merely by examining the external organization? Why is the "immaterial" soul of the brute, less capacious than that of man? Because the organs of the brain are less in number and in volume, compared with their frames, than they are in men; and consequently their souls cannot manifest so many mental and moral powers.

Thus do facts, stubborn, unyielding facts, as well as the word of the Lord, incontrovertibly prove that the mind, and spirit, and soul, are not immaterial; and that they cannot manifest thought, feeling, knowledge, memory, or consciousness, of any kind, without the material organization; and therefore, "there is no knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave." "For in death there is no remembrance of thee." Isa. xxxviii. 18. "For the grave cannot celebrate thee; they that go down into the pit, cannot hope for thy truth. The living, they shall praise thee, as I do this day."

Disguise it as you may, christians must soon give up the notion of the "natural immortality and imateriality of the soul;" or science will drive the intelligent into infidelity. Or what is more likely to occur, if part of the church persist in advocating known error, the Lord will send leanness upon them; taking away their privileges, and giving them to others that will bring forth the fruits of them. But the days of immateriality are numbered, the soul is mortal, or to speak correctly, man is mortal, all mortal; and notwithstanding the traditions and opposition of men, to this conclusion you must come at last.

Soon may the sun of truth arise upon the church; scattering the dark mists of error, that have so long obscured her glory; preventing her unity and alienating her feelings from her own children; and dissolve the veil from her heart, that has so long prevented the Lord from opening her eyes, that she may behold wondrous things out of his law. Then shall the church come up from the wilderness leaning upon her beloved. Not leaning upon Luther, nor Calvin, nor Wesley, nor Fox; but upon Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God.

A REQUEST.

Will you give us what you think is the true sense or exposition of Heb. vi. 1 to 8.

RESPONSE BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

The apostle urges the church to leave the principles, or rudiments, of the doctrine of Christ and pass on to perfection. It is not to be understood that they were to reject these principles, but simply that they should not be confined to them. It is intimated that if they should not move onward they would lay again the foundation of repentance and faith toward God. It may be that the apostle here intends to say that they would be required to repent again; it is true they would if they were guilty of dead works; but I should understand him to say, "not laying down again the foundation of repentance; i. e., Christ is preached in the first principles or rudiments of the gospel as the ground of repentance and faith; "enough has been said upon these now," together with the doctrines of baptisms; the laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. This foundation has been laid, and "other foundation can no man lay." Let it suffice.

I can not understand the apostle otherwise, as I conclude that he refers to the foundation of all these that had been laid down by the first or rudimental preaching. Let us move on to perfection. Not wait here and lay down this foundation again. These principles having been laid down and fully established, there could be no further necessity of dwelling upon them. Go on to further views of truth—to perfection: and this will we do if God permit.

He plainly hints that to remain thus working, would endanger the mind to backsliding. When for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you, said he to some, and follows up his reprimand by saying, ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. But to know the truth is to be saved.

Now, the apostle does not object to the doctrines here specified; he even intimates plainly that they belong to the doctrine of Christ; for we do not want to lay the foundation of them again. Then it is once laid; and must of necessity be laid in these principles. Nor does he object to the enjoyment of them in the view which we take of the divine plan; nor to our teaching them to others; but objects in reality to our living in such manner and so far back, that we shall be always dwelling upon them, and present a necessity for their re-establishment and proof to us. These things were necessary to our conversion, but need not be found the ever present thing to us. The apostle, we repeat, speaks of the foundation and the laying of it. He was appointed to do it by preaching.

They were not, as the church, to be contending about these doctrines, but to believe them and go forward. I do not know what these verses mean, if they do not teach that we should not be working (the whole thing having been settled by apostolic teaching) to lay the foundation of those doctrines. The philosophical structure of the passage requires it. Paul would not deny any of these doctrines, for he taught them as principles of the gospel.

He does not speak against holding them, but against our being content with them. The doctrines to be believed, and progress to be made, or dead works would follow.

The next three verses present a reason why the apostle urges improvement—increasing faith, and holiness—the danger of falling away, and the terrible state of the apostatized.

At this point we may illustrate the subject by remarking that Peter teaches that if we lack the increase we are "blind and can not see afar off, and have forgotten that we were purged from our old sins."

If we make no progress we are in danger of falling back; and having been enlightened, how great the darkness if we fall back?

We freely admit, it will be perceived, that Paul, in the fourth verse, gives a reason for the advance of the church from the base line which he has established; which only shows that the refusal to follow Christ, in a further knowledge of his truth and experience of his grace, involves the danger of entire apostacy.

The force of this reason appears in the great fact that a certain exalted position in Christ—one enjoyed and forfeited by a return to infidelity—will effectually bar the mind against all future approaches to him. But we should observe, for a correct view of the subject of this condition, that those who fall away in such manner must have been very highly exalted. If they shall after this become infidels, reject Christ by counting the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, and thus crucify the Son of God afresh; they can not return to their allegiance. Why? They cannot repent and believe. They have no foundation of repentance or faith, because they have no Christ. "If we sin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin." That is to say: There is no after sacrifice—no more can be offered. Now having believed in this, and wilfully rejected it, thrown it all away, and adopted a life of infidelity and heathenism, what can remain? If Christ can not avail us by all that he has done, how can we be saved; for he can do no more?

In this last quotation, we see that the will must be involved, which I do not, of course, refer to one act of sin; for all sinful acts are wilful (and if any man—of the church—sin, we have an advocate) but to a life of infidelity and sin after such exalted enlightenment.

The great reason, it will be seen, why one can sin beyond the possibility of recovery to divine favor, is that from his peculiar relation to Christ, by the knowledge of the truth which he has seen, and been subjected to; the force by which Christ could save him to a position, essential to his holiness, which has all been found in vain, and he, by returning to the darkness of infidelity and heathenism, has now no Christ left to do the work for him; and there is no other name by which he can be saved. He loses Christ, and of consequence must be lost; for it is only by holding to him that any can be saved.

The 7th and 8th verses are an illustration of the position taken by the apostle; and a beautiful one it is. "The earth which will not bring forth after the rain," is nigh, already unto cursing, "whose end is to be burned," (because cursed.) So with those who, after all the exhibition of the divine power in them which is supposed here, bring forth no fruit to holiness.

The plain position of the apostle is this: that if a man has been brought to the most complete state of light and truth, even the experience of the power of God in the condition of his own affections, and then becomes a confirmed infidel, he can not repent or be renewed to repentance; from the relation he must now sustain to Christ—without whom, in a different relation, he can not receive the least divine aid in escaping the darkness of condemnation.

THE BLASPHEMER CAGED.

MOSES HULL, the apostate and blasphemer, who strode through New England, for a short time, some few months since, boasting with "great swelling words of vanity," seems to have been fairly caged by the New Covenant, a Universalist paper in Chicago, Ill. Hull seems to be thoroughly hulled, this time, so that nothing is left of him but the cob, and that in a decaying condition. The Covenant handles him thus:

"We should be glad to see Mr. Hull and his theory tried by his own tests. Spiritualists, he claims, are 'true believers,' and can accomplish what Jesus said should attend the true believer.' This is Mr. Hull's language, and he adds that christian 'churches can not produce one of the evidences that they are believers.' The charge, he admits, is a serious one, and he is therefore willing to test the matter. It is not necessary to call a World's Convention, as he proposes. Call together a few hundred of the people of Kalamazoo and vicinity, and test the matter as far as he is concerned. We admit that 'our church' can not do the things referred to, as we limit the works to the apostolic age. As far as we are concerned, we give it up; but as Mr. Hull claims that he and other Spiritualists can do the works—that they are 'true believers,' and can accomplish what Jesus said should attend the true believer, we propose that he be put on trial. He claims what we do not, and it is fair that he be tried by his own test. This would be entirely satisfactory, and we do not see how he can object to his own rule. What, then, could the true believer do? 'These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt

THE BOSTON DISCUSSION.

WEDNESDAY, March 15.

The readers of the Herald will doubtless be gratified to know some of the prominent details of this discussion, on the question "Do the Scriptures teach the non-resurrection of the wicked?" Last evening, at Kast Hall, 7 P. M., a respectable auditory was present to listen to the opening of the debate. Br. Wendell led off on the affirmative in a speech of twenty minutes, followed by Br. Grant on the negative for the same space, and so on until each disputant had spoken three times, when the meeting was adjourned until 7 P. M. this evening.

The main point of dispute for the evening was the condition of the righteous when they are raised from the dead, the affirmative claiming that at the very moment the righteous are made alive they are immortal, incorruptible, glorified. In proof of this 1 Cor. xv. was adduced. "It is raised in incorruption....glory....power....a spiritual body ....The dead shall be raised incorruptible." The negative contended that the righteous are first made alive and that the immortalization is a subsequent bestowment. The following text was cited as a proof: "This mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. xv. 53. The position of the negative is substantially the same as the one he held in the "Grant and Curry discussion," two years ago. He repeatedly stated, last evening that he had seen no reason to change; and, when the affirmative quoted from the aforesaid discussion to show the theory of the negative, the latter expressed his satisfaction and hoped that his former argument would be freely referred to throughout the present discussion.

The negative took his former ground that the wicked dead will be restored to life becaue Justice demands it. All men die in consequence of Adam's sin. As they die through no fault of their own, Justice demands that they shall be made alive again. The affirmative, on the contrary, claimed that life from the dead is a free gift, and through God's pure mercy and love, and that no injustice would attach to the Almighty if the whole race were left in death forever. God does not owe a future life to any one; it is a gift. In reply, to this, the negative evaded the issue, and said—It will be just for God to give life to all men if he has promised it. The negative has a peculiar knack of dodging every point that he cannot meet.

The affirmative claimed that life to the wicked dead is either a blessing or a curse. It cannot be a blessing, for it only adds unspeakable misery; as, according to the negative, they are raised to die a second death. And if it is a curse, how can Justice demand it as a debt due? Does God owe a cursed life to any one? The wicked may well say, Save us from justice which, instead of conferring a benefit, only heaps misery on us. Here the negative dodged again, and with muddy clearness, introduced the following illustration. Here are two men in prison. One is innocent of capital crime, and the other is guilty. They are both brought out of prison at the demand of Justice. Justice lets the innocent man go free—his release is a blessing. But Justice demands that the guilty one shall be brought out to have judgment executed on him. The affirmative exposed this subterfuge, which thus changed the issue from—What does Justice owe the sinner? to—What does the sinner owe to Justice?

The negative asserted that the wicked are raised one thousand years subsequent to the resurrection of the righteous. The affirmative in reply, maintained that this theory punishes the wicked one thousand years before it judges them, for the negative holds that resurrection must precede judgment. The affirmative and negative agree that the essence of eternal punishment is the loss of what the righteous gain. The emphatic words of the negative are—"The wages of sin is death; not dying, but death, which is the end of dying." "Eternal death is the highest possible punishment. The wicked lose all that the righteous gain." If all their loss is punishment, it follows that their punishment begins at the moment when the good are glorified. Hence they are punished one thousand years before they are judged, if the negative is correct in his position that resurrection must precede judgment.

We shall give a daily report of the discussion in brief. J. T. C.

SECOND EVENING.

Thursday, March 16, 1865.

Last evening an increased number came to witness the debate, and the interest of the previous evening was exceeded by a still greater interest. It was evident, even to many who sided with the negative on the main question, that he was thoroughly defeated in argument. His manifest evasions of the leading points had a powerful effect on his hearers.

The affirmative pressed Rom. viii. 11 as teaching the literal resurrection, and called upon the negative to give his opinion of the text. The negative responded by denying that it has reference to the resurrection; upon which the affirmative referred him to his (the negative's) Lynn discussion with Moses Hull, in which the negative had cited the text in proof of the resurrection. The affirmative also stated how the negative in a previous discussion (See Grant & Curry, p. 56) had occupied the same position which he has assumed in the present one—that the quickening spoken of in the text is in the present life. Thus the negative had contradicted himself twice; first, in his debate with Hull, and secondly, in the present debate, by swinging back to his old stand of present quickening. To all this the negative merely replied that he did not remember the circumstance referred to in the Grant and Hull discussion. A convenient memory! The best part of this matter consisted in the fact stated by the affirmative that Hull had in the case mentioned hauled the negative up on the very same point by citing the said Grant & Curry discussion.

The affirmative brought up the main point of the previous evening—the negative's theory of the mortal resurrection of the righteous —which theory was characterized as a "miserable fiction." The negative had shown "his utter inability to explain the emphatic language" of 1 Cor. xv., in which are "five flaming swords guarding the precious truth" of the incorruptible resurrection. Vs. 42, 43, 44, 52. The negative had given no explanation whatever of these passages. The latter, in reply, said that "those who heard last evening can judge." The cool way in which perfect silence was thus said to be "heard," would have been ludicrously silly if the subject had been less important.

The negative made an admission which, if persisted in, will overthrow his entire theory of salvation. The corruptible resurrection of the righteous having been exhibited by the affirmative in its native deformity, the negative was pressed into a kind of explanation, in which he said that the righteous put on immortality after they were vivified, or they "put it on in receiving life"—he didn't much care which. We say that this latter admission is a surrender of the argument, and if persisted in, will upset his entire theory of salvation, but he has such a chameleon-like faculty for changing that he may be back on his old ground to-night. After the admission was made, the affirmative remarked that he would not disturb it for fear it might vanish.

In answer to the affirmative's declaration that the theory of the resurrection of the wicked one thousand years after the righteous, punishes the wicked one thousand years before they are judged—the negative asserted that on that principle, the righteous who had died five thousand years before the Second Advent suffer that length of punishment. The affirmative refuted this by simply mentioning the doctrine, held by both disputants, that neither punishment nor reward begins until the appearing of the Saviour. But in his next speech, the negative boldly iterated the same objection, just as if it had not been noticed.

With reference to the negative's theory that the penalty of sin is a second death after a revival from death, the affirmative appealed to 2 Thess. i. 7–10. Are the wicked who are alive at Christ's coming, and are "punished with everlasting destruction"—are they to be revived from death at the end of the thousand years and killed again? If they are not, what becomes of the penalty of sin, as understood by the negative? If they are, what becomes of the expression "everlasting destruction"? To this the negative replied that he is "not settled" as to the meaning of the term "everlasting" in the text. He suggested that the term "everlasting" is often used in a limited sense, and it may be limited here. He did not think that the wicked would be judged and punished at the immediate appearing of Christ. Some time would elapse. This answer was promptly met by the affirmative, who quoted Matt. xxv. 46, and asked if the condemned ones in that verse do not receive their punishment at the same time that the righteous receive eternal life? Where is the room for a judgment long drawn out? The negative admits that "everlasting" is to be understood in the most unqualified sense, as it stands in Matt. xxv. 46. What need then of making it limited in 2 Thess. i 9? What is gained? And if the generation of the wicked at Christ's coming—the ungodliest generation that will have lived, because of more knowledge—if they have but one death, where goes the negative's theory of a second death after the first?

The affirmative noticed the negative's "loose ideas" of the meaning of some of his judgment passages. In the former discussion (Grant & Curry) he had used the Apostle's quotation—"Every knee shall bow" Rom. xiv. 11—and applied it to the wicked, thus: "He says the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment. So we think. They will have to fall. 'Every knee shall bow.'" Disc. p. 17. If "Every knee shall bow" indicates the damnation of them that bow, then the righteous are damned, for the righteous are certainly referred to by the Apostle in the connection. Notwithstanding this statement of the affirmative, the negative confidently held that the judgment in Rom. xiv. is "compulsory, not pleasant, not agreeable." Thus the negative maintains that the righteous have a judgment which is "compulsory, not pleasant—not agreeable" in one place, and in another, that they are not judged at all, but merely stand for acquittal.

The affirmative quoted Heb. x. 26, 27, to show how one of the negative's judgment texts overthrows his own theory. The negative believes that the wicked are brought to life to receive "judgment, and fiery indignation," and unless they are raised from the dead they cannot receive the said judgment. He also believes that life from the dead is secured to the wicked, as also to the righteous, by Christ's "sacrifice for sins," and that without a "sacrifice for sins," no one would have a resurrection. Hence if any one is raised from the dead it is in consequence of their relation to Christ's sacrifice. It therefore follows that if they cease to hold this relation, if they cease to be affected by Christ's sacrifice for sins, they must fail of a resurrection. So that instead of the text teaching that the wicked will be raised from the dead to receive "judgment and fiery indignation," it teaches that the said "judgment and fiery indignation" will prevent their resurrection. "If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins"—and the resurrection is out of the question. Nothing remaineth "but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries." Thus, instead of resurrection preceding judgment, judgment inevitably prevents a resurrection. This point was briefly, but well put. It is a crusher against the negative.

The negative quoted 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, to prove that "the dead in Christ shall rise" before the living in Christ are changed, but this gun was completely silenced by the affirmative who showed that the text teaches no such thing. The idea is that the dead rise before the living are "caught up," not before they are changed.

The negative desired the affirmative to explain "how Christ is the Saviour of all men;" to which the ready answer came back—Give us the passage of Scripture which asserts that he is the Saviour of all men and then we will tell how. This was a settler. J. T. C.

ON THE IMMATERIALITY OF THE SOUL:

BY THOMAS READ.

That the various developments of mind are attributes of the body, and belong to man's physical nature, is very apparent; and also that the blood is alive, and communicates life, or soul, to the body in all its members, is equally the language of scripture, and the decision of science. The soul therefore cannot be a being, person, or thing, having independent consciousness. The body of man is a living being, capable of thinking, feeling, and seeing. Now if the soul could think, feel, and see, without the body; there would be two independent beings, constituting but one man, which is absurd. The soul of the flesh is in the blood. For the soul is the life. Let those skilled in Hebrew, point out the difference in the meaning of the expressions.

Gen. xxxv. 18. As her soul was in departing (for she died) she called his name Ben-oni, the son of my sorrow. "Was in departing," implies a state of continued action, in which Rachel had time to converse. How appropriate is this language if she died of hemorrhage. "For the [soul] of the flesh is in the blood." The body is alive, but the body is one, for Paul says, for though there are many members, yet but one body. And the soul is alive, and as to lose the soul is to lose the life, (Luke ix. 25, compared with Mat. xvi. 26) hence the soul is the life of the body.

MORE SCRIPTURE PROOFS THAT THE BODY IS ALIVE.

Rom. xii. 1. Present your bodies a living sacrifice. Then the body is alive. Gen. vii. 21. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth. Then flesh once lived. Rom. vi. 12. Let not sin reign in your mortal body. Luke xii. 4. Fear not them which kill the body. Then the body is alive or it could not be mortal.

This paper is not mortal, therefore it cannot be killed.

Rom. viii. 11. God "shall also quicken your mortal bodies." So then, the body is not only subject to death, but Christ will at the resurrection, restore the body to life again, and the Christian will then become an everliving soul. 1 Cor. xv. 53. When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then death is swallowed up in victory.

That is, all of the christian that is mortal and subject to death, must put on immortality. As only that which is mortal puts on immortality; if the soul be not mortal, it will not put on immortality! It will not become immortal.

Ez. xviii. 27. When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness which he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive.

All these texts prove that the flesh, soul, and body, are all alive, and all mortal, and that the soul is not immaterial, and that none of them will become immortal till the resurrection.

FACTS SHOWING THAT OUR MENTAL AND MORAL POWERS RESULT FROM THE MATERIAL MECHANISM OF MAN, AND REQUIRE NO INTERVENTION OF AN IMMATERIAL ESSENCE OR PRINCIPLE.

We will select a few more stubborn facts from the book of nature. Numerous cases are on record where the skull has been fractured, and the brain exposed to pressure. In these cases the patient's intellects and moral faculties, disappeared when pressure was applied to the brain. Pressure on the brain causes the patient immediately to become insensible: stopping even in the middle of a sentence, recovering immediately when the pressure is removed. Here is the clearest demonstration, that moral and mental powers, and consciousness, are the results of material causes, and the soul is thus demonstrated not to be independent and not to be immaterial.

If the mind were immaterial it would never require rest; neither could its consciousness be suspended by sleep. Reflect on the philosophy of sleep. The man in sound sleep, becomes insensible, utterly unconscious. Oh! say you, it is not the immaterial soul that sleeps, it is only the body. Most cheerfully admitted. But then unconsciousness is an attribute of the body, yourselves being judges. Be pleased to acknowledge this and end the controversy.

Let the mental faculties be exercised powerfully, and continuously; and weakness, prostration, or lunacy, is the result. Why? The mind's delicate machinery has been overstrained, and the exercises of reason was dependent upon it. There never has been a case of lunacy unpreced.d by loss of sleep. The mind when severely tasked, requires relaxation, or repose, or it soon loses its vivacity. This proves that it is not immaterial. Why does the drunka.d feel first an exhiliration, fitting the mind for greater effort; then confusion, obscurity, and finally, utter unconsciousness, and oblivion of mind? Because he stimulated the circulation of the blood, "and the blood is the life," till this impetuous circulation, pressed upon the delicate organs of the brain, and entirely suspended their action.

In apoplectic and in some other fits, the blood rushes to the brain producing pressure, and total unconscious is the result. In a swoon the blood rushes from the brain, and unconsciousness is produced; as well by the absence of the blood from the brain, as by its pressure. This again proves that the soul is connected with the blood, and that blood and brains are both necessary for the development of mind; and when these are destroyed, there can be no consciousness, and therefore, "the dead know not anything." If the soul, or mind, or consciousness were immaterial, and therefore independent of the organization, they could not be affected by the use of chloroform. But chloroform does deprive men of all consciousness.

If the soul were immaterial, how could a word spoken to the soul, suffuse the cheek with blushes, or the eye with tears? How could the hearing of a shriek causing terror, send the blood to the heart, and pale the face, and cause a universal trembling? From whence comes expression? Is it not the playing of the soul in the eye, and in the muscles of the countenance? Why do we judge of the peculiar characteristics of a man's mind, by the physiognomy? Because a certain combination of the muscles indicating certain emotions, have so often been called into play, that the combination has left an indelible impress. We can sometimes read the very thoughts of the soul in the expression of the eye and the features.

Is not the whole science of phrenology based upon the principle, that every mental and moral faculty, has its appropriate organ in the brain and is entirely dependent on the material organization for its development? If the soul were immaterial; could the phrenologist delineate its character and powers; merely by examining the external organization? Why is the "immaterial" soul of the brute, less capacious than that of man? Because the organs of the brain are less in number and in volume, compared with their frames, than they are in men; and consequently their souls cannot manifest so many mental and moral powers.

Thus do facts, stubborn, unyielding facts, as well as the word of the Lord, incontrovertibly prove that the mind, and spirit and soul, are not immaterial; and that they cannot manifest thought, feeling, knowledge, memory, or consciousness, of any kind, without the material organization; and therefore, "there is no knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave." "For in death there is no remembrance of thee." Isa. xxxviii. 18. "For the grave cannot celebrate thee; they that go down into the pit, cannot hope for thy truth. The living, they shall praise thee, as I do this day."

Disguise it as you may, christians must soon give up the notion of the "natural immortality and imateriality of the soul;" or science will drive the intelligent into infidelity. Or what is more likely to occur, if part of the church persist in advocating known error, the Lord will send leanness upon them; taking away their privileges, and giving them to others that will bring forth the fruits of them. But the days of immateriality are numbered, the soul is mortal, or to speak correctly, man is mortal, all mortal; and notwithstanding the traditions and opposition of men, to this conclusion you must come at last.

Soon may the sun of truth arise upon the church; scattering the dark mists of error, that have so long obscured her glory; preventing her unity and alienating her feelings from her own children; and dissolve the veil from her heart, that has so long prevented the Lord from opening her eyes, that she may behold wondrous things out of his law. Then shall the church come up from the wilderness leaning upon her beloved. Not leaning upon Luther, nor Calvin, nor Wesley, nor Fox; but upon Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God.

A REQUEST.

Will you give us what you think is the true sense or exposition of Heb. vi. 1 to 8.

RESPONSE BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

The apostle urges the church to leave the principles, or rudiments, of the doctrine of Christ and pass on to perfection. It is not to be understood that they were to reject these principles, but simply that they should not be confined to them. It is intimated that if they should not move onward they would lay again the foundation of repentance and faith toward God. It may be that the apostle here intends to say that they would be required to repent again; it is true they would if they were guilty of dead works; but I should understand him to say, "not laying down again the foundation of repentance; i. e., Christ is preached in the first principles or rudiments of the gospel as the ground of repentance and faith; "enough has been said upon these now," together with the doctrines of baptisms; the laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. This foundation has been laid, and "other foundation can no man lay." Let it suffice.

I can not understand the apostle otherwise, as I conclude that he refers to the foundation of all these that had been laid down by the first or rudimental preaching. Let us move on to perfection. Not wait here and lay down this foundation again. These principles having been laid down and fully established, there could be no further necessity of dwelling upon them. Go on to further views of truth —to perfection: and this will we do if God permit.

He plainly hints that to remain thus working, would endanger the mind to backsliding. When for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you, said he to some, and follows up his reprimand by saying, ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. But to know the truth is to be saved.

Now, the apostle does not object to the doctrines here specified; he even intimates plainly that they belong to the doctrine of Christ; for we do not want to lay the foundation of them again. Then it is once laid; and must of necessity be laid in these principles. Nor does he object to the enjoyment of them in the view which we take of the divine plan; nor to our teaching them to others; but objects in reality to our living in such manner and so far back, that we shall be always dwelling upon them, and present a necessity for their re-establishment and proof to us. These things were necessary to our conversion, but need not be found the ever present thing to us. The apostle, we repeat, speaks of the foundation and the laying of it. He was appointed to do it by preaching.

They were not, as the church, to be contending about these doctrines, but to believe them and go forward. I do not know what these verses mean, if they do not teach that we should not be working (the whole thing having been settled by apostolic teaching) to lay the foundation of those doctrines. The philosophical structure of the passage requires it. Paul would not deny any of these doctrines, for he taught them as principles of the gospel.

He does not speak against holding them, but against our being content with them. The doctrines to be believed, and progress to be made, or dead works would follow.

The next three verses present a reason why the apostle urges improvement—increasing faith, and holiness—the danger of falling away, and the terrible state of the apostatized.

At this point we may illustrate the subject by remarking that Peter teaches that if we lack the increase, we are "blind and can not see afar off, and have forgotten that we were purged from our old sins."

If we make no progress we are in danger of falling back; and having been enlightened, how great the darkness if we fall back?

We freely admit, it will be perceived, that Paul, in the fourth verse, gives a reason for the advance of the church from the base line which he has established; which only shows that the refusal to follow Christ, in a further knowledge of his truth and experience of his grace, involves the danger of entire apostacy.

The force of this reason appears in the great fact that a certain exalted position in Christ—one enjoyed and forfeited by a return to infidelity—will effectually bar the mind against all future approaches to him. But we should observe, for a correct view of the subject of this condition, that those who fall away in such manner must have been very highly exalted. If they shall after this become infidels, reject Christ by counting the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, and thus crucify the Son of God afresh; they can not return to their allegiance. Why? They cannot repent and believe. They have no foundation of repentonce or faith, because they have no Christ. "If we sin wilfully after we have, received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin." That is to say: There is no after sacrifice—no more can be offered. Now having believed in this, and wilfully rejected it, thrown it all away, and adopted a life of infidelity and heathenism, what can remain? If Christ can not avail us by all that he has done, how can we be saved; for he can do no more?

In this last quotation, we see that the will must be involved, which I do not, of course, refer to one act of sin; for all sinful acts are wilful (and if any man—of the church—sin, we have an advocate) but to a life of infidelity and sin after such exalted enlightenment.

The great reason, it will be seen, why one can sin beyond the possibility of recovery to divine favor, is that from his peculiar relation to Christ, by the knowledge of the truth which he has seen, and been subjected to; the force by which Christ could save him to a position, essential to his holiness, which has all been found in vain, and he, by returning to the darkness of infidelity and heathenism, has now no Christ left to do the work for him; and there is no other name by which he can be saved. He loses Christ, and of consequence must be lost; for it is only by holding to him that any can be saved.

The 7th and 8th verses are an illustration of the position taken by the apostle; and a beautiful one it is. "The earth which will not bring forth after the rain," is nigh, already unto cursing, "whose end is to be burned," (because cursed.) So with those who, after all the exhibition of the divine power in them which is supposed here, bring forth no fruit to holiness.

The plain position of the apostle is this: that if a man has been brought to the most complete state of light and truth, even the experience of the power of God in the condition of his own affections, and then becomes a confirmed infidel, he can not repent or be renewed to repentance; from the relation he must now sustain to Christ—without whom, in a different relation, he can not receive the least divine aid in escaping the darkness of condemnation.

THE BLASPHEMER CAGED.

MOSES HULL, the apostate and blasphemer, who strode through New England, for a short time, some few months since, boasting with "great swelling words of vanity," seems to have been fairly caged by the New Covenant, a Universalist paper in Chicago, Ill. Hull seems to be thoroughly hulled, this time, so that nothing is left of him but the cob, and that in a decaying condition. The Covenant handles him thus:

"We should be glad to see Mr. Hull and his theory tried by his own tests. Spiritualists, he claims, are 'true believers,' and can accomplish what Jesus said should attend the true believer.' This is Mr. Hull's language, and he adds that christian 'churches can not produce one of the evidences that they are believers.' The charge, he admits, is a serious one, and he is therefore willing to test the matter. It is not necessary to call a World's Convention, as he proposes. Call together a few hundred of the people of Kalamazoo and vicinity, and test the matter as far as he is concerned. We admit that 'our church' can not do the things referred to, as we limit the works to the apostolic age. As far as we are concerned, we give it up; but as Mr. Hull claims that he and other Spiritualists can do the works—that they are 'true believers,' and can accomplish what Jesus said should attend the true believer, we propose that he be put on trial. He claims what we do not, and it is fair that he be tried by his own test. This would be entirely satisfactory, and we do not see how he can object to his own rule. What, then could the true believer do? 'These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt

"Now, Mr. Hull, set the time when you will do all these things, and make good your claim that you are a 'true believer!' Can you cast out devils? If you can do this, you can go to the asylum in Kalamazoo and cure the poor lunatic. Jesus did this. Go there and restore the insane to their right minds! Let us see by your works that you are a 'true believer,' or go and play with the poisonous fangs of the serpent! let the rattle snake bite your hand, and see if no ill effects are produced! Take a dose of strychnine or Prussic acid and see if it does not harm you. The test is—'If they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them.' Is Moses Hull willing to accept this challenge?

"Mr. Hull says again: 'But if Spiritualists prove themselves to be the true believers, by the inspired rule, 'He that believeth on me the works that I do, shall he do also,' we ask the church and clergy to acknowledge it, etc.

"That's fair; and for one we say, that we will. Only do the works that Jesus did, and we will concede all that you claim. Jesus healed the sick, restored sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, and speech to the dumb, cured the lunatic, stilled the raging sea, walked upon the waters, raised the dead, fed thousands of people, (besides women and children,) with five loaves and two small fishes, and did many other wonderful works, according to the history. Now, if Moses Hull can do these things, we shall admit that he is a 'true believer,' as he claims. Can he walk upon the water? Can he calm the waves of the sea by his word? Can he raise the dead? Jesus did these things; and, Mr. Hull tells us that he is willing to be tried by the inspired rule of Jesus. 'The works that I do shall he do also.' Give us the evidence, Mr. Hull, that you are a 'true believer,' according to your own test, and we will at once admit your claim. Until then we shall be constrained to think that your pretensions are mere 'sound and fury, signifying nothing.'"

Napoleon's Life of Julius Cæsar.

A PASSAGE FROM THE PREFACE.

Several copies of the "History of Julius Cæsar," by Napoleon III., have found their way into the hands of journalists, although the book is not yet officially issued. A letter from Brussels to the Nord cites some remarkable passages from the preface to the work, which gives in a manner the measure of the author. The opening passage of the preface is as follows: "Historic truth ought to be as sacred as religion, for by it is taught the love of the true and the hatred of oppression. Events are never produced spontaneously; they proceed from anterior causes which alone determine their results. Among these causes great men figure in the first rank; they personify the action of Providence; they possess certain ideas necessary to the march of humanity. As soon as these great men have fixed upon their system, from the fact that it is the product of an infallible reasoning, it will in a manner impose itself upon the society called upon to put it into practice. It is for this reason that these efforts to obstruct the path of great men are of no avail. Death itself can not overcome them. Their ideas and their influence in the world live after them. It is of no use to suppress Cæsar. He would be continued by Augustus and avenged by Nero and Caligula. For the same reason it is in vain that Napoleon is buried at St. Helena. After forty years of sufferings for Europe the empire has a new birth, and recommences its actions upon European destinies. But in consequence of the interruptions to which Napoleonic ideas have been subjected, its development will be the more painful and laborious."

These few words show the importance of the part which Napoleon assigns himself; but the imperial author seems to have left out of sight the philosophic truth that great men are only the forcible expressions, under Providence, of great thoughts which are diffused through a whole people, and that without the aid of the people great men could never develop their ideas.—The Methodist.

Spiritualism.

At the great Spiritualist mass meeting at Oshtemo, Michigan, June 26th and 27th, 1863, it was said in one of their prominent speeches: "Spiritualism, with its thousands of mediums and its millions of believers, stands forth to-day as the religion of the world."

We believe the saying to be true in a much broader sense than most people are ready to admit, who have not yet indorsed this new religion. But few are aware of the rapid spread of the principles embodied in the system of theology taught by the spirits and spiritualists. Like weeds, they are springing up all over the world, and having a most luxuriant growth, with very little hindrance; so that it is becoming "the religion of the world" in its extent.

It is emphatically "the religion of the world" in its character; that is, it is in keeping with the feelings of the natural man. It requires no reformation, no sorrow for sin nor consecration to the Lord. All men and women, no matter how they live, are members of the "New Catholic Church," so called by the spiritualists. It is perfectly adapted to the taste of wicked men; therefore it meets with no opposition from the world. Men do not embrace this whole system at once, but first adopt some of these principles, and advance step by step till they are wholly engulfed in the depths of infidelity. Let all beware of this "religion of the world."—Prophetic Times.

The Herald of Life.

NEW YORK, MARCH 22, 1865.

This Week's Paper.

Our Paper-maker has sadly disappointed us, in failing to furnish paper as usual for this week's issue; and we have been obliged to use an inferior article, and somewhat out of size, or lay over till next week. We have done the best we could under the circumstances; and, after all, have been thrown back into a late issue. We trust not to be in such a predicament again, but cannot tell what may happen in this disappointing world.

Life Believers in New York.

Life only in Christ, is the grandest and most glorious truth ever brought to the ears of mortal man. The friends of this heavenly message, in New York and vicinity, have engaged Dodworth Hall, 806 Broadway, for meetings on the "first day of the week," for the year to come. Preaching morning and evening, uniformly, every Lord's day, at the usual hours of public services. Seats free.

There was preaching there last Lord's day three times, with good attendance. Next Sabbath Eld. S. W. Bishop will preach there morning and evening.

The Third Quarterly Conference.

The time for holding this Conference has been fixed for Sunday April 23d, in Dodworth Hall, 806 Broadway, New York. Services three or more times on the first day, and to be continued as far into the week as thought best; doubtless through Monday and Tuesday, if no more. Important matters will come up at this Conference relating to future operations and missionary work. All who feel an interest in these things should be present as early Monday as possible, as these matters will be under consideration Monday and Tuesday. We presume that most preachers will have appointments in other places which will prevent their attendance till Monday. On their account business matters will not be called up on "the first day."

The Christian Passover.

The Life believers in New York and Brooklyn, will meet for the observance of this feast. The commemoration of our Lord's death is, in the nature of the case, and in harmony with all other memorial of events, an anniversary celebration. Therefore, the doing "this in remembrance of" Christ's death, and to "show forth his death till he come," is our object; and, by Divine permission, it will be attended to in New York on its anniversary; which, this year, falls on Monday eve, April 10th. The friends abroad who have not the opportunity to attend to it at home, are invited to be with us on the occasion; which we trust will be one of much interest. The gathering in the evening will be at an early hour. A moderate repast will be provided for the opening of "the feast," and such other matters attended to as shall be suitable to the occasion. The closing service will be eating the bread and drinking the wine in commemoration of our Redeemer's broken body and shed blood. All who love the Saviour are welcome to participate with us at their and our Lord's table. Let each examine himself, or herself, and see that the feast is kept so as to honor our Lord.

Let none suppose because they are are unable to meet in company with others that they can not keep the feast. We doubt not you can keep it acceptably at home, and alone, if attended to as a memorial of our Lord's death and in memory of his love.

A Short Sermon.

"I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, that he would grant you according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.—Eph. iii. 14–19.

"I bow my knees"—in prayer—"unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"—through whom alone we can have access to the Father: and—"of whom the whole family"—patria, kindred, tribe, race, progeny—"in heaven and in earth are named." The whole race of saints, wherever they are, and wherever they lived, derive their spiritual and divine life from Him, as the appointed head of his family; and therefore take His name whose nature in embryo they possess; as children take the name of their father. As the head of this family all communications with his Father are made through and in the name of Christ. Thus, to the Father, Paul said, he prayed, "That he would grant you"—of this family—"according to the riches of his glory"—His glorious riches, wealth, or abundance, which is inexhaustible and unsearchable—"to be strengthened with might"—increased in power—"by His Spirit"—which is the efficient agency in communicating power, or might—"in the inner man"—or, that new and spiritual formation derived from Christ, and through union with him, "that Christ may dwell in your hearts"—that He may have a home, a permanent place, in your minds, or affections, so that every thought shall be under the government of that Spirit with which He was filled. This home, or residence, for Christ in the hearts, or affections, cannot be attained except "by faith," a strong and unwavering confidence in God, through his Son, who is the medium, and the only one, through which the Spirit of God is communicated to men. The apostle prayed that such communication of the Spirit might be made, "that being rooted and grounded in love," taking root, or striking roots into, and made firm in love. The figure is beautiful. Love is the soil in which, and in which alone, the christian can grow: God is love: Christ is the gift of love; the grand office of the Spirit is to shed abroad the love of God in the hearts of believers: they are planted in love: they should strike their roots deep therein, and become firm and immovable in it; thus will they honor the God of love, resemble Christ in love, become unblamable in love; and so attain unto the full and perfect adoption of children to God, and partake of his immortality, incorruptibility, and endless life, at the revelation of Jesus Christ. And Paul desired that they might now be rooted and grounded in love, so that they "may be able"—fully able—"to comprehend," to understand, to know, to lay hold of—"with all saints"—in company with all the holy ones—"what is the breadth"—how wide—"and length"—how extensive—"and depth"—how inscrutable, or unsearchable—"and height"—how high the elevation of the love of God—"and to know the love of Christ:" here the apostle, himself, has attained that elevation in description that his own head, as it were, becomes giddy, and he exclaims from astonishment at his discoveries—"which passeth knowledge." Well said, truly: it is even so: and the loftiest intellect that shines and expands before the throne of God must now, and will forever, have to make the same acknowledgment. Well, saith the apostle, I will stop here in my effort to describe the love of Christ and God; but I pray, "that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God." Truly, this wish is the cap stone of the arch, and all language fails in any attempt at exposition: we will only add—Even so, Amen.

"Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us. Unto him be glory in the church by Jesus Christ throughout all ages, world without end. Amen."—Vs. 20 and 21.

The apostle after his masterly flight, in the attempt at a description of the love of God and Christ, seems unwilling to descend till he had planted a standard even above the cap stone, and he proceeds to give a shout of triumph while he runs up the flag of the kingdom, and says, "Now unto him who is able to do"—how much, Paul?—"all we ask"—yes, and all we think, and yea, and—"above"—over, beyond—"all we ask or think:" and not only beyond that, but "abundantly above" it: yea, "exceeding abundantly above all we ask or think." We can ask for much, but, we may think of more, perhaps, than we dare ask for; but after all, in our deepest and highest thoughts, we do not, hardly, begin to reach even the outskirts of the treasures God has in store for, and which He is able to give to, those that love and obey Him through his Son. But, says the apostle, He is able to do these things "according to the power that worketh in us," by which we were formed of the dust, brought up in animal nature, developed an intellectual nature, now a spiritual one, whereby we are already made partakers of the divine nature: and what cannot that power effect which has already accomplished so much? Who shall fix its bounds? Who can tell where or when it is to stop in its developments in us? Will it stop with this age? No: therefore, "Now unto him be glory in the church"—the assembly of the holy ones—"by Christ Jesus"—who is the head of that assembly; through him let glory be given to God, his Father and our Father—"throughout all ages, world"—aionon, ages—"without end"—or, throughout all the endless succession of ages. This age is not to terminate the wonders of God's love and power. There is to be a continued, an endless number of ages, succeeding each other; each rising higher in glory and in the richness of their developments, without ever exhausting the fulness of God. The idea of the next age being the last is a dream of ignorance, a mere fancy, unsupported by the Scriptures, and at war with the Divine administration, so far as it has yet been developed. What unthought of glories, then, still lie in the future. We have no need of "endless torments," nor of torment in a future life at all, to stimulate us to seek eternal life: "the joy set before us" is ample. The preaching of torture, as a motive to seek and serve God, has only originated in ignorance and superstition. Let the Scripture truth of God's love and kind designs take its place, and see if we do not have a more consistent race of Christians.

"Ordained to Eternal Life."

How are we to understand this phrase, Acts xiii. 48, "As many as were ordained to eternal life, believed?"—Inquirer.

The original word translated "ordained" is that of prepared or disposed. Such is its true import. Of this fact, Lowman and Whitby give many examples in their comments on this text, and themselves translate the term—tetagmenoi—"disposed for." As many as were disposed for eternal life believed."

In the Hebrew of the O. T. there are eleven words, which are translated ordain, ordaineth, and ordained. One of those words, viz.: Orakh—has this definition—"to arrange, to prepare." This word occurs first in Psa. cxxxii. 17. "I have ordained"—prepared, arranged—"a lamp for mine annointed." The next place of its occurrence, is Isa. xxxviii 33.—"Tophet is ordained"—prepared—"of old". Our authority is, "The Bible Student's Concordance, by Aaron Pick, Professor of Hebrew and Chaldea, from the University of Prague."

It will be seen by the quotation we have given above, that our English word "ordained," has the sense in Hebrew of prepared, or arranged. Claiming the benefit of this meaning of the word, we bring it forward to help in the explanation of Acts xiii. 48—"As many as were ordained to eternal life, believed." Clearly, to our mind, the sense is—"As many as were prepared for eternal life, believed." That is—As many as had given careful and candid attention to the truth, the Apostles had spoken in previous discourses, now believed the doctrine about eternal life, which they had heard; for, "faith cometh by hearing." The Jews had heard in part, but their "envy" at the attention which the multitudes gave to the preaching of Paul and Barnabas, unfitted them to hear to profit; so they "contradicted and blasphemed;" and, hence, were not ordained—were not prepared by the ministry of the Apostles to receive and believe the glorious truth of eternal life, by and through Jesus Christ. Others were ordained, or prepared, or disposed, by the teaching of the Apostles, and hence believed.

That such is the true sense of this text, we fully believe. To refer the language to a decree, or irresistible purpose of God, that those individuals should have eternal life, and to assign that as the reason why they believed, it seems to us, is, however undesigned, to represent God as mocking his creatures, when he says—"As I live, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from their way and live;" and adds, "Why will ye die?" Now, if their eternal life depends upon His ordaining them to it, in the sense of an absolute decree; and if without such ordination they never will believe, which ordination He refuses to exercise in relation to all who die, then, most manifestly, there is an apparent want of sincerity on the part of God, when he solemnly affirms He has no pleasure in the death of the wicked. It will not meet the case at all to say—"He has no pleasure in their death in itself considered." He makes no such reservation in his oath in the matter; and it is not fitting that we mortals should make it for him, and thereby, virtually, charge him with duplicity, or double dealing.

We say, once more,—No man is ordained to eternal life, in the sense of being set apart for it, by God's act, till he has passed through his trial in this life. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life," saith the "Faithful and True Witness." Till then, even Paul found it necessary to keep his body under, and bring it into subjection; "lest that by any means" ... he "should be a cast away." See 1 Cor. ix. 27. Such language is totally, and eternally irreconcilable with the notion that he believed himself, at that time, set apart of God to eternal life, that is, eternally ordained to it.

The act of ordination, Acts xiii. 48, is not to be referred to some unknown and eternal act of God; the context forbids it. The minds of those who believed had been "prepared" by the words to which they had candidly listened, and being thus prepared they believed. Not one word is said of any decree of God in the matter; it is a simple contrast between candid and uncandid hearers. The latter were not prepared, the former were, and therefore believed.

"Whatever tetagmenoi may mean, which is the word translated, ordained, it is neither protetagmenoi, nor proorismenoi, which the Apostle uses, but simply tetagmenoi, which includes no idea of preordination or predestination of any kind." He inquires,—"What does the word tetagmenoi mean?" and answers—"The verb tatto, or tasso, signifies to place, set, order, appoint, dispose; hence it has been considered here as implying the disposition or readiness of mind of several persons in the congregation, such as the religious proselytes mentioned in verse 43, who possessed thereverse of the disposition of those Jews, who spake against those things, contradicting and blaspheming, ver. 44." He adds—"Those who seek for the plain meaning of the word, will find it here; those who wish to make out a sense, not from the Greek word, its use among Greek writers, and the obvious sense of the Evangelist, but from their own creed, may continue to puzzle themselves and others, ... having bidden adieu to the true meaning of a passage so very simple, taken in its connection, that one wonders how it ever came to be misunderstood and misapplied."

"Infants: Soul and Body."

Under the above caption, Luther Lee once took exceptions to the sentiment some one had advanced, that "the body of the infant is corrupt or fallen and depraved: this depravity is hereditary; but the soul is a new creation of God, not derived from the earthly parent."

Mr. Lee used up this notion very handsomely, and said, "The Bible affirms that God is the Maker of the body, as clearly as it does, that he is the Maker of the soul. Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob. But if souls are not begotten as well as bodies, Abraham did not beget Isaac, or else the term Isaac does not include a soul. If men are not begotten, then souls are no part of men."

Mr. Lee overthrows the sentiment in the argument, but demolishes himself along with it, for the doctrine of Mr. Lee is, that the soul is "immaterial, uncompounded, and indivisible." Now if it is immaterial, how does the action of matter, in generation, communicate it? And if it is indivisible, how could Abraham give or communicate a soul to Isaac? It could not be an offshoot from his own, for that would make his soul divisible, and Mr. Lee says it is "indivisible." We cannot see, if Abraham communicated Isaac's soul to him, but what it must still have been Abraham's soul in Isaac, if the soul is not divisible; and then we do not see how there can be more than one soul for the whole human family; and as that is indivisible, it is a family soul: hence it follows that the action of any one man must be the action of the family soul; so if one man sins, it is a family sin, or if one man acts virtuously it is a family virtue. Again, as the soul is "indivisible," all men must have the same common destiny: say, for example, that if Abraham should be lost, Isaac must be lost, for the soul can't be divided; and so, whatever is the fate of the first man, Adam, must be the fate of all the men of his race, or else the soul must be divisible; and then, what would become of Mr. Lee's theory of indivisibility? Happy for man, however, we have the assurance that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are saved, and that proves Adam and Eve were, and that all their posterity must inevitably be so too—for "the soul is indivisible." Truly Mr. Lee has helped our opponents to a short and certain route to universal salvation. Can you get of that dilemma, Mr. Lee, without abandoning your theory?

We see Mr. Lee's difficulty. It all grows out of the assumption that the soul is an entity—a real being or existence—and not an attribute. The soul of man is an attribute of man, an inherent quality, that which pertains to man as man, as an organism. To use one of Mr. Lee's own expressions, "The soul, whose very existence is thought." Never did a theologian better define the immaterial soul than he has done, fatal as it is to his entire theory, which he has labored to sustain.

The question between Mr. Lee and his friend stands thus: Are the souls [thoughts] of men, or infants, a new creation of God, or are they propagated by generation from father to child?

According to Mr. Lee, the soul is a "living consciousness," and "is known to exist only from its thoughts." Now, how little living consciousness does an infant manifest? and as the soul "is known to exist only from its thoughts," how will Mr. Lee prove that infants have any souls at all? Does he know anything of their thoughts? He has said that "animals do not think;" that what appears to be the result of thought in them is only instinct. There are very few animals but what are quite equal in this respect to infants just born. After all, then, Mr. Lee, may it not be, according to your theory, that infants have no souls at all? So that you and your opposing friend may both be wrong.

The matter now seems to stand thus:—

The soul is thought, and can be known only by its thoughts:

But the infant is not known to think:

Therefore, the infant has no soul, so far as known. Is this position true? And if not, how will Mr. Lee disprove it, without abandoning some of his main arguments?

Story of a Dog.

Theologians claim for man an immortal soul; and part of their argument is based on the fact that man manifests moral qualities which brutes do not possess. Let them read the following and judge whether a dog may not have some thing that looks very much like what they term a moral quality in man: and if man is immortal on this account, why not the dog also?—at least some of them? We confess that the following account not only shames man as a species, but many professed Christians who do not manifest half the moral, nor half the Christian principle of this dog and his companion: for many of them not only rejoice at the calamities that may befall those whom they regard as their enemies, but "bite and devour" those who have extended to them a helping hand. Let such read and learn, from the fact here related, to humble themselves for that pride of heart which leads them to boast that they are immortal, and for the revengeful spirit they have so often indulged.

"One day a Newfoundland dog and a mastiff, which never met without a quarrel, had a fierce and prolonged battle on the pier of Donaghadee, and from which, while so engaged, they both fell into the sea. There was no way of escape but by swimming a considerable distance. The Newfoundland dog being an expert swimmer, soon reached the pier in safety; but his antagonist, after struggling for a time, was on the point of sinking, when the Newfoundland, which had been watching the mastiff's struggles with great anxiety, dashed in, and seizing him by the collar, kept his head above the water, and brought him safely to shore. Ever after they were most intimate friends: and when, unfortunately, the Newfoundland was killed by a stone wagon passing over his body, the mastiff languished and evidently lamented his friend's death for a long time."

What is Death?

Cruden, in his Concordance, under the word Death, thus expounds its meaning, and the nature of the curse which Adam has transmitted to his posterity.

"Death," he says, "signifies the separation of the soul from the body,—this is temporal death. A separation of soul and body from God's favor in this life, which is the state of all unregenerated and unrenewed persons, who are without the light of knowledge, and the quickening power of grace,—this is spiritual death. The perpetual separation of the whole man from God's heavenly presence and glory, to be tormented for ever with the devil and his angels,—this is the second death, or eternal death. To all these kinds of death Adam made himself and his posterity liable, by transgressing the commandment of God in eating the forbidden fruit."

This strange and unnatural definition of the scripture word death, is that which is generally held by modern Christian teachers. Can such extravagances fail to shock the understandings of an intelligent and truth-seeking people? Who can be surprised that such teaching should furnish a theme for the severest sarcasm of the skeptic, and enable him to point the finger of scorn at the Christian profession? If the above be the definition of the scripture term death, then it must be applied, to be consistent, to other passages where this word occurs. "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he by the Grace of God should taste death for every man." Heb. ii. 9.

According therefore to the definition given by Cruden, Christ must have suffered this three-fold death. 1. Temporal death, or the separation of soul and body. 2. Spiritual death, or the separation of the whole nature from God's favor in this life. 3 Eternal death or the perpetual separation of the whole man from God, to be tormented for ever with the devil and his angels! Can any one believe that Christ suffered this? Of course not; not even the "orthodox" believe this, though in consistency they should. They urge a commutation theory to remove their difficulty.

In the following passage the word death occurs three times. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage." Heb. ii. 14, 15.

Now the common sense principle of interpretation requires us to understand that the death mankind feared, the death the devil had the power of, and the death which Christ died, are all the same. If, therefore, it is the three-fold death which Satan had the power of, and mankind feared, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. But this would have made redemption impossible, because one element in this death is eternal torment in a state of perpetual banishment from God! Modern theologians and scripture are as much at variance, on this topic, as their theology is at variance with common sense. This passage just quoted, moreover, obliges the conclusion that death in the apostolic age, and prior to that period, had no such mystic sense as that which now has the accredited seal of popular theology, viz: a separation of the conscious and immortal soul from the unconscious body; that, on the contrary, it was regarded as a complete and dreaded dominion over the entire conscious humanity, which blasted the hopes, froze the energies, and broke the spirits of the race so far as no clearly defined views of a future life by resurrection were possessed. Under such circumstances, its melancholy anticipation sat like an incubus upon the life-loving heart of humanity—it was a "bondage" which clung with dismal and oppressive tenacity to them all their life-time, and from which they could only be effectually delivered by a sure and certain hope of resurrection from the dead, through the resurrection of Christ. Surely it was the fear of this all-engulfing death, not of a three-fold death of modern theology, which begat the "bondage" of which the text speaks.

Ancient Heathens and Immortality.

The ancient heathens did but conjecture, without proof, of a future state. And there is this remarkable circumstance to be noticed in addition, that those who taught the doctrine (as the ancient heathen lawgivers themselves did, from a persuasion of its importance for man's conduct), do not seem themselves to have believed what they they taught, but to have thought merely of the expediency of inculcating this belief on the vulgar.

It does not appear, however, that they had much success in impressing their doctrine on the mass of the people; for though a state of future rewards and punishments was commonly talked of among them, it seems to have been regarded as little more than an amusing fable. It does not appear, from the account of their own writers, that men's lives were ever influenced by such belief. On the contrary, we find them, in speeches publicly delivered and now extant, ridiculing the very notion of any one's seriously believing the doctrine.

It may be thought, however, by some, that the wisest of the heathen philosophers, though they did not hold the notions of the vulgar as to the particulars of a future state of rewards and punishments, yet had convinced themselves (as in their writings they profess) of the immortality of the soul. And it is true that they had, in a certain sense; but in such a sense as in fact makes the doctrine amount to nothing at all. They immagined that the souls of men, and of all other animals, were not created by God, but were themselves parts of the divine mind, from which they were separated when united with bodies, and to which they would return and be re-united on quitting those bodies; so that the soul, according to this notion, was immortal both ways; that is, not only was to have no end, but had no beginning, and was to return after death into the same condition in which it was before our birth,—a state without any distinct personal existence or consciousness. It was the substance of which the soul is composed, that (according to this doctrine) was eternal rather than the soul itself, which as a distinct being, was swallowed up and put an end to. Now it would be ridiculous to speak of any consolation, or any moral restraint, or any other effect whatever, springing from the belief of such a future state as this, which consists in becoming after death, the same as we were before birth. To all practical purposes, it is the same thing as annihilation.

Accordingly the apostle Paul, when speaking to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xv.) of some persons who denied the "Resurrection of the dead," (teaching, perhaps, some such doc trine as that I have just been speaking of) declares, in that case his "preaching would have been vain." To deny the "Resurrection," is, according to him, to represent Christians as "having hope in this life only," and those "who have fallen asleep in Christ, as having perished" (verse 18, 19). As for any such future existence as the ancient philosophers described, he does not consider it worth a thought.

Such was the boasted discovery of the heathen sages! which has misled many inattentive readers of their works; who, finding them often profess the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and not being aware what sort of immortality it was they meant, have hastily concluded that they had discovered something approaching to the truth: or, at least, that the doctrine was one which might have some practical effect on the feelings and conduct, which it is plain it never could. And such, very nearly, is said to be the belief entertained now by the learned among the East-Indian Bramins, though they teach a different doctrine to the vulgar.—Archbishop Whately.

The Discussion in Boston.

THIRD EVENING.

Friday, March 17, 1865.

Last evening was occupied in the further consideration of points already discussed, besides some additional ones. Just as we suspected, and as we expressed in the second installment of our synopsis of proceedings, the negative swung back to his old position of the mortal resurrection of the righteous. His statements were distinct and decisive. He believes that the righteous are first brought to life in a mortal condition, and that afterward they put on immortality. But he took good care to avoid any attempt to explain 1 Cor. xv. 42–44, 52.

On the previous evening the negative had taken up and discussed one of the proof texts of the affirmative—Isa. xxvi. 14—on the plea that he had disposed of all that had been said by the affirmative. Last evening the latter reciprocated by quoting the following passage from his opponent's fifth speech in the former discussion: "In Dan. xii. 2, there is a passage familiar to you all. 'And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.' Now observe, first, they all awake" The affirmative took up this last assertion—"They all awake." The text reads—"Many of them that sleep shall awake."

"Many of" cannot be "all." In reply, the negative asserted that there is "no 'of' in the original." Prof. Hudson, being present, the affirmative appealed to him to state the facts. The Professor did not commit himself fairly on the word "of," but introduced a gratuitous statement to the effect that the original has the article before "many," which he thought made it immaterial whether the "of" is there or not, as the article would neutralize it. The affirmative then appealed to the writer, and we affirmed that "of" is undoubtedly in the text. If we had fairly understood Prof. Hudson's remark about the article, we should have added that he was entirely mistaken. The original reads thus: "And many of the sleepers"—Or, "And many from the sleepers." The restrictive particle—"of" or "from"—is there, and the Professor's article is not there. King James' version is certainly correct in its rendering in this case.

The affirmative took up I Tim. iv. 10, which contains the phrase "Saviour of all men," and showed its true import by pointing out the fact that it is "God"—not "Christ"—who is the Saviour of all men. The text was shown to be susceptible of two constructions, either (1) that God has provided a conditional salvation for all, or (2) that the word "Saviour" should be rendered "Preserver," in which case the idea is that God preserves all men in this present existence, giving "to all life, and breath, and all things," and "especially" preserves unto life eternal "them that believe." Christ is "the author of eternal salvation" Heb. v. 9.

Besides various minor points debated in the course of the evening, the negative's theory of the unconditional salvation of Adam and his posterity, as illustrated in the former discussion, and re-illustrated in the present one, was thoroughly analyzed by the affirmative, and its utter weakness and folly was well exposed. The only sense in which the affirmative regarded Christ as the LIFE-GIVER was also stated with great force. Christ is the "BREAD of life"—bread, "not POISON."

FOURTH EVENING.

Saturday, March 18, 1865.

The debate last evening was very interesting for one reason at least. Our readers will be pleased to learn that the negative was compelled to surrender one point. We do not mean that he did it frankly and generously, for he "bowed" very "reluctantly" to the irresistible mandate of truth. But he did it. On the previous evening he had boldly asserted that the word "of" in the phrase "Many of them that sleep"—Dan. xii. 2—is not in the original. Of course he did not say that he had examined the orignal, and found it so; neither did he say that any one else had found it so. But he said it as confidently as if it were an undoubted fact. We have no words too strong to use in condemnation of such ignorant (if not wilful) perversion of the express word of God. To be sure, he quoted in connection the translation of Thomas Wintel, in which the word "of" is omitted, but what of that? But a moment previous, he had quoted Prof. Whiting as "high authority," who recognizes the partitive particle. Why should Thos. Wintel, or any other man be continually appealed to for "a just and exact translation," when the manifest facts, known by every competent critic, who reads the text in the original, completely annihilate Wintel's translation. Wintel's opinion in the matter is worth as much as Miles Grant's—just nothing. Yesterday the affirmative, stirred up by the statement of Prof. Hudson, that the article is before "many," took the trouble to visit Simon C. Noot, D. D., Instructor of Hebrew, to inquire as to the facts. The learned Hebraist spurned the assertion of Prof. Hudson, and said that it is a moral impossibility to get anything but a restrictive meaning from the original. To this testimony the negative was forced to submit.

The affirmative introduced an argument on "the bread of life" John vi., in which he proved (1) that Christ is only a LIFE-GIVER as he is the "bread" of life; and (2) that the bread only gives life to those who eat it; and (3) that if they eat they "shall live forever." This overwhelming argument the negative did not notice.

The affirmative brought forward other strong points, which told on the audience. As for the negative, his remarks were so loose and incongruous that it would be impossible to pick out a single point worth printing. There was nothing new, but from beginning to end, his talk was a confused rehash and dull repetition of his talk on the preceeding evenings.

Brain and Thought.

Richmond mentions the case of a woman whose brain was exposed in consequence of the removal of a considerable portion of its bony covering by disease. He says he repeatedly made pressure on the brain, and each time suspended all feeling and all intellect, which were instantly restored when the pressure was withdrawn. The same writer also relates another case, that of a man who had been trepanned, and who perceived his intellectual faculties failing, and his existence drawing to a close, every time the efused blood collected upon the brain so as to produce pressure. Professor Chapman, of Philadelphia, mentions, in his Lectures, that he saw an individual with his skull perforated and the brain exposed, who was accustomed to submit himself to the same experiment of pressure as the above, and who was exhibited by the late Professor Westar to his class. His intellect and moral faculties disappeared on the application of pressure to the brain; they were held under the thumb, as it were, and restored at pleasure to their full activity by discontinuing the pressure. But the most extraordinary case of this kind within my knowledge, and one peculiarly interesting to the physiologist and metaphysician, is related by Sir Astley Cooper in his Surgical Lectures. A man by the name of Jones, received an injury of his head while on board a vessel in the Mediterranean, which rendered him insensible. The vessel, soon after this, made Gibraltar, where Jones was placed in the hospital, and remained several months in the same insensible state. He was then carried on board the Dolphin frigate to Deptford, and from thence was sent to St. Thomas Hospital, London. He lay constantly on his back, and breathed with difficulty. His pulse was regular, and each time it beat he moved his fingers When hungry or thisty he moved his lips and tongue. Mr. Clyne, the surgeon, found a portion of the skull depressed, trepanned him, and removed the depressed portion. Immediately after this operation the motion of the fingers ceased, and at four o'clock in the afternoon (the operation having been performed at one) he sat up in bed; sensation and volition returned, and in four days he got out of bed and conversed. The last thing he remembered was taking a prize in the Mediterranean. From the moment of the accident, thirteen months and a few days, oblivion had come over him and all recollection ceased. He had for more than year, drunk of the cup of Lethe, and lived wholly unconscious of existence; yet, on removing a small portion of bone which pressed upon the brain, he was restored to the full possession of the powers of his mind and body.—Dr. Brigham.

National Retribution.

We have maintained from the commencement of the present war that it was our national day of judgment; and that the South must be desolated, as its repentance was hopeless; that the North must suffer terribly in loss of life and property for its complicity in the crime of slaveholding; yet we have not been without a conviction that the North would be so far led to repent, and do works meet for repentance, as that it may be spared to a further trial, to see if the people are sincere, and in earnest to do justice and love mercy. The judgment on the slaveholding portion of the country is too manifest to be denied as a judicial visitation; and shows that God does not let His justice sleep forever, but sooner or later causes judgment to overtake such as refuse reformation. The judicial blindness of the slaveholding power is thus commented on by The Methodist of this city.

JUDICIAL BLINDNESS OF THE SOUTH.

We have referred to the "judicial blindness" to which Providence has given up the rebellious South. History certainly does not record a more striking and admonitory lesson of this kind. The successes of the rebels have apparently been measured out to them just sufficiently to lead them on by a prolonged struggle, to complete retribution. Their lands have been devastated, their business overthrown, their commerce suppressed, their internal communications destroyed, their fighting men nearly annihilated, their families overwhelmed with bereavement and want, their currency practically nullified, and now, as their final overthrow narrows and concentrates with irresistible pressure upon them, they are forced to abandon the chief design of their treason, slavery, and appeal to the downtrodden African for help. But that appeal comes too late. Sherman has cut them off from their chief resource for black recruits; they have not time to drill the comparatively few slaves who may be within their reach, and these know too well the imminent ruin of the cause, and have too much reason to detest that cause, to make reliable soldiers in the rebel lines. We shall not be surprised to find that this last expedient of the great crime will prove its most foolish and perhaps its most tragic fact. A few thousand negroes can be of little help to the failing Confederacy now: a large number of them may turn out to be its self-destruction, and such a destruction as history may tremble to record.

We find the leaders of this iniquity have become confounded; their counsels are without wisdom and concord, their resources are gone, and they are proposing to appropriate any thing and every thing by summary robbery of the people. Their money is worth two cents for the dollar; they need, according to their official estimates, ten hundred and fifty-six millions of dollars for their expenses the current year; their papers declare that "the ability to pay any heavier taxes than have already been imposed does not exist," and that the new system of taxation proposed by the rebel Congress "is utterly impossible for any people to meet." They have already repudiated a large part of their public debt by a species of commutation: they now see no other way out of their financial abyss than a second and unheard-of system of repudiation—the reduction of their whole obligations to the par value of gold; that is, in other words, to issue a new paper, and demand the return of the old to the Treasury, to be paid for at the rate of two cents of the new for one dollar of the old! Thus, with the loss of most of their youth, and of their slaves, must be extinguished hundreds of millions of their property in the form of repudiated government paper. This is destruction heaped on destruction. The curse of God is culminating over the heads of this doomed people.

The rebellion is bound hand and foot by its own crimes and policy. It has been justly said, by a Southern statesman, that there is none of its leaders who does not regret that he ever put his hand to the dreadful work. Their persistence is a necessity—it is not the effect of courage or of heroism. These men know that if they could escape death by peace, yet they must suffer what is worse than physical death—political and social death; that they can never again hold up their heads under the American sky. How can they then give up? If they yield they are ruined; if they persevere they can but be ruined. And their misled communities are in a similar retributive condition. Their leaders have absolute control of every thing; the people cannot save themselves without the consent of their military masters. What can they do then but suffer and perish? Nothing whatever, except as our advancing armies liberate them from their helplessness.

Such is the manifest retribution which has overtaken this greatest crime of modern ages. It is appalling; but it is sublime in its vindication of society and of the moral government of God. The man who fails to see the operation of invincible moral law in the history we are now enacting, fails to read its most impressive lesson. The, "Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Let the nations bow their heads in awe!

Evangelization of Italy.

In a moral and religious aspect Italy is becoming more interesting every day. Truth has been poured in there, through the mountain passes of Switzerland, from Geneva, always the headquarters of a pure and active Christianity, until very healthful signs begin to manifest themselves. During the last three years 100,000 Bibles have been bought by Italians; schools are multiplying rapidly; a Protestant theolgical seminary at Florence is in vigorous operation; Protestant preaching is established in at least fifty places; and, as might be expected, the most salutary effects are apparent. Northern Italy, which for many years has been the most enlightened and the most restive under the restraints of the old religion, was not, as might have been expected, foremost to welcome the dawning of new religious views. The aristocracy there clung to the hope of a reconciliation between Victor Immanuel and the Pope as affording the highest promise of reform. But meanwhile southern and central Italy had become more accessible to Protestant labors, and at length, in the north, Sardinia has been able to take a higher position among the Italian States, while the influence of the Waldenses is more potential for good than ever before. Milan, as well as Turin, both seem destined to become centres of education and light. The tendency of events is well illustrated by a recent occurrence at a place called Favale, only a few miles from Genoa. Being in a mountainous country, the people in mid-winter, when grazing cattle is no longer practicable, often become strolling minstrels. One of these, with his fiddle and flute, wandered off into Piedmont, where he received a new set of ideas relating to the Bible, etc., and returning home in the Spring found himself virtually banished from society. But a number of people soon became convinced that he was "neither a mad-man nor an atheist," and gained such influence as to draw down the anathemas of the priest, by whom they were eventually sent to prison. Public indignation then became aroused, and an application to the government, by virtue of the new constitution, secured their release. Now there is established in Favale a chapel with sixty members.

The same work is also going forward in other countries. In France forty-one new Protestant churches have been added within two years. Austria has adopted a constitution securing religious liberty, and, by favor of the Emperor, Protestant worship is sustained in the imperial city of Vienna. Spain alone is reserved for the reign of intolerance and bigotry.—Journal of Commerce.

Russian Buildings at Jerusalem.

The following account of the works that are being carried on by the Russians in Jerusalem, taken from a letter received from the Rev. J. Barclay, some two years since, will be read with interest:

"In a former letter, you ask me to give you some information about the Russian buildings at the north-west side of the city. The site occupied by them incloses an area of about 157,500 square yards, or 1,417,500 square feet; in fact, an irregular parallelogram 350 yards broad and 450 yards long. The ground on which they stand, is surrounded by a wall about fifteen feet high. The buildings comprise a palace for a bishop, a magnificent cathedral which is being rapidly pushed toward completion, and large quadrangular buildings, intended for the accommodation of many hundreds of pilgrims. In the plan which I have seen, many other edifices are also designed, the object of which I do not clearly know. The land itself was partly purchased by the Russians, though the larger portion, which was the former Turkish military exercise ground, was granted to them by imperial firman. Their outlay can not be set down at less than £250,000, about a quarter of a million, and yet their object is not fully realized. The idea which originated these buildings arose, it is said, in the Grand Duke Constantine's mind just after the Crimean war. To supply the place of the Russian navy, which had been interdicted in the Black Sea, it was proposed to keep in movement a large number of transport steamers as passenger boats. To keep these going, an impetus was given to the public mind on the subject of pilgrimage. With a view of supplying lodgings for the crowds of devotees, a subscription list was opened, and its proceeds applied to the present erections. It was then proposed to make arrangements to convey pilgrims at so much per head, from the several ports in Russia, to and from Jerusalem at a fixed tariff. Amongst the items set down was a definite sum for the absolution of each penitent in the holy places. At this proposition the Greek priests raised the cry of sacrilege, as such fees heretofore had been peculiarly their own; but now it was proposed to employ none but Russian priests. The Holy Synod took the matter up, and after a good deal of the usual intrigue, the direction of the whole passed into its hands. The location of the buildings is not far from the upper pool of Gihon, near which Rabshakah stood when he defied Hezekiah. It commands also the north and west of the city, and if we are to credit Latin suspicion, its future use will be military."—Jewish Intelligencer.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The suspicion expressed in the last sentence of this article explains the design of the Czar. War is in the hearts of all these kings, and their ambitions and belligerent tendencies will be overruled for the deliverance of Zion. The last great battle will be in vindication of Judah and Jerusalem. Joel. iii. 1–2., 6–16.]

PROMPT TO SERVE GOD.—This angel, (who delivered Peter,) like the other angels of God—like the angel that hurried Lot—appears in a kind of solemn haste. "Arise up quickly," he says; "gird thyself." These spirits, when their purpose is effected, do not stand in wonderment at their own exploits,—they take no breathing time—they want no leisure to rest from the toil, and contemplate the conquest. It is a very ordinary thing to them—it excites no particular surprise or elation in their minds—they do not think of repose. So should it be with the servants of God on earth. They should not stand still, wondering at their own doings, or think they deserve a year's holiday after the labor of one exploit; they also should be in solemn haste—their time is all too short. Not an hour should pass, after their greatest effort, without preparing for some new service.—John Foster.

READ YOUR BIBLE SLOWLY.—Take time, even if you have but little time. A great mathematician once said, "If his life depended upon solving a problem in two minutes, he would spend one of the two in deciding how to do it. So in reading the Scriptures, if you are pressed for time (and this ought to be a rare case), then spend the precious moments on a portion of a chapter. When you feel that the mind and heart are beginning to drink in the sentiment even of a single verse, then stop and drain the heavenly chalice, because the Divine Spirit is filling thy cup. It is a true, solemn, and interesting thought that we are to wait, to linger, to tarry for the blessing to come from the Word before us.

EVACUATION OF ROME.—France has informed the Italian government that the period of two years preceding the evacuation of Rome by the French troops will be calculated from the 6th of February last; that being the day on which King Victor Emmanuel left Turin for Florence. The 6th of February, 1867, therefore, will be a hazardous day for the Papal government. There is strong chance that, as soon as this main prop is removed, the whole superstructure of the Pope's temporal power will fall in disastrous ruin.

APPOINTMENTS.

ELD. J. T. CURRY will preach in Advent Hall, Merchant's Exchange, Manchester, N. H., Sunday, March 26th. E HOLT.

LIBERTY WETHERBEE will preach in East Greatworks, March 26. North Newburg April 2. Br. B. K. Davis is invited to attend the meeting at N. Newburg.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchaser of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening; afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That LEONARD C. THORNE act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

Diptheria.

I am happy to announce to the readers of the Herald of Life, that I am in the possession of a remedy that is a sure cure of Diptheria. I have used it for at least ten years in the treatment of this terrible disease, and have treated scores of cases (some of which had been given up by other Physicians) with entire success, not having lost a single case.

It cures the most malignant cases as certainly as the simplest forms of the disease. It is also purely Homeopathic.

Now I propose, for the sum of $1, to send to any who may desire it, a vial of this medicine, containing sufficient, at least, to cure half a dozen cases, with full directions for its use. The medicine can be sent by mail to any part of the country, and will keep any length of time without deteriorating in any latitude.

Address, DR. A. DECKER, Newark, N. J.

P. S.—In all cases where the medicine fails to cure, the money will be refunded by notifying me of the fact. To the poor, who are not able to pay, free.

Books and Pamphlets

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This word contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in plain binding, 50 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near ten years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead, can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none there fore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price, $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—IMMORTALITY: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev, T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a Prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men, with nt egard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The Author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the True Teaching of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity Life, Death, &c. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. It is a work of much labor and research. The title indicates its object, and the performance shows the object was kept in view throughout. The language is sometimes severe on what is called "orthodoxy—more so than is desirable—but the value of the work, in general, cannot be over-estimated. Thousands of it have been sent abroad, and thousand more ought to be scattered. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subjects; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

trine as that I have just been speaking of) declares, in that case his "preaching would have been vain." To deny the "Resurrection," is, according to him, to represent Christians as "having hope in this life only," and those "who have fallen asleep in Christ, as having perished" (verse 18, 19). As for any such future existence as the ancient philosophers described, he does not consider it worth a thought.

Such was the boasted discovery of the heathen sages! which has misled many inattentive readers of their works; who, finding them often profess the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and not being aware what sort of immortality it was they meant, have hastily concluded that they had discovered something approaching to the truth: or, at least, that the doctrine was one which might have some practical effect on the feelings and conduct, which it is plain it never could. And such, very nearly, is said to be the belief entertained now by the learned among the East-Indian Bramins, though they teach a different doctrine to the vulgar.—Archbishop Whately.

The Discussion in Boston.

THIRD EVENING.

Friday, March 17, 1865.

Last evening was occupied in the further consideration of points already discussed, besides some additional ones. Just as we suspected, and as we expressed in the second installment of our synopsis of proceedings, the negative swung back to his old position of the mortal resurrection of the righteous. His statements were distinct and decisive. He believes that the righteous are first brought to life in a mortal condition, and that afterward they put on immortality. But he took good care to avoid any attempt to explain 1 Cor. xv. 42–44, 52.

On the previous evening the negative had taken up and discussed one of the proof texts of the affirmative—Isa. xxvi. 14—on the plea that he had disposed of all that had been said by the affirmative. Last evening the latter reciprocated by quoting the following passage from his opponent's fifth speech in the former discussion: "In Dan. xii. 2, there is a passage familiar to you all. 'And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.' Now observe, first, they all awake." The affirmative took up this last assertion—"They all awake." The text reads—"Many of them that sleep shall awake." "Many of" cannot be "all." In reply, the negative asserted that there is "no 'of' in the original." Prof. Hudson being present, the affirmative appealed to him to state the facts. The Professor did not commit himself fairly on the word "of," but introduced a gratuitous statement to the effect that the original has the article before "many," which he thought made it immaterial whether the "of" is there or not, as the article would neutralize it. The affirmative then appealed to the writer, and we affirmed that "of" is undoubtedly in the text. If we had fairly understood Prof. Hudson's remark about the article, we should have added that he was entirely mistaken. The original reads thus: "And many of the sleepers"—Or, "And many from the sleepers." The restrictive particle—"of" or "from"—is there, and the Professor's article is not there. King James' version is certainly correct in its rendering in this case.

The affirmative took up 1 Tim. iv. 10, which contains the phrase "Saviour of all men," and showed its true import by pointing out the fact that it is "God"—not "Christ"—who is the Saviour of all men. The text was shown to be susceptible of two constructions, either (1) that God has provided a conditional salvation for all, or (2) that the word Saviour should be rendered "Preserver," in which case the idea is that God preserves all men in this present existence, giving "to all life, and breath, and all things," and "especially" preserves unto life eternal "them that believe." Christ is "the author of eternal salvation" Heb. v. 9.

Besides various minor points debated in the course of the evening, the negative's theory of the unconditional salvation of Adam and his posterity, as illustrated in the former discussion, and re-illustrated in the present one, was thoroughly analyzed by the affirmative, and its utter weakness and folly was well exposed. The only sense in which the affirmative regarded Christ as the LIFE-GIVER was also stated with great force. Christ is the "BREAD of life"—bread, "not POISON."

FOURTH EVENING.

Saturday, March 18, 1865.

The debate last evening was very interesting for one reason at least. Our readers will be pleased to learn that the negative was compelled to surrender one point. We do not mean that he did it frankly and generously, for he "bowed" very "reluctantly" to the irresistible mandate of truth. But he did it. On the previous evening he had boldly asserted that the word "of" in the phrase "Many of them that sleep"—Dan. xii. 2—is not in the original. Of course he did not say that he had examined the orignal, and found it so; neither did he say that any one else had found it so. But he said it as confidently as if it were an undoubted fact. We have no words too strong to use in condemnation of such ignorant (if not wilful) perversion of the express word of God. To be sure, he quoted in connection the translation of Thomas Wintel, in which the word "of" is omitted, but what of that? But a moment previous, he had quoted Prof. Whiting as "high authority," who recognizes the partitive particle. Why should Thos. Wintel, or any other man be continually appealed to for "a just and exact translation," when the manifest facts, known by every competent critic, who reads the text in the original, completely annihilate Wintel's translation. Wintel's opinion in the matter is worth as much as Miles Grant's—just nothing. Yesterday the affirmative, stirred up by the statement of Prof. Hudson, that the article is before "many," took the trouble to visit Simon C. Noot, D. D., Instructor of Hebrew, to inquire as to the facts. The learned Hebraist spurned the assertion of Prof. Hudson, and said that it is a moral impossibility to get anything but a restrictive meaning from the original. To this testimony the negative was forced to submit.

The affirmative introduced an argument on "the bread of life" John vi., in which he proved (1) that Christ is only a LIFE-GIVER as he is the "bread" of life; and (2) that the bread only gives life to those who eat it; and (3) that if they eat they "shall live forever." This overwhelming argument the negative did not notice.

The affirmative brought forward other strong points, which told on the audience. As for the negative, his remarks were so loose and incongruous that it would be impossible to pick out a single point worth printing. There was nothing new, but from beginning to end, his talk was a confused rehash and dull repetition of his talk on the preceeding evenings.

Brain and Thought.

Richmond mentions the case of a woman whose brain was exposed in consequence of the removal of a considerable portion of its bony covering by disease. He says he repeatedly made pressure on the brain, and each time suspended all feeling and all intellect, which were instantly restored when the pressure was withdrawn. The same writer also relates another case, that of a man who had been trepanned, and who perceived his intellectual faculties failing, and his existence drawing to a close, every time the efused blood collected upon the brain so as to produce pressure. Professor Chapman, of Philadelphia, mentions, in his Lectures, that he saw an individual with his skull perforated and the brain exposed, who was accustomed to submit himself to the same experiment of pressure as the above, and who was exhibited by the late Professor Westar to his class. His intellect and moral faculties disappeared on the application of pressure to the brain; they were held under the thumb, as it were, and restored at pleasure to their full activity by discontinuing the pressure. But the most extraordinary case of this kind within my knowledge, and one peculiarly interesting to the physiologist and metaphysician, is related by Sir Astley Cooper in his Surgical Lectures. A man by the name of Jones, received an injury of his head while on board a vessel in the Mediterranean, which rendered him insensible. The vessel, soon after this, made Gibraltar, where Jones was placed in the hospital, and remained several months in the same insensible state. He was then carried on board the Dolphin frigate to Deptford, and from thence was sent to St. Thomas Hospital, London. He lay constantly on his back, and breathed with difficulty. His pulse was regular, and each time it beat he moved his fingers. When hungry or thisty he moved his lips and tongue. Mr. Clyne, the surgeon, found a portion of the skull depressed, trepanned him, and removed the depressed portion. Immediately after this operation the motion of the fingers ceased, and at four o'clock in the afternoon (the operation having been performed at one) he sat up in bed; sensation and volition returned, and in four days he got out of bed and conversed. The last thing he remembered was taking a prize in the Mediterranean. From the moment of the accident, thirteen months and a few days, oblivion had come over him, and all recollection ceased. He had for more than year, drunk of the cup of Lethe, and lived wholly unconscious of existence; yet, on removing a small portion of bone which pressed upon the brain, he was restored to the full possession of the powers of his mind and body.—Dr. Brigham.

National Retribution.

We have maintained from the commencement of the present war that it was our national day of judgment; and that the South must be desolated, as its repentance was hopeless; that the North must suffer terribly in loss of life and property for its complicity in the crime of slaveholding; yet we have not been without a conviction that the North would be so far led to repent, and do works meet for repentance, as that it may be spared to a further trial, to see if the people are sincere, and in earnest to do justice and love mercy. The judgment on the slaveholding portion of the country is too manifest to be denied as a judicial visitation; and shows that God does not let His justice sleep forever, but sooner or later causes judgment to overtake such as refuse reformation. The judicial blindness of the slaveholding power is thus commented on by The Methodist of this city.

JUDICIAL BLINDNESS OF THE SOUTH.

We have referred to the "judicial blindness" to which Providence has given up the rebellious South. History certainly does not record a more striking and admonitory lesson of this kind. The successes of the rebels have apparently been measured out to them just sufficiently to lead them on by a prolonged struggle, to complete retribution. Their lands have been devastated, their business overthrown, their commerce suppressed, their internal communications destroyed, their fighting men nearly annihilated, their families overwhelmed with bereavement and want, their currency practically nullified, and now, as their final overthrow narrows and concentrates with irresistible pressure upon them, they are forced to abandon the chief design of their treason, slavery, and appeal to the downtrodden African for help. But that appeal comes too late. Sherman has cut them off from their chief resource for black recruits; they have not time to drill the comparatively few slaves who may be within their reach, and these know too well the imminent ruin of the cause, and have too much reason to detest that cause, to make reliable soldiers in the rebel lines. We shall not be surprised to find that this last expedient of the great crime will prove its most foolish and perhaps its most tragic fact. A few thousand negroes can be of little help to the failing Confederacy now: a large number of them may turn out to be its self-destruction, and such a destruction as history may tremble to record.

We find the leaders of this iniquity have become confounded; their counsels are without wisdom and concord, their resources are gone, and they are proposing to appropriate any thing and every thing by summary robbery of the people. Their money is worth two cents for the dollar; they need, according to their official estimates, ten hundred and fifty-six millions of dollars for their expenses the current year; their papers declare that "the ability to pay any heavier taxes than have already been imposed does not exist," and that the new system of taxation proposed by the rebel Congress "is utterly impossible for any people to meet." They have already repudiated a large part of their public debt by a species of commutation; they now see no other way out of their financial abyss than a second and unheard-of system of repudiation —the reduction of their whole obligations to the par value of gold; that is, in other words, to issue a new paper, and demand the return of the old to the Treasury, to be paid for at the rate of two cents of the new for one dollar of the old! Thus, with the loss of most of their youth, and of their slaves, must be extinguished hundreds of millions of their property in the form of repudiated government paper. This is destruction heaped on destruction. The curse of God is culminating over the heads of this doomed people.

The rebellion is bound hand and foot by its own crimes and policy. It has been justly said, by a Southern statesman, that there is none of its leaders who does not regret that he ever put his hand to the dreadful work. Their persistence is a necessity—it is not the effect of courage or of heroism. These men know that if they could escape death by peace, yet they must suffer what is worse than physical death —political and social death; that they can never again hold up their heads under the American sky. How can they then give up? If they yield they are ruined; if they persevere they can but be ruined. And their misled communities are in a similar retributive condition. Their leaders have absolute control of every thing; the people cannot save themselves without the consent of their military masters. What can they do then but suffer and perish? Nothing whatever, except as our advancing armies liberate them from their helplessness.

Such is the manifest retribution which has overtaken this greatest crime of modern ages. It is appalling; but it is sublime in its vindication of society and of the moral government of God. The man who fails to see the operation of invincible moral law in the history we are now enacting, fails to read its most impressive lesson. The, "Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Let the nations bow their heads in awe!

Evangelization of Italy.

In a moral and religious aspect Italy is becoming more interesting every day. Truth has been poured in there, through the mountain passes of Switzerland, from Geneva, always the headquarters of a pure and active Christianity, until very healthful signs begin to manifest themselves. During the last three years 100,000 Bibles have been bought by Italians; schools are multiplying rapidly; a Protestant theological seminary at Florence is in vigorous operation; Protestant preaching is established in at least fifty places; and, as might be expected, the most salutary effects are apparent. Northern Italy, which for many years has been the most enlightened and the most restive under the restraints of the old religion, was not, as might have been expected, foremost to welcome the dawning of new religious views. The aristocracy there clung to the hope of a reconciliation between Victor Immanuel and the Pope as affording the highest promise of reform. But meanwhile southern and central Italy had become more accessible to Protestant labors, and at length, in the north, Sardinia has been able to take a higher position among the Italian States, while the influence of the Waldenses is more potential for good than ever before. Milan, as well as Turin, both seem destined to become centres of education and light. The tendency of events is well illustrated by a recent occurrence at a place called Favale, only a few miles from Genoa. Being in a mountainous country, the people in mid-winter, when grazing cattle is no longer practicable, often become strolling minstrels. One of these, with his fiddle and flute, wandered off into Piedmont, where he received a new set of ideas relating to the Bible, etc., and returning home in the Spring found himself virtually banished from society. But a number of people soon became convinced that he was "neither a mad-man nor an atheist," and gained such influence as to draw down the anathemas of the priest, by whom they were eventually sent to prison. Public indignation then became aroused, and an application to the government, by virtue of the new constitution, secured their release. Now there is established in Favale a chapel with sixty members.

The same work is also going forward in other countries. In France forty-one new Protestant churches have been added within two years. Austria has adopted a constitution securing religious liberty, and, by favor of the Emperor, Protestant worship is sustained in the imperial city of Vienna. Spain alone is reserved for the reign of intolerance and bigotry.—Journal of Commerce.

Russian Buildings at Jerusalem.

The following account of the works that are being carried on by the Russians in Jerusalem, taken from a letter received from the Rev. J. Barclay, some two years since, will be read with interest:

"In a former letter, you ask me to give you some information about the Russian buildings at the north-west side of the city. The site occupied by them incloses an area of about 157,500 square yards, or 1,417,500 square feet; in fact, an irregular parallelogram 350 yards broad and 450 yards long. The ground on which they stand, is surrounded by a wall about fifteen feet high. The buildings comprise a palace for a bishop, a magnificent cathedral which is being rapidly pushed toward completion, and large quadrangular buildings, intended for the accommodation of many hundreds of pilgrims. In the plan which I have seen, many other edifices are also designed, the object of which I do not clearly know. The land itself was partly purchased by the Russians, though the larger portion, which was the former Turkish military exercise ground, was granted to them by imperial firman. Their outlay can not be set down at less than £250,000, about a quarter of a million, and yet their object is not fully realized. The idea which originated these buildings arose, it is said, in the Grand Duke Constantine's mind just after the Crimean war. To supply the place of the Russian navy, which had been interdicted in the Black Sea, it was proposed to keep in movement a large number of transport steamers as passenger boats. To keep these going, an impetus was given to the public mind on the subject of pilgrimage. With a view of supplying lodgings for the crowds of devotees, a subscription list was opened, and its proceeds applied to the present erections. It was then proposed to make arrangements to convey pilgrims at so much per head, from the several ports in Russia, to and from Jerusalem at a fixed tariff. Amongst the items set down was a definite sum for the absolution of each penitent in the holy places. At this proposition the Greek priests raised the cry of sacrilege, as such fees heretofore had been peculiarly their own; but now it was proposed to employ none but Russian priests. The Holy Synod took the matter up, and after a good deal of the usual intrigue, the direction of the whole passed into its hands. The location of the buildings is not far from the upper pool of Gihon, near which Rabshakah stood when he defied Hezekiah. It commands also the north and west of the city, and if we are to credit Latin suspicion, its future use will be military."—Jewish Intelligencer.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The suspicion expressed in the last sentence of this article explains the design of the Czar. War is in the hearts of all these kings, and their ambitions and belligerent tendencies will be overruled for the deliverance of Zion. The last great battle will be in vindication of Judah and Jerusalem. Joel. iii. 1–2., 6–16.]

PROMPT TO SERVE GOD.—This angel, (who delivered Peter,) like the other angels of God —like the angel that hurried Lot—appears in a kind of solemn haste. "Arise up quickly," he says; "gird thyself." These spirits, when their purpose is effected, do not stand in wonderment at their own exploits,—they take no breathing time—they want no leisure to rest from the toil, and contemplate the conquest. It is a very ordinary thing to them—it excites no particular surprise or elation in their minds —they do not think of repose. So should it be with the servants of God on earth. They should not stand still, wondering at their own doings, or think they deserve a year's holiday after the labor of one exploit; they also should be in solemn haste—their time is all too short. Not an hour should pass, after their greatest effort, without preparing for some new service.—John Foster.

READ YOUR BIBLE SLOWLY.—Take time, even if you have but little time. A great mathematician once said, "if his life depended upon solving a problem in two minutes, he would spend one of the two in deciding how to do it. So in reading the Scriptures, if you are pressed for time (and this ought to be a rare case), then spend the precious moments on a portion of a chapter. When you feel that the mind and heart are beginning to drink in the sentiment even of a single verse, then stop and drain the heavenly chalice, because the Divine Spirit is filling thy cup. It is a true, solemn, and interesting thought that we are to wait, to linger, to tarry for the blessing to come from the Word before us.

EVACUATION OF ROME.—France has informed the Italian government that the period of two years preceding the evacuation of Rome by the French troops will be calculated from the 6th of February last, that being the day on which King Victor Emmanuel left Turin for Florence. The 6th of February, 1867, therefore, will be a hazardous day for the Papal government. There is strong chance that as soon as this main prop is removed, the whole superstructure of the Pope's temporal power will fall in disastrous ruin.

Responsibilities.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. He often differs from them; but believes in a free exchange of thoughts. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not: he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Books.

Notwithstanding the greatly increased price of printing materials, the only change we make in our Catalogue of prices, is, to advance BIBLE VS. TRADITION, bound, to $1: in paper cover, to 70 cents: and the amount to be pre-paid for postage, for the present, must be added on any work called for in our list of books and pamphlets. The Purchase of books and pamphlets will understand that our Catalogue, as now revised in the HERALD OF LIFE, will be our guide in all cases of sale, and that all previous ones, whether in this paper or in any works of ours containing Catalogues, are hereby revoked.

OUR ISRAELITISH ORIGIN.—A work on Prophecy It was written by Prof. WILSON, England, some years since. We republished it, believing it could not fail to interest all thinking men, whatever might be thought of the accuracy of its positions. For ourself, we indorse the general theory that the Anglo-Saxons are the literal descendants of Israel, in the line of Joseph and Ephraim. Price, 50 cents, in paper covers only. Postage 6 cents.

The Life & Advent Union.

Constitution of "The Life and Advent Union."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to unbelievers,) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and seventeen Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Members of the Board of Directors shall constitute a Committee in their several districts to transact all business pertaining to the Union in their several localities.

VI. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VII. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VIII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church. It is simply a Union for the specific purpose of issuing, through the use of the press, such periodicals and other works as shall spread what we regard the truth of God. All persons are welcome to work with us, even though they differ from us in their views on some points but the Union, by the 2nd Article, intended to guard against being thwarted in their design by votes of persons adverse to its object.—ED. OF HER.

New York & Brooklyn Life and Advent Union.

At the annual meeting of the members and friends of the New York and Brooklyn Life and Advent Union, held on the evening of February 4th, 1865, at 27 Cortland Street, New York, the following matters, relating to the interests and affairs of the Union, were attended to:—

Moved and adopted that the Treasurer's report as presented be accepted:

That the present fiscal year commence on the first of February 1865:

That the hiring of DODWORTH'S HALL, 806 Broadway, New York, for Sunday meetings be confirmed:

That we commence to hold meetings in Dodworth's Hall on Sunday, March 19, 1865:

That meetings be held the first Sunday, morning, afternoon, and evening, afterwards, morning and evening:

That the evening meetings in Dodworth's Hall may partake of the character of the Cooper Institute meetings:

That a Chairman be appointed for the evening meetings:

That LEONARD C. THORNE act as such chairman:

That the Cooper Institute meetings cease after commencing to occupy Dodworth's Hall:

That we very much desire that the third quarterly conference of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION," be held in New York, about the time of the Passover in April ensuing.

Diptheria.

I am happy to announce to the readers of the Herald of Life, that I am in the possession of a remedy that is a sure cure of Diptheria. I have used it for at least ten years in the treatment of this terrible disease, and have treated scores of cases (some of which had been given up by other Physicians) with entire success, not having lost a single case.

It cures the most malignant cases as certainly as the simplest forms of the disease. It is also purely Homeopathic.

Now I propose, for the sum of $1, to send to any who may desire it, a vial of this medicine, containing sufficient, at least, to cure half a dozen cases, with full directions for its use. The medicine can be sent by mail to any part of the country, and will keep any length of time without deteriorating in any latitude.

Address, DR. A. DECKER, Newark, N. J.

P. S. In all cases where the medicine fails to cure, the money will be refunded by notifying me of the fact. To the poor, who are not able to pay, free. A. D.
